A settlement would resolve allegations that Boeing improperly acquired Lockheed Martin Corp proprietary documents dealing with rocket programs and illegally recruited a senior US Air Force acquisition official while she still had oversight of billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts.

A Boeing spokesman said 'the company has stayed engaged' in discussions with the Justice Department.

FAMS Settles Free-Speech Suit, But Its Legal Troubles Continue

While last week's settlement agreement between the Federal Air Marshall Service (FAMS) and the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU\l "I") of Southern California could bolster the cause of FAMS'

While last week's settlement agreement between the Federal Air Marshall Service (FAMS) and the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU\l "I") of Southern California could bolster the cause of FAMS' employees free-speech rights, the agency insists that its policy on this issue really isn't being revised again.

As part of the agreement reached on April 13, in response to Frank Terreri vs. Michael Chertoff et al., no. 05-320 ER (C.D. Cal.), filed April 21, 2005, in the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California-Eastern Division, FAMS agreed to send a broadcast email to all its employees within a week that clarifies their rights to make public statements about the agency. The resulting one-page memo, which FAMS actually sent to its staff on April 18, mostly appears to excerpt and rearrange language from an internal July 26, 2005, memo (coded as "OMS 3700").

OMS 3700, in turn, was a revision of an August 9, 2002, FAMS memo on the same subject (coded as "ADM 3700"). While ACLU\l "I" describes OMS 3700 as an improvement on ADM 3700, it says the former should have been clearer. So ACLU\l "I" continued pressing its lawsuit.

Along with the new email, FAMS employees also were sent additional copies of both OMS 3700 and ADM 3700 last week.

It also may be significant that the release of OMS 3700 followed the original filing of the Terreri suit\l "I" by only four months. But FAMS will not officially admit that the lawsuit influenced, or quickened, the release of the new policy memo. An agency spokesman simply tells Air Safety Week that OMS 3700 was already under development when ACLU's\l "I" suit\l "I" was filed.

Because most of the email's language is not new, FAMS may have a point when it insists that it is only clarifying, and not further revising, its existing policy.

One of the ACLU\l "I" attorneys directly involved in Terrieri, Peter Eliasberg, doesn't dispute that interpretation. But, he adds, whenever an employee free-speech policy is at issue, particularly involving an agency that does not have a sterling reputation in the area, "clarifications are incredibly important," he tells Air Safety Week.

About the same time FAMS released OMS-3700 in mid-2005, the agency also came back under the jurisdiction of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA). The latter also has had public-relations problems on the employee free-speech issue. But it is unclear whether the new settlement agreement will induce renewed bouts of soul-searching at TSA. Eliasberg, for one, is hopeful that it will. By press time, TSA did not respond to Air Safety Week's repeated requests for comment.

In Terreri, it is alleged that FAMS's earlier memo on employee conduct and speech, ADM 3700, was unconstitutional. It not only prohibited air marshals from any form of expression criticizing or ridiculing the agency, but prohibited them from making "any public statements concerning" the agency.

Besides the new email, another interesting provision of the ACLU\l "I" settlement prohibits the plaintiff, Frank Terreri, who is a current federal air marshal and a member of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association (FLEOA), from taking any further legal action against FAMS "arising out of the facial validity of ADM 3700 and/or OMS 3700."

But that didn't stop Terrari, six days after the settlement was reached, from filing a new legal petition against FAMS with the U.S. Office of Special Counsel (OSC). The new action accuses FAMS of "gross mismanagement" and threatening air safety by making repeated disclosures of operational tactics and the identity of individual air marshals, according to FLEOA.

Indeed, this allegation of improper disclosure was the "complaint within the complaint" of the ACLU\l "l" lawsuit against FAMS. In several instances in recent years, the suit\l "l" alleges, FAMS officials have cooperated with several major media outlets in doing "day-in-the-life" stories on currently employed air marshals, including how they are directed by the agency to publicly act, dress, and groom themselves; and what operational procedures they follow.

In the petition to OSC, Terreri alleges that these news stories have revealed the exact weapon marshals carry with them on the flights they're assigned to, as well as the methods that marshals are prepared to use in the event of a hijacking.

Insight settles small-biz suit

By Ethan Butterfield

If allegations were true, penalty is light, observers said
Complaints that large companies steal government work from small businesses may no longer be falling on deaf ears. In what is believed to be the first-ever False Claims Act settlement between a company allegedly posed as a small business and the U.S. government, Insight Public Sector Inc. has agreed to pay $1 million for misrepresenting itself as a small business.

The alleged improper activity began in 1996 when the company, then known as Comark Government and Education Services Inc., won a General Services Administration multiple-award schedule contract as a small business.

In 2002, Insight Enterprise Inc., a Fortune 1000 company with 2005 revenue of $3.3 billion, acquired Comark, which continued to operate as a small business until 2005.

The settlement was the result of a two-year investigation by GSA, the Justice Department and the Small Business Administration that concluded Comark was not a small business when it won the contract and, therefore, was given preferential treatment and contracts it should not have received.

Insight of Tempe, Ariz., declined to be interviewed for this story.

Glenn Harris, an attorney in SBA's inspector general's office who worked on the investigation, said between 1996 and 2005, the company won roughly 250 small-business set asides worth about $4.2 million.

Harris could specify neither the total number of task orders nor their value, but, he said, there were "many other contracts."

Allegations of fraud
Lloyd Chapman, president and founder of the small-business advocacy group American Small Business League, began looking into Insight in 2002 after hearing repeated complaints from small companies that were losing contracts to Insight.

Later that year, he turned Insight and two other companies over to SBA for misrepresenting themselves as small businesses. Chapman claims Insight won more than $50 million worth of small-business contracts, and called the $1 million settlement inappropriate.

"It is a joke and an insult to the American people and to small businesses, and it serves to encourage fraud and abuse," he said. "That's like having the fine for bank robbery be that you have to pay a percentage of what you stole."

Under the Small Business Act, companies found guilty of misrepresenting themselves as small businesses face punishment of up to 10 years in prison, a fine of $500,000 per infraction and debarment from government contracting.

Harris, while not acknowledging whether criminal prosecution was ever recommended against Insight, said the government considered all its options, but that the final settlement was the result of extensive negotiations with the company's legal team. He called it a "good settlement for the government."

In a statement announcing the agreement, SBA Administrator Hector Barreto went even further.

"This should act as a deterrent to such activity," he said.

But the agreement lets Insight stay on the 20-year GSA schedule contract and does not include any admission of wrongdoing on the company's behalf. Taken in combination with a fine that is a fraction of what the company won in awards, small-business advocates fail to see the deterrent.

Guy Timberlake, CEO and chief visionary officer for the American Small Business Coalition, lauded the government for taking action, but disagreed with the severity of the punishment.

"Fraud is what it is, and it should be treated as harshly as fraud, as a federal offense," he said.

Lack of oversight

The problem of large companies winning small-business contracts is an institutional one and is not limited to one company under one contract, SBA and industry officials said.

In a report from Feb. 24, 2005, then SBA IG Harold Damelin called the issue one of the most important challenges facing SBA and federal government.

"Large businesses are receiving small-business procurement awards, and agencies are receiving credit for these awards," he wrote.

Among the bones of contention is the way government contracting officers search for vendors. Using the Central Contractor Registry's (CCR) search function, contracting officers access a complete list of companies that have been certified by SBA as members of its 8(a) Business Development, HUBZone Empowerment Contracting and Small Disadvantaged Business programs.

However, the registry lists any businesses that claim to qualify as small, not solely those certified by SBA. The registry is largely an honor system; companies enter their own information with no oversight and are expected to update it regularly and accurately, SBA's Harris said.

"There are a lot of problems with that in terms of data accuracy," he said.

In a series of reports over the last two years, the SBA IG has urged the agency to make changes to the registry. As of yet, no changes have been made, although SBA officials claim to be working with the Defense Department on a solution.

Skirting requirements

The IG also has taken issue with the practice, on governmentwide acquisition contracts, of vendors maintaining their small-business status for the life of the contract — 20 years in some cases — even if the company outgrows its designation or is purchased by a large corporation.

The IG wants this practice stopped, but SBA has declined to do so.

A rule enacted in 2004 forced recertification of companies on multiple-award schedule contracts every five years as options are picked up. But companies are allowed to grow out of the small-business category during those five years.

SBA in April 2003 issued a proposed rule change that would require annual recertifications, but the rule has yet to be adopted.

That may not be enough, Harris said. To ensure that the contract winner is a small business, the certification should be done before each task order award, he said.

Yet another problem exists in government agencies themselves; some contracting officers selectively pick North American Industrial Classification System codes for procurements to let companies win small-business contracts, Timberlake said. Procure- ments often are tagged with NAICS codes, each of which has its own size standard.

Some NAICS codes are revenue-based; others are based on number of employees. Contracts often have several NAICS codes, which lets companies that do not qualify under one code qualify as small under another code. NAICS codes each company qualifies for are listed on the CCR, and are entered by the company.

In the case of Insight winning awards under the 1996 GSA contract, it is likely that each contract awarded to the company, set-aside or not, was counted by the awarding government agency toward its small-business contracting goal, Harris said.

“They try to do everything they can to take as much credit as possible, so I would think it quite likely that they did,” he said.

Alleged Medicare fraud ring busted in LA area

LOS ANGELES-Five members of a Russian-Armenian organized crime ring have been indicted for allegedly bilking Medicare of more than $20 million, authorities said.

The group operated medical clinics and laboratories in Los Angeles, Glendale and Pasadena that paid marketers for patient referrals and billed Medicare for tests that were unnecessary or were not done, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bruce Searby wrote in court papers. The alleged fraud took place between 1997 and 2005.

The defendants, who were indicted Thursday, have been charged with conspiracy, health care fraud, Medicare kickbacks, making false statements to Medicare and money laundering.

The group allegedly was led by Konstantin Grigoryan, 56, of Altadena, a former colonel in the Soviet army; his wife, Mayya Leonidovna Grigoryan, 54; the Grigoryans' son-in-law, Eduard Gershelis, 34, of Los Angeles; Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law, Aleksandr Treynker, 48, of Canoga Park; and Haroutyun Gulderyan, 36, of Tujunga.

The Grigoryans and Gershelis have been in federal custody since their March 21 arrests. Gulderyan and Treynker have been released on bond. The five are scheduled to appear in court June 13.

Gershelis' attorney, Jerome Mooney, described the episode as "a very unfortunate circumstance." Attorneys for the other defendants did not return phone calls from the Los Angeles Daily News seeking comment.

Last December, three operators of an Orange County clinic pleaded guilty to charges they bilked insurers out of nearly $15 million by operating on healthy people, authorities said.

Counterterrorism: Our Dirty War

Bob Herbert

Isaid, "Some of these folks have never been heard from again, right?"

"Yup," said Curt Goering. "That's right."

Goering is the senior deputy executive director for policy and programs at Amnesty International USA. We were discussing a subject — government-sanctioned disappearances — that ordinarily would repel most Americans.

In past years, stories about torture and "the disappeared" have been associated with sinister regimes in South and Central America. The attitude in the United States was that we were above such dirty business, that it was immoral and uncivilized, and we were better than that.

But times change, and we've lowered our moral standards several notches since then. Now people are disappearing at the hands of the U.S. government.

"Below the Radar: Secret Flights to Torture and 'Disappearance'" is the title of a recent Amnesty International report on the reprehensible practice of extraordinary rendition, a highly classified American program in which individuals are seized — abducted — without due process and sent off to be interrogated by regimes that are known to engage in torture.

Some of the individuals swept up by rendition simply vanish.

"This is a kind of netherworld that people disappear into and don't frequently emerge from," said Goering. "It's a world that's outside the reach of law. These individuals might as well be on another planet."

There is no way to know how many people have been seized, tortured or killed. Since there are no official proceedings, there is no way to know whether a particular individual who is taken into custody is a legitimate terror suspect or someone who is innocent of any wrongdoing. But we have learned, after the fact, that mistakes have been made.

You may not be familiar with the name Khaled el-Masri, but the Bush administration sure knows who he is. Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, was arrested while visiting Macedonia in December 2003. A few weeks later, he was handed over to a group of masked men dressed all in black — in the so-called ninja outfits frequently worn by the rendition cowboys.

Masri's clothes were cut off and he was drugged, put aboard a plane and flown to Afghanistan, where he was held in a squalid basement cell for five months.

It turned out, as noted by Dana Priest of The Washington Post, who was awarded a Pulitzer Prize this week for her reporting on the government's covert counterterrorism programs, that "the CIA had imprisoned the wrong man."

Priest wrote:

"Masri was held for five months largely because the head of the CIA's counterterrorist center's al-Qaida unit 'believed he was someone else,' one former CIA official said. 'She didn't really know. She just had a hunch.'"

Someone had a hunch that Maher Arar was a terrorist, too. A Canadian citizen who had been born in Syria, he was snatched by American authorities at Kennedy Airport in New York on Sept. 26, 2002, and shipped off to a nightmare in Syria that lasted nearly a year. He was held for most of that time in an underground, rat-infested cell about the size of a grave.

No one, not even among the Syrians who tortured him, was ever able to come up with any evidence linking Arar to terrorism. He was released and returned to his family in Ottawa. Shunned and emotionally shattered, he seems a ruined man at just 35 years of age.

The cases of Khaled el-Masri and Maher Arar are among the handful that we know about. Most cases remain concealed in the lawless netherworld that Goering spoke of.

The Amnesty International report describes various acts of torture and other forms of mistreatment that are alleged to have been inflicted on victims of rendition. According to the report, Vincent Cannistraro, a former director of the CIA's Counterterrorism Center, said the following about a detainee who had been rendered to Egypt:

"They promptly tore his fingernails out and he started telling things."

The Bush administration will never do the right thing when it comes to rendition. Congress needs to step in and thoroughly investigate this program, which is nothing less than a crime against humanity. Congress needs to investigate it, document it, and shut it down.

Neil -- here are my thoughts:

1 - there is a planning meeting this Friday. We will of course have a better idea of the state of play after that meeting, but our recommendation as it now stands is that we determine whether there will likely be any criminal complaints filed as a result of the raid. We are much more comfortable doing a press event -- even if it is just a statement -- once we have filed criminal charges, in large part because of the uncertainty regarding what we will find during the raids. Part of the problem with Gilded Cage (the SF takedown) was that virtually every speaker at the press conference talked about what a great trafficking case it was. It has turned out to be a good smuggling case, but not such a good trafficking case. We want to avoid a repeat of that problem here. The one thing that will be emphasized at Friday's meeting is no freelancing -- i.e., everybody should be on the same page in terms of press. That means USAOs, FBI, and ICE. If we think we need ODAG's help to reinforce that message after Friday's meeting, we'll definitely pass that along.

2 - HCE has a pool of about 500 volunteer testers, all DOJ employees. They are seeking to expand that pool, so we have drafted a memo for the AG to send out encouraging volunteers. Wan specifically raised HSH at the USA conference in Orlando, so the USAs won't be surprised to see a solicitation for help. HCE has historically been cautious about going to outside groups for testing volunteers, although they have definitely done so where there has been a specific niche to be filled (e.g., blind testers, testers of a particular racial or ethnic background). There are obvious issues pertaining to liability and confidentiality that must be worked through whenever we use non-DOJ employees for testing, but that doesn't mean that we shouldn't explore those resources.

3 - sure. I will send out a calendar invitation. We'll make sure that our memos cover roll-out suggestions.

This morning, President Bush will participate in a briefing for members of the House of Representatives on ongoing operations in the War on Terror.

In the afternoon, the President and Mrs. Bush will recognize the 2006 National and State Teachers of the Year. Strengthening America's education system is one of the President's top priorities. While improving the quality of education requires good laws and policies, success ultimately depends on good teachers. The dedication and commitment to excellence demonstrated by these teachers, and numerous teachers across the country, have helped their students learn critical knowledge and succeed.

President Bush Announces Plan To Address Gasoline Prices. "Under pressure to curb soaring gasoline prices, President Bush announced he would suspend deposits to the U.S. Strategic Petroleum Reserve to boost consumer supplies and also seek to relax some antipollution rules. ...
Yesterday, Mr. Bush, facing an outcry from his own party leaders, called high gas prices 'a hidden tax on the working people' and said he would stop purchases and deposits to the reserve in order to increase supplies for consumer use. ... The president said his administration would seek to get tougher increase supplies for consumer use." The president said his administration would seek to get tougher on enforcing antigouging rules on suppliers. He also announced moves to ease fuel-formulation requirements at the state and federal levels, saying the government must 'ensure that there are not needless restrictions on our ability to get gasoline to the pump.' <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB114597325132735281.html?mod=home_whats_news_us> " (John D. DaimlerChrysler AG Pledges To Produce More Ethanol-Fuel Vehicles. " DaimlerChrysler AG pledged to build 500,000 ethanol-fuel vehicles annually, or a quarter of its U.S. production, by 2008 <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2006/04/25/AR2006042501737_pf.html> , as automakers try to address concerns over heavy foreign oil consumption and high gas prices. Thomas W. LaSorda, chief executive of Chrysler, made the pledge yesterday at a meeting of the Renewable Fuels Association in Washington, where President Bush announced measures aimed at reducing the country's dependence on foreign oil. He encouraged production of ethanol-powered cars and gasoline-electric hybrid vehicles. Bush and some lawmakers have promoted ethanol as a way to trim imports of oil and help farmers." President Bush Meets With A Bipartisan Group Of Senators To Urge Passage Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform. "President Bush urged the Senate on Tuesday to approve stalled, sweeping immigration legislation by Memorial Day, and lawmakers from both parties expressed optimism they could succeed. Bush convened a bipartisan meeting at the White House as part of an effort to free the legislation from Senate gridlock. ... Bush said after the session that he can 'report to the American people that there is a common desire' for an immigration overhaul. 'I want to thank both Republicans and Democrats for taking on this really hard, hard assignment,' Bush said. 'I assured the members that I look forward to working with them as they try to get a bill out of the Senate by Memorial Day. <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060425/ap_on_go_co/senate_immigration&printer=1;_ylt=AvIl_IhcWvGOLatSnfvK6AKMwfIE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE -> '" (Laurie Kellman, "Bush Urges Senate To OK Bill By Summer," The Associated Press, 4/25/06)

Seniors Benefiting From The Medicare Prescription Drug Program. ABC'S LISA STARK: "Back in January, Dallas pharmacist Milton Chapman spent hours trying to get medications approved. Seniors were lost in the system. Now..." MILTON CHAPMAN, PHARMACIST: "We're starting to see a lot of coordination between the insurance companies and the pharmacies, and things seem to be going a little bit smoother than they were back in January." STARK: "Medicare says most insurance companies are now answering calls within five minutes, and the Medicare hotline picks up in less than 36 seconds. ... Most seniors seem pleased. An ABC News poll found 63% of those enrolled are saving money, 60% think the costs are reasonable. Gloria Massey says she's saving hundreds of dollars a year." GLORIA MASSEY: "The first time, I had to only pay that $5 co-pay I couldn't believe it. I felt like running out of the drugstore because I thought I didn't want them to change their mind." DR. EDWARD LANGSTON, AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION BOARD MEMBER: "In most cases, there are a very generous and large number of options that we can use.
It just takes some time, and it takes some effort." (ABC's "World News Tonight," 4/25/06)

Consumer Confidence Rises To Highest Level In Four Years. "In two surprising signs of the economy's resilience, sales of existing homes rose slightly in March and consumer confidence strengthened. <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB114597328832535283.html?mod=economy_lead_story_lsc> ... Meanwhile, the Conference Board announced that its consumer-confidence index for April rose to its highest level in four years. The 109.6 reading this month was up from 107.5 in March. The survey continues to show consumers are more optimistic about the current economic situation than they are about future conditions. 'Recent improvements in the labor market have been a major driver behind the rise in confidence,' said Lynn Franco, director of the survey." (Christopher Conkey, "Confidence Index And Home Sales Display Strength," The Wall Street Journal, 4/26/06)

The Administration Asks Congress To Approve Additional Funding To Improve New Orleans' Levees. "The Bush administration Tuesday formally asked Congress to approve the additional $2.2 billion experts say is needed to improve storm protection for much of southeast Louisiana, but with the caveat that state and local taxpayers come up with $270 million. <http://www.nola.com/news/t-p/frontpage/index.ssf?/base/news-5/114603507 4198660.xml> ... The money would go to raise and strengthen levees to a level to protect against a so-called 100-year flood. Powell said he hopes the Senate will add the financing request to an emergency supplemental spending bill pending in Congress." (Bruce Alpert, "La. Required To Chip In $270 Million On Levees," The Times-Picayune, 4/26/06)

President Bush Threatens Veto On Spending Bill Unless Cost To Taxpayers Is Scaled Back. "The White House promises to veto a huge Senate bill to pay for the rising costs of the war in Iraq and Afghanistan and to repair Hurricane Katrina damage unless the cost to taxpayers is scaled back to President Bush's original requests. ... 'The administration is seriously concerned with the overall funding level and the numerous unrequested items included in the Senate bill that are unrelated to the war or emergency hurricane relief needs,' said an official White House statement issued Tuesday. 'The final version of the legislation must remain focused on addressing urgent national priorities while maintaining fiscal discipline.' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060425/ap_on_go_co/congress_spending&print er=1;_ylt=AiYYJ2OE3qdykOVezawzSTSMwfIE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE> " (Andrew Taylor, "White House Vows Veto Of Spending Bill," The Associated Press, 4/25/06)

Secretary Chertoff Announces New Port Security Measures. "The government will do background checks on 400,000 seaport workers in an effort to protect the nation's ports from terrorism, the Homeland Security Department announced Tuesday. Port workers and others will also be given 'tamper-proof' identification cards to tighten security in areas where millions of metal cargo containers are taken off ships each year and loaded onto trucks headed for stores across the country. The checks and IDs 'will assure our citizens that those people who regularly come and go in the ports have been checked to make sure that they are not a security threat,' <http://www.usatoday.com/prin tedition/news/20060426/a_idcards26.art.htm> Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said." Secretaries Rice And Rumsfeld Arrive In Baghdad To Meet With New Iraqi Leaders. "The United States' diplomatic and military chiefs both flew in to Baghdad on Wednesday to meet Iraq's new prime minister, emphasizing the importance Washington attaches to his success in forming a national unity government. ... Returning to the capital just three weeks after a visit aimed at breaking deadlock over the choice of Maliki's predecessor, Rice said Iraq was at a 'turning point' and that a focus of meetings she and Rumsfeld planned would be pressing for a new cabinet free of divisive 'sectarian' figures." <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/iraq_dc&printer=1;_ylt=AloSF51SN4OCO5yIaumJG Hxg.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE> (Stuart Grudgings, "Rice, Rumsfeld Fly In To Meet New Iraq Leader," Reuters, 4/26/06)

Iraqis Condemn Zarqawi's Threats. "Iraqis on Wednesday condemned terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi as a foreigner determined to destroy their country, saying his new video promising more attacks may have surfaced in response to the breakthrough in the formation of a unity government. ... Sheik Khalid al-Attiyah, the Iraqi parliament's newly appointed first deputy speaker, said the video shows that al-Zarqawi remains determined 'to inflame a civil war' in Iraq. But al-Attiyah said it also indicates the insurgent leader, an outsider to many Iraqis, fears the country's new government will unify Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds.

... 'I believe that al-Zarqawi was caught off guard by the new government taking shape because it will be very strong one representing all Iraqis, <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/iraq&printer=1;_ylt=AgZTH5SQN2MFEbiPIK8H7aMUewgF;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE-> ' al-Attiyah said." Afghanistan Is "Open For Business." "After decades of conflict and the crippling legacies of communism and fundamentalism, Afghanistan is finally open for business <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB114601791310536097.html?mod=opinion_main_commentaries> . The signs are everywhere, from Kabul's traffic jams to Mazar-i-Sharif's building boom; from the opening of a Coca-Cola bottling plant to the country's first private university, the American University of Afghanistan, offering programs in business administration and information technology." TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Jury Ends Third Day Of Deliberations. The AP (4/27) reports, "Jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui case completed a third day of deliberations Wednesday without deciding whether the Sept. 11 conspirator should be executed or imprisoned for life." The AP continues, "After 6 1/4 hours of work on Wednesday, the nine men and three women had deliberated for 16 hours over three days. They were to return Thursday morning. … Jurors have asked only one question - a request on Tuesday for a dictionary. U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema denied the request, saying that giving them a dictionary would be like placing extraneous evidence in the jury room. She said jurors could submit a written question if they needed specific definitions."

Judge Denies Reporters' Request For Juror Interviews. The AP (4/27, Ohlemacher) reports, "The judge in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial turned down a request from reporters from 14 news organizations Wednesday to ask jurors to discuss their verdict once the trial ends. … 'I do not believe it is appropriate for the court to serve as an intermediary between the media and the jurors,' U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in a letter to the news organizations. 'Accordingly, I will not communicate your request to the jurors.'" The AP adds, "The reporters, backed by a half-dozen other news organizations, delivered a letter to the judge early Wednesday asking her to tell jurors - whose identities have remained secret - of the public's interest in knowing how the jury reached its verdict. They requested that the message be delivered as the jurors prepare to leave the courthouse at the end of the trial. … The reporters' letter offered willing jurors a place away from the courthouse for interviews and, for those concerned about their safety, the possibility of doing it off-camera."

Report Finds Hundreds Of Detainees Abused. Knight Ridder (4/27, Brown) reports, "Three human rights groups said Wednesday that they had found credible evidence that U.S. troops and government civilians in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had abused, tortured or killed at least 460 detainees." Knight Ridder continues, "The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved. The findings are in a report by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice,

Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch. … At least 600 U.S. service members or civilians have been implicated in the cases of abuse. About 400 of them have been investigated, and only one-third of those who have been investigated have faced punishment of any kind, researchers said." Knight Ridder adds, "The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers. … It shows that detainee abuse has been more widespread that government officials have admitted and the American military and other government agencies have made only limited attempts to investigate and punish those responsible, the rights groups charged."

Judge Won't Block Detainees' Confinement To Maximum Security, Solitary. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Williams, 958K) reports that a war crimes tribunal judge has decided "against second-guessing detention camp authorities in their decision to confine to maximum security and solitary confinement the 10 terrorism suspects who have been charged. Navy Capt. Daniel O'Toole rejected a request by the Army defense lawyer for accused bomb maker Sufyian Barhoumi that his handicapped client be returned to the communal detention camp where he had been living until four weeks ago in recognition of his good behavior."

Gitmo Called A "Great Lie." P. Sabin Willett, a Boston lawyer who represents Saddiq Ahmad Turkistani, who is about to begin his fifth year of imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay, writes in the Washington Post (4/27, A27, 744K), "One day the sordid history of Guantanamo will be written. There will be chapters on torture, chapters on the how the courts turned a blind eye, chapters on cruelties large and petty, on the massive stupidity and uselessness of the place. Many pages will illustrate the great lie of Guantanamo -- that it is a 'terrorist detention facility' -- with accounts of goatherds and chicken farmers and stray foreigners sold by Pakistani grifters to the United States for bounties."

UK Studies Saudi's Use Of Clerics To Moderate Terror Prisoners. The Washington Times (4/27, Guardia, 90K) reports, "British security chiefs are studying a novel Saudi approach to combating terror -- using clerics to debate 'jihad' with imprisoned militants and convert them to more moderate beliefs. The Saudi authorities said about 400 of 700 extremists had been re-educated and released from prison. The Islamic 'counseling' program is part of what British experts regard as Saudi Arabia's 'model counterterrorism campaign.'"

US Seeks To Combat Terrorism Financing. Voice of America (4/27, Ferdinando) reports, "Money laundering and terrorist financing are global problems that transcend borders. Terrorist supporters funnel money through charities and international criminal gangs constantly adapt their techniques, while law enforcement agencies try to stay one step ahead." VOA continues, "Terrorists are financed by smuggled funds, criminal activities or any other number of ways -- even by governments themselves, according to U.S. officials. … Targeting that support is a key action for law enforcement, as top U.S. Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser explains: 'By taking the steps that we're taking by disrupting, dismantling these financial networks that are supporting these activities, we are degrading the ability of these organizations to get to the stage where they only have a few more dollars to spend to complete a terrorist attack.' … But it's impossible to say how much money goes into terrorism each year. And stopping that flow is extremely challenging, according to David Caruso, founder of the Virginia-based Dominion Advisory Group, an anti-money laundering consulting firm. … And terrorists are constantly looking for new methods to avoid detection and secure funding, says Jeffrey Breinholt, deputy counterterrorism chief at the U.S. Department of Justice. … 'It's important to view terrorists as being organized criminals,' says Breinholt. 'Terrorists are nothing if not adaptable and opportunistic. And so if we accept that as a notion, that large terrorist groups that we are targeting -- al-Qaida, Hezbollah, Hamas -- they will be ones that will pay very much attention to things that arise that are new opportunistic crimes.'"

Mueller Says Decentralized Terror Cells Emerging As US Disrupts Al Qaeda. The AP (4/27, Milton) reports that since 9/11, "law enforcement has witnessed the emergence of a new threat, homegrown terrorist cells, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Wednesday" in a speech at the James M. Fox memorial lecture series in New York City. Mueller noted, "What we see is a new threat that is decentralized. We have seen homegrown terrorist cells not answerable to a particular leader but to an ideology." Mueller said that US "success in driving terrorists from Afghanistan, cutting off their funding and disrupting their operations has forced them to change" and caused "law enforcement to adapt its traditional strategy of pursuing terrorists." Still, Mueller added, "We cannot forget that people overseas are plotting against the United States and would want nothing more than to replicate September 11th."

US Attorney, FBI Say Lodi Terror Investigation Continues. The AP (4/27, Thompson) reports Lodi, Calif. residents "had hoped to set aside the suspicions that divided them in the 11 months since federal agents arrested" Hamid and Umer Hayat on terrorism charges, but US Attorney McGregor Scott "said Wednesday that the investigation is continuing." FBI Sacramento SAC Drew Parenti added, "There are aspects of this (case) which remain under investigation." But Lodi Mayor Susan Hitchcock said that "Scott's comment about a continuing investigation 'reopens an old wound,' aggravating suspicions of and within the Muslim community that had just begun to heal, said Hitchcock."

Legal Experts Say Hamid Hayat Conviction Likely To Be Overturned. The New York Times (4/27, Broder, 1.19M) reports US Attorney McGregor Scott "said in a telephone interview Wednesday that the conviction…showed that the government was capable of winning a jury trial on terrorism charges after a number of high-profile failures elsewhere. … But legal experts said the prosecution's celebration might be short-lived because a federal appeals court had twice ruled unconstitutional some aspects" of the material support law "on which Mr. Hayat was convicted. They also said Mr. Hayat's reported confessions to F.B.I. agents could be challenged on the ground they were coerced from a frightened suspect with a limited command of English."

Foreman Says Jury Voted Overwhelmingly For Conviction. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Tempest, Bailey, 958K) reports that in the Hamid Hayat jury deliberations, "the scorecard read like an NBA blowout. By the time the jury finished voting on each piece of evidence, the score was 135-40 for the prosecution." Hamid Hayat jury foreman Joe Cote said that "key to the jury's decision…were Hayat's own words on an FBI videotape that he had attended a camp, his comments secretly recorded by an undercover informant that indicated Hayat's 'willingness' to go for training and a handwritten warrior's prayer in Arabic found in his wallet." Regarding the one undecided juror last week, who prompted a letter to the judge Friday warning of a possible deadlock, "Cote and others denied any ganging up. … She came to her guilty verdict simply by 'thinking about it over the weekend.'"

Juror Says She Hopes Verdict Deters Terrorism. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Tempest, Bailey, 958K) also reports that juror Starr Scaccia "said she hoped the jury verdict would be a deterrent in the war on terrorism. 'I hope it gets the message out: Don't mess with the United States,' she said. 'It's not worth it.'"

CIA Dismisses Allegations It Has Warned Former Agents Against Contacts With Media. The Financial Times (4/27, Sevastopulo) reports, "The Central Intelligence Agency has warned former employees not to have unapproved contacts with reporters, as part of a mounting campaign by the administration to crack down on officials who leak information on national security issues." One "former official said the CIA recently warned several retired employees who have consulting contracts with the agency that they could lose their pensions by talking to reporters without permission. He added that while the threats might be legally 'hollow,' they were having a chilling effect on former employees." But the CIA "called the allegations 'rubbish'. Jennifer Millerwise Dyke, spokeswoman for CIA director Porter Goss, said former employees with consulting deals could lose their contracts for violating the CIA secrecy agreement by having unauthorised conversations with reporters. But she stressed that under current law, 'termination of a contract does not affect pensions.'"

Broder Blames Bush For Tension Between Administration, Reporters. David Broder in his column in the Washington Post (4/27, A27, 744K) writes, "The tension between the legitimate claims of secrecy and the need for public accountability remains, however, and in many respects has grown worse. The main reason is the reluctance of this president and his administration to accept a broad and continuing responsibility to keep the public and the press informed on the reasons for the policies they have adopted." His "approach has been one of announcing a policy after it has been completed in his relatively closed circle of decision makers and then simply reiterating that policy in any number of prearranged settings. His news conferences and interviews are infrequent, and they rarely offer insights into the reasoning behind his conclusions."

European Investigators Allege CIA Made Rendition Flights. The New York Times (4/27, Bilefsky, 1.19M) reports, "Investigators for the European Parliament said Wednesday that data gathered from air safety regulators and others found that the Central Intelligence Agency had flown 1,000 undeclared flights over European territory since 2001. Sometimes the planes stopped to pick up terrorism suspects who had been kidnapped to take them to countries that use torture, the investigators added." Butt "hey could not say how many flights involved the transport of suspects" and "the new report offered no hard evidence" about alleged secret detention centers in Europe.

The AP (4/27, Sliva) reports, "Cases of terror suspects being secretly handed over to U.S. agents did not appear to be isolated, the lawmakers said in a preliminary report on their inquiry. European human rights treaties prohibit sending suspects to states known to torture prisoners."

The Washington Post (4/27, A20, Whitlock, 744K) adds, "The preliminary report also criticized several European countries -- including Sweden, Italy and Macedonia -- saying they had allowed CIA officers to apprehend or detain terrorism suspects on their soil and then covered up their presence."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Jurors Hear More Informant Tapes At NYC Subway Bomb Plot Trial. The New York Times (4/27, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "A fuller picture emerged yesterday of an alleged plot to bomb the Herald Square subway station and of the Pakistani immigrant charged as its prime author, as prosecutors again played secretly recorded conversations between the man and a police informer." In the recordings, Shahawar Matin Siraj told "the informer he expected that the blast in the subway station would bring down the Manhattan Mall on the street above," but in another conversation, "he said he wanted to bomb the station in the early morning hours to cause only economic damage and kill as few people as possible." The Times adds, "On the tapes…Siraj seemed to alternate between shrewd, bumbling and bizarre."

Closing Arguments Made At 9/11 Perjury Trial. The New York Times (4/27, Confessore, Baranauckas, 1.19M) reports, "A tangled four-and-half-year legal battle drew toward an end yesterday as prosecutors and defense lawyers made closing arguments in the case of a Jordanian college student accused of lying to a federal grand jury about his relationship with two Sept. 11 hijackers. Prosecutors say the student, Osama Awadallah…lied when he testified under oath at an October 2001 grand jury hearing that he did not know…Khalid al-Midhar, and denied having written his name in a school notebook before conceding during a later hearing that he had met Mr. Midhar." But defense attorney Jesse Berman "painted a very different picture, that of a young immigrant…with limited English, disoriented after nearly three weeks of solitary confinement and with no reason to mislead the grand jury."

Van Hollen Says Terrorists Training In Wisconsin. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (4/2, Forster, 266K) reports, "There are terrorists training and raising money in Wisconsin, Republican attorney general candidate J.B. Van Hollen said Wednesday in a Capitol news conference. … Van Hollen said that based on information he had access to as U.S. attorney, he was aware that the FBI and other law enforcement officials were monitoring potential threats, but that there wasn't enough activity or information to act." Milwaukee FBI Supervisory Special Agent Mike Johnson "said Van Hollen's comment about the FBI was 'completely inappropriate' because Van Hollen doesn't speak for the agency." The AP (4/27) notes that Van Hollen's Republican and Democratic "opponents immediately demanded that he give up what he knows."

House Panel Passes Port Security Bill. One day after Secretary Chertoff announced that the Department of Homeland Security will begin conducting background checks on 400,000 seaport workers, the House Homeland Security Committee unanimously passed a $2.4 billion bill yesterday that would increase random cargo inspections. The Washington Times (4/27, Hudson, 90K) reports that the bill "requires…98 percent of all containers be screened for nuclear materials." Democrats, whose proposal that all containers be screened for nuclear devices within five years was rejected by a 18-16 vote, "say the nuclear screening requirement is weak," but the "legislation has bipartisan support."

The AP (4/27, Barrett) reports Republicans said the five year deadline amendment, offered by Rep. Edward Markey, "was unrealistic and the scanner technology is still too faulty to deploy through a mammoth port system that handles 20,000 cargo containers every day. At that, some Democrats erupted." Rep. Peter DeFazio accused "GOP leaders of buckling to pressure from business groups that oppose greater regulation. Republicans denied any influence from lobbyists."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (4/27, Hulse, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that "a little-noticed provision added to a spending measure last year" by Rep. Harold Rogers designated an arm of a "trade group with which he has longstanding ties as the central operator of a new federal program to perform background checks on 750,000 maritime workers." Rogers argued yesterday that the American Association of Airport Executives' Transportation Security Clearinghouse "had already performed 2 million background checks on airport workers" and that he saw "no reason to waste more time and money reinventing the wheel," but the Bush administration says "that the earmark is threatening to further delay a program to issue new tamper-proof identification cards to the nation's port workers." Secretary Chertoff said yesterday that "he intends to start the new program by the end of this year," though "the administration, in proposing the 2007 federal budget, made clear that it opposed the requirement by Mr. Rogers, asking Congress to strike it."

New Hampshire Taking Lead In Opposition To Real ID. The Washington Times/AP (4/27) reports, "New Hampshire suddenly has become a battleground in the fight over privacy rights versus homeland security, with state legislators voting against strict new federal standards for issuing driver's licenses." New Hampshire's "Republican-controlled" House "voted overwhelmingly" last month to block the state from participating in the Real ID. "A vote in the Republican-dominated Senate is expected in two weeks after a committee endorsement yesterday. Gov. John Lynch, a Democrat, remains undecided." The state's bill is the toughest measure making real progress anywhere," according to Barry Steinhardt, director of the Technology and Liberty Program of the ACLU.

Number Of TSA Fines Declined Last Year. USA Today (4/27, Levin, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "The number of passengers fined for security violations at airports fell dramatically last year as the federal government focused on more serious threats, according to records and government officials. The Transportation Security Administration issued 4,459 fines against passengers in 2005, a 54% decrease from 2004. The vast majority of fines are doled out to people trying to bring weapons and other dangerous items on planes."

Since 9/11, Pentagon Has Stepped Up Domestic Surveillance. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, Block, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that the 9/11 terror attacks "have sparked a broad effort by the Pentagon to gather intelligence within US borders. Its goals are both to protect military facilities and keep an eye out for any threat on American soil." The Journal reports that "several parts of the vast Pentagon bureaucracy are building large databases of information from sources including local police, military personnel and the Internet. In doing so, the military is edging toward a sensitive area that has been off-limits to it since the 1970s: domestic surveillance and law enforcement." The Journal adds, "The broad Pentagon effort comes amid a surge of popular support after the 9/11 attacks for more vigilant efforts to prevent terrorism."

Questions Raised About Use Of Private Security Firms On Military Bases. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Marks, 61K) reports that since the 9/11 attacks, some of America's most sensitive military installations have been guarded by private security companies. The installations include "Fort Bragg in North Carolina, the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico, and the Picatinny Arsenal in New Jersey. Now, concerns about accountability and the caliber of the private guards are leading some critics, both inside and outside government, to ask whether this is a job too vital for the military to outsource to civilians." A recent GAO report found that some of the private contractors "had hired felons, had missing and incomplete records, and in one case, had falsified records on weapons and training. … The GAO's conclusion: The Army's screening procedures for the private guards are 'inadequate and put the Army at risk,' despite previous agency warnings about such problems during the past three years."

Bill Would Provide Nearly $1 Billion For Negroponte's Office. The house yesterday passed an intelligence bill that would increase the money available to National Intelligence director John Negroponte. The AP (4/27, Shrader) reports, "Democrats made an unsuccessful, last-minute push to block the bill to protest that Republicans wouldn't allow adequate debate on the legality of the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program. The legislation was nevertheless approved 327-96. It provides budgeting guidelines for 16 U.S. spy agencies and the office of National Intelligence Director John Negroponte. The bill's total cost is classified, but intelligence agencies' spending is believed to top $40 billion a year. Under the legislation, Negroponte's office would get nearly $1 billion."

Rizzo Hearing Likely To Become Forum To Discuss CIA Practices. Newsweek (4/27, Hosenball) reports, "John Rizzo's upcoming confirmation hearing should offer administration critics a forum to discuss controversial practices by the CIA. It's not exactly the full-scale congressional inquiry Bush critics have long demanded. But some time fairly soon, members of the Senate Intelligence Committee are going to have an opportunity to grill a senior Central Intelligence Agency official in public and private about the agency's controversial procedures for handling high-level terrorist suspects—and about the CIA's efforts to thwart media leaks." Newsweek adds that "officials on Capitol Hill and inside the intelligence community said that everyone involved in the confirmation process is aware that the hearings are likely to become a forum in which administration critics, particularly Senate Democrats, can question a senior agency official in detail about contentious CIA procedures for detaining and interrogating prisoners, as well as the agency's practice of 'rendition,' in which terror suspects are transported by undercover agency operatives to foreign countries."

Developer, State Reach Deal On WTC Site. The AP (4/27, Westfeldt) reports that developer Larry Silverstein reached an agreement with New York state officials under which he will give up control over the planned, 1,776-foot Freedom Tower at the World Trade Center cite in New York City. The AP reports, "Officials with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the property, had been pressing Silverstein, who holds the 99-year lease on the site, to give up some control over the project. City and state officials had argued that Silverstein lacked the money to build it all and was running the risk of an embarrassing failure. … Silverstein agreed to give control of the $2.1 billion Freedom Tower and another planned skyscraper to the Port Authority. He will still build three other towers at the site."

NYTimes Praises Silverstein Deal. An editorial in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) calls Silverstein's acceptance of a deal that will reduce his role at ground zero "some of the best news" New York City "had about Lower Manhattan in the past four years." The Times adds, "The widespread relief over this agreement is a perfect testament to how badly blocked the redevelopment effort in Lower Manhattan has been in the last two years. There have been many obstructions, including Mr. Silverstein himself."

Questions Raised About Plans For Ground Zero. The New York Times (4/27, Bagli, 1.19M) reports, "The new plan for ground zero calls for the accelerated construction of a sprawling commercial complex: 8.8 million square feet of office space in four towers 58 to 70 stories high. All would open within a year of each other, by 2012. Gov. George E. Pataki and others say the conceptual plan, officially approved yesterday by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey after months of gridlock, will rejuvenate Lower Manhattan and ensure that it remains the financial capital of the world." However some construction and real estate industry executives "are questioning whether the rapid building of so much speculative office space would have the same destabilizing consequences for the downtown market as the twin towers had in the 1970's."

Film On United Flight 93 Premieres. NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 9, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Something extraordinary happened a few blocks from here in New York City last night. It was the premiere at the Ziegfeld Theater of the new film called 'United 93.' First, an important point here -- the film's distributor is Universal and our parent company is NBC Universal and this could not be less about selling tickets." When "the film came to its jolting stop, the theater was filled with the eerie and awful and achingly sad sound of people crying, heaving with emotion, the sobs and moans from those who were overpowered by what they had just seen. A thousand people then left the theater in silence."

Father Of Flight 93 Passenger Praises "United 93." David Beamer, father of Todd Beamer, a passenger on United Airlines Flight 93, writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) that the makers of "United 93," the film about the passengers and crew of United Flight 93 who fought back against the terrorists who hijacked their plane on 9/11, "set about the task of telling this story with a genuine intent to get it right -- the actions of those on board and honor their memory. Their extensive research included reaching out to all the families who had lost loved ones on United Flight 93 as the first casualties of this war. And Paul and his team got it right."

Beamer adds, "This film further reminds us of the nature of the enemy we face. An enemy who will stop at nothing to achieve world domination and force a life devoid of freedom upon all. … I encourage my fellow Americans and free people everywhere to see 'United 93.'"

Senate Panel Says FEMA Should Be Dismantled, Rebuilt. The Washington Post (4/27, Hsu, 744K) reports the final report on the response to Hurricane Katrina by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, titled "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," finds that the storm "exposed flaws in the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Department of Homeland Security that are 'too substantial to mend,' and FEMA should be dismantled and rebuilt inside the troubled department." It "makes 86 recommendations that would undo major changes made when President Bush and Congress launched the department in 2003, and would reverse parts of a reorganization ordered by Secretary Michael Chertoff last summer." Meanwhile, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman "added a written statement excoriating Bush and his aides for being 'surprisingly detached' before and just after the storm and for not cooperating with Senate investigators, who he said should have subpoenaed the White House."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (4/27, Shields) reports that "FEMA spokesman Russ Knocke" said the agency is "intensely focused on the coming storm season." Meanwhile, White House spokesman Blair C. Jones "disagreed" with Lieberman's statement that Bush and his aides were "surprisingly detached," "noting that administration officials such as Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff appeared before the committee."

The AP (4/27) reports that the report is "short on specifics, such as funding levels," but suggests "the US is still woefully unprepared for a disaster of Katrina's magnitude." It "urges yet another overhaul of the beleaguered Homeland Security Department -- FEMA's parent agency -- which was created three years ago and already has undergone major restructuring of duties and responsibilities. It proposes creating a new agency, called the National Preparedness and Response Authority, that would plan and carry out relief missions for domestic disasters" and have "a direct line of communication with the president during major crises."

A separate AP (4/27, Jordan) report says the report's "86 proposed reforms charge the United States is still woefully unprepared for a disaster such as Katrina with the start of the hurricane season a little more than month away. 'The United States was, and is, ill-prepared to respond to a catastrophic event of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina,' the recommendations warn."

USA Today (4/27, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "Homeland Security said a new agency is not needed. 'It is time to stop playing around with organizational charts and start focusing on how governments at all levels are preparing for the fast-approaching storm season,' spokesman Russ Knocke said. Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the committee, said the investigation revealed broad leadership lapses." The same quote from Knocke appears in the New York Times, Jordan's AP piece and the Los Angeles Times.

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Neuman, 958K) adds that "FEMA had been an independent -- and highly regarded -- agency until March 2003, when the Department of Homeland Security was created in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times notes, "The release of the Senate committee's 800-page report comes as Bush travels to Louisiana on Thursday and as agencies grapple with being ready for the official start of hurricane season on June 1."

The New York Times (4/27, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Bruce Baughman, the director of emergency management for the state of Alabama and the president of the National Emergency Management Association, said that despite the bureaucratic-sounding nature of the Senate committee's draft recommendations, he believed they would create a more capable agency. 'Whatever the hell you call it, FEMA or National Preparedness and Response Authority, it does not matter,' Mr. Baughman said. 'But what this does is it ties all the pieces together.'" USA Today (4/27, Hall, 2.31M) and the Los Angeles Times (4/27, Neuman, 958K) file a similar reports.

GAO Says FEMA Is Likely To Repeat Disaster Aid Mistakes. GAO Investigators say FEMA is likely to repeat mistakes of disaster aid waste and fraud this hurricane season unless it can establish controls for verifying names and addresses. The AP (4/27, Yen) reports that the GAO's managing director of special investigations Gregory Kurtz "said he has little confidence that FEMA will be ready by June 1 to safeguard taxpayer dollars should a major disaster like Hurricane Katrina strike again." The AP adds, "Responding to the audit, FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said Wednesday that FEMA officials have been working hard to improve and tighten controls in its disaster aid program."

FEMA Ending Housing Grants For Many Evacuees. The New York Times (4/27, Dewan, 1.19M) reports that FEMA is telling thousands of hurricane evacuees that they are no longer eligible for free housing and utilities and must either begin paying rent themselves or leave. According to the Times, "Of about 55,000 families who were given long-term housing vouchers, nearly a third are receiving notices that they no longer qualify, FEMA officials said. For the rest, benefits are also being cut: they will have to sign new leases, pay their own gas and electric bills and requalify for rental assistance every three months." The Times notes that many had been counting on "a year of free housing and utilities."

Nagin, FEMA Reach Agreement On Trailers. The AP (4/27) reports that New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and federal officials have revived efforts "to place thousands of trailers throughout the city as stopgap housing for people who lost their homes during Hurricane Katrina. Three weeks ago Nagin halted work on new trailer sites, complaining that the Federal Emergency Management Agency used 'bullying' tactics and built a site outside a gated community without the proper permits. On Wednesday, Nagin and FEMA officials announced that they had bridged their differences." The AP adds, "Officials hope to install about 8,000 trailers by the end of June."

Insurers Canceling Homeowners' Policies In Hurricane Vulnerable Areas. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 10, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Last year's disastrous hurricane season cost insurers a record $60 billion. Now, with a new season approaching, they're looking to cut their risk. In Florida, insurers are serving notice they plan to cancel 500,000 policies. In New York State, Allstate is canceling 28,000 policies and won't write new policies in New York and its suburbs. And in Texas, Allstate says no new policies in 14 coastal counties."

Hurricane Victims Claim Mistreatment By Mortgage Lenders. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Bauerlein, 2.11M) reports, "As homeowners along the Gulf Coast try to recover from the devastation of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, some say mortgage lenders are refusing to turn over insurance proceeds while demanding immediate payment on overdue loans. Hurricane victims in Louisiana and Mississippi have filed nearly 1,000 complaints with state regulators claiming mistreatment by mortgage lenders. About 800 of the complaints have been resolved, often as a result of mediation initiated by regulators."

Democrats Blast FEMA's Handling Of Gulf Coast Schools. The Washington Times (4/27, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Putting the Federal Emergency Management Agency in charge of rebuilding and reopening schools on the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina was a critical mistake, congressional Democrats on the House Education and the Workforce Committee said yesterday. … The Democrats issued a report asserting that eight months after the storm hit the region, its schools remain in crisis. The lawmakers called for the creation of an education-recovery czar to oversee the reopening of Gulf Coast schools and colleges."

Army Corps Of Engineers Surveying New Orleans Levees For Weaknesses. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 11, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "In New Orleans, engineers are doing a risk assessment of their own, trying to determine whether the levees will hold." CBS (Strassmann) added, "Only now, just five weeks before New Orleans faces another hurricane season, the US Army Corps of Engineers is finally doing what thousands of residents have demanded ever since Katrina hit seven months ago: A detailed survey of every inch of the levees and floodwalls that are this city's only hope." Just last week, "the Corps discovered more trouble: A floodwall supposed to protect the city's airport. It's being replaced like miles of levees damaged by Katrina. But design flaws may compromise the entire system, including 181 miles of levees and floodwalls that held during Katrina. Even the American Society of Civil Engineers says the system is 'open to question' and 'too close to the margin' to protect human life."

WAR NEWS:

Rice, Rumsfeld Offer Support To New Iraqi Government. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld yesterday made an unannounced visit to Baghdad in a show of support for the new Iraqi government led by Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Malaki. The story was reported on both ABC and CBS in full segments, while NBC mentioned it in a brief. Their trip was also covered in the major US newspapers.

ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 3, 2:00, Brown, 8.78M) reported, "Secretaries Rumsfeld and Rice praised the political progress there." Secretary Rice: "We are focused on the success of this Iraqi government." Brown: "And they said there is progress on the military front, as well. Secretary Rumsfeld started the day at a training center for Iraqi army recruits." Secretary Rumsfeld: "It's appropriate for us to begin the discussions with the new government, about the conditions on the ground and the pace at which we'll be able to turn over responsibility." Brown: "Privately, officials at the Pentagon tell ABC News, they hope is to reduce the number of US troops in Iraq to 100,000 by the end of the year."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 8, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It was a show of support for the government Iraqi leaders are trying to put together. Otherwise, it was a day like so many other days in Iraq. At least 20 civilians and police died in bombings and other violence, and American forces killed 13 people when they raided what was described as a an insurgent hideout." CBS (Assuras) added, "The top two US foreign policy officials made surprise landings in Baghdad only a few hours apart, and then joined up in a well-choreographed show of support for Iraq's emerging government." NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 5, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Both were there to show support for Iraq's new designated prime minister."

The New York Times (4/27, Weisman, Cloud, 1.19M) reports that the two sought to "press the prime minister-designate to re-establish public confidence in the government and rid the country's security forces of infiltration by sectarian militias." While Rice said that removing the militias' influence is "clearly one of the high priorities for the government," she added, "How they go about that I think is something they will have to work through." In her entourage, "there was an atmosphere that the joint visit might offer a last chance to reverse some of the mistakes of the past three years." Rice and Rumsfeld sought to "put the past differences between the departments behind them by emphasizing that they would be working more cooperatively to bolster the Iraqi government."

The Wall Street Journal (4/27, A4, Dreazen, 2.11M) calls the visit "a concerted diplomatic effort to capitalize on the selection of Iraq's new prime minister." The Washington Post (4/27, A16, Kessler, 744K) says the visit aimed to make clear "that the sometimes disjointed U.S. political and military operations are working seamlessly during the transition to a permanent government." Rice called "the creation of a permanent government…a turning point in the war and 'an important message to the American people.'" Government officials "indicated that they were embracing perhaps the last chance the Bush administration had to turn around public opinion at home and to ensure that Iraq has a viable political future."

The AP (4/27, Gearan, Burns) adds that the two secretaries "embraced the country's fledgling leaders as independent and focused on the future." Rice said that al-Maliki's priorities and commitment are "refreshing and really heartening." The story also notes that the visit "was meant to resonate in Iraq and among Americans."

The Washington Times (4/27, Kralev, 90K) reports, "The unprecedented joint visit by the top two Cabinet officials demonstrated Washington's full backing of Nouri al-Maliki." Rumsfeld said, "I came away most encouraged." Rice said, "I found him to be very focused and very clear that he understood his role and the role of the new government to really demonstrate that it is a government of national unity."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Roug, Richter, 958K) reports that the visit by Rice and Rumsfeld "drew criticism from Iraqi politicians who said they feared the unannounced visit might do more harm than good." The Times notes, "'We didn't invite them,' said Kamal Saadi, a Shiite legislator close to the new prime minister-designate, Nouri Maliki." He "said Iraqi leaders had not been given advance notice of the visit, which came just days after Iraqi politicians broke through a months-long impasse on the selection of a prime minister."

Rice Says US Is Prepared To Support Iraq's Government. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice discussed her trip to Iraq on CNN's The Situation Room (4/26), saying, "We first wanted to bring a message that President Bush asked us to bring, which is that we are ready to support this government and support it fully. But supporting it fully means that we have to make certain that the United States government is really ready to do that, and so we are here to look at those issues that are at that nexus of political and military. There are many now. The security issues here even have both a political element and a military element. We are here to look at Defense Department operations, and I'm looking at embassy operations to make sure that we're really properly organized to help this government hit the ground running, because, clearly, they are ready to show the Iraqi people that it's going to be a different day."

GOP Lawmakers Resigned To Dealing With Rumsfeld. The Los Angeles Times/AP (4/27, Sidoti) reports, "Senate Republican critics of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld are deferring to President Bush's support for the Pentagon chief, mindful that his fate is out of their hands." Yet "those GOP lawmakers remain uncomfortable with him. Given the chance, they offer no words of support." Sen. John McCain said, "He still is in the confidence of the president. The president reiterated that the other day, so I'll continue to try to work with him."

Iraqis Complain Little To Show For US Reconstruction Effort. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 9, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "After security and a stable government, what Iraq needs most is rebuilding. Since the US invasion, infrastructure that was neglected by Saddam Hussein has been battered by constant attack and American reconstruction efforts have been hampered by mismanagement and corruption." CBS (Dozier) added, "Plenty has been done in many parts of Iraq, thanks to $20 billion US tax dollars. Almost half of that has already been spent, but Iraqis complain there is little to show for it: $1.6 billion has gone to electricity projects, but there's less daily power now than before the war; $390 million has gone to water projects, but fewer Iraqis have clean water now than before; and half a billion dollars has gone to oil infrastructure, but production has stagnated, mostly because of terrorist attacks. So much for the Bush Administration's promise that oil revenues would pay for the rebuilding of Iraq. Twenty five percent of the US construction budget now goes to security, which means the money is running out faster."

NYTimes Criticizes No Bid Halliburton Contract In Iraq. An editorial in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) says, "The Bush administration's promise that Iraq's reconstruction could be paid for with the country's own oil revenues was one of the many false assertions and assurances that ushered in the invasion. But unlike the predictions of weapons of mass destruction and streets filled with cheering Iraqis, this claim might have been at least partly true -- if the administration had more carefully supervised the lucrative no-bid oil industry repair contract it awarded to a subsidiary of Halliburton, the firm formerly headed by Vice President Dick Cheney." The Times adds, "On the Fatah pipeline crossing project, American taxpayers got a particularly raw deal. The repair work they originally paid for wasn't done. The government agency that was supposed to supervise the work did not do an effective job. And the oil exports that could have helped pay Iraq's reconstruction bills never made it through the pipeline."

Many Iraqis Believe Zarqawi Is Trying To Destroy Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Murphy, 61K) reports that Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who "stepped out of the shadows with a video released on the Internet Tuesday," is "seen as a mythical figure by many Iraqis, a fiction designed to spread fear and put a face on the Sunni Arab insurgents who have spread so much terror here." Thalib Jabbar, a businessman in Baghdad said, "Zarqawi wants to show his power and frighten people. But in reality, he's the one who should be afraid. We want him dead." According to the Monitor, that is "a common sentiment among many ordinary Iraqis, one played on by Iraqi officials Wednesday who condemned Zarqawi as a foreigner trying to destroy their country. Their strong response highlights the risk such a video poses for Zarqawi: The effort to show his strength within the insurgency also puts a foreign face on the movement, leaving an opening for his opponents to appeal to national unity."

The AP (4/27, Frayer) reports that Zarqawi's latest video "marks a shift by the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq toward a less radical image, one that might appeal to the Iraqi insurgency more than the beheadings for which he's become notorious, analysts said Wednesday."

WPost Says Video Is A Sign Of Good News In War On Terror. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/27, A26, 744K) says, "The appearance of an al-Qaeda video on the Internet more often than not is a sign of good news in the war on terrorism. Tuesday's posting by Iraqi commander Abu Musab al-Zarqawi is the latest example: The 34-minute show by the newly unhooded extremist is in part a bid for advantage in factional feuding that has curtailed al-Qaeda's visibility and effectiveness." The Post adds, "The administration and U.S. commanders are clearly eager to find reasons to draw down troops from the current total of 132,500 by the fall. … But so far Iraq's slow political progress has had no impact on the violence, which has been growing steadily worse. Before welcoming Iraq's new government by pulling out tens of thousands of soldiers, President Bush ought to carefully consider whether that is the best way to achieve the victory he says he seeks."

Hamas, Sudan Distance Themselves From Bin Laden. The Palestinian group Hamas and the government of Sudan both sought to distance themselves from Osama bin Laden in the wake of his latest audio tape. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Bright, 61K) reports, "Al Jazeera reports that shortly after it broadcast bin Laden's message on Sunday, Sami Abu Zuhri, a spokesman for Hamas, declared that Hamas's ideology was 'totally different' from bin Laden's. … The Associated Press reports that, like Hamas, the Sudanese government distanced itself from bin Laden's statements, saying, 'We are not concerned with such statements, or any other statement that comes from foreign quarters about the crisis in Darfur.'"

US Forces Strike Suspected Insurgent Safehouse. The AP (4/27, Keath) reports that the US military said Wednesday that US forces truck a suspected safehouse of foreign insurgents, "killing 12 militants and a woman in a raid near the site where an American helicopter crashed." Coalition forces 'hit the suspected safehouse Tuesday in Youssifiyah, 12 miles south of Baghdad, near where a U.S. Apache helicopter crashed April 1. The U.S. command said the helicopter was believed to have been shot down."

Baghdad Residents Construct Makeshift Roadblocks. The AP (4/27, Castaneda) reports that Baghdad residents have become to construct makeshift roadblocks in an effort to protect their homes from makeshift violence. The AP notes that in some areas, "the majority of streets are blocked off or protected by homemade barriers that slow traffic. Some barriers have been in place for over a year in both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods. But many more have appeared since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra that ignited a wave of sectarian violence and left the country struggling to defuse another crisis." The AP adds, "Some of the barriers are sophisticated, built in curved 'serpentine' shapes that allow traffic to pass at a reduced speed. Residents said this would allow them to fire back at roaming militants trying to gun down pedestrians."

Questions Raised About Battle In Baghdad's Adhamiya District. Time (4/26, Ware) reports, "When Baghdad's notorious Adhamiya district exploded in vicious gun battles last week, few were really surprised. … The basic facts of the battle are not in dispute. … The question is exactly what triggered this battle and who fought it. Sunni community leaders claim that local residents grabbed whatever weapons they had to defend their homes from a sectarian attack by Shi'ite militias in government uniforms. … However, American officers say the men they ended up fighting weren't mere homeowners. They used the fire and movement techniques of trained soldiers."

Abuse Charges Expected Against Abu Ghraib Colonel. The AP (4/27, Jelinek) reports that the Army is expected to formally charge Lt. Col. Steven Jordan with criminal offenses in connection with the abuse of prisoners at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. Formal charges are expected against Jordan next week. The AP reports that charges against Jordan "would make him the highest-ranking officer charged in the case, three defense officials said. They spoke only on condition of anonymity because Jordan had not yet been charged. They did not say specifically what the charges might be."

Report Says Hundreds Of Iraqi Detainees Were Abused. A report issued yesterday by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch has found credible evidence that at least 460 detainees were abused, tortured or killed by US troops and government civilians in Iraq. Knight Ridder (4/27, Brown) reports, "The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved." Knight Ridder adds, "The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers."

Iraqis Move To Hide Sunni Names. USA Today (4/27, Jervis, Sabah, 2.31M) reports, "Iraqis in Baghdad named Omar or Othman — two of the most recognizable names identified with Sunni Islam — are getting fake IDs, changing their names legally in court, even teaching their young children to say more neutral-sounding names if asked." USA adds, "The rush to mask identities underscores the increased sectarian tensions in Iraq since February's bombing of a sacred Shiite mosque in Samarra. The attack led to reprisals by Shiite gunmen and continuing violence between Sunnis and Shiites."

Shanghai Cooperation Organization To Conduct Anti-Terror Exercises. The Washington Post (4/27, A20, Cody, 744K) reports that China, Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan yesterday announced plans to hold "joint anti-terrorism exercises next year, emphasizing a desire to balance U.S. military influence in Asia with stepped-up preparations of their own." The activities of the regional security grouping, known as the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, said in a communiqué that "next year's exercises will be held in Russia. They did not detail what activities were planned."

US Seeks To Improve Security At Afghan Base. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Barnes, 958K) reports, "The Army's chief of staff said Wednesday that he was frustrated by security lapses at Bagram air base in Afghanistan that led to the loss of potentially sensitive data, and that the military must learn how to be more careful with new technology." Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker "said the Army was trying to improve how soldiers used and secured flash drives." The Times adds, "U.S. military officials have been vague about the steps they are taking to improve security practices in Afghanistan and throughout the armed forces."

Slain Reporter's Family Says US Targeted Journalists. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Wilkinson, Zucchino, 958K) reports on a Spanish cameraman who was killed by US fire in Baghdad. Jose Couso was killed when a US tank fired a high-explosive round into the side of his hotel believing an enemy spotter was on the balcony. The tank gunner "said he had been stung by Couso family contentions that his unit targeted journalists, and by their lawsuit accusing him and two officers of war crimes and murder. His wife received threatening phone calls after the incident, he said."

Lawsuit Alleges DOD Is Illegally Using A Recruitment Database. The AP (4/27) reports the New York Civil Liberties Union, in a federal lawsuit, claims that "the Defense Department is violating the privacy of millions of high school students nationwide with a detailed database it uses for military recruitment." It says they are "ignoring privacy rules set by Congress regarding the collection and distribution of students' personal information" by "flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private."

Gonzales Announces Anti-Gang Grant For Tampa. The Tampa Tribune (4/27, McCartney) reports, "Saying gangs represent a threat to the 'American dream,' U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced a $2.5 million grant to combat the spread of gangs in Hillsborough County." The Tribune continues, "Gonzales spent about half a day in Tampa and Hillsborough County, touring the site of a suspected gang shooting that killed two people in February and the shooting of a deputy with a BB gun days later. … But Gonzales' tour of Tampa and northwest Hillsborough County touched on numerous other topics, including opportunity, education and immigration. … He spoke to a group of students at Leto High School, who he said were curious about his security detail, immigration and whether he had any presidential ambitions. (He didn't indicate any to a group of reporters later.)" … Gonzales acknowledged that the Tampa Bay area is not a hub of gang activity that other cities awarded the grant are, but said even one gang member poses a threat to the community."

WUSF AM , Tampa (4/27, Ingram) reports, "Gonzales also met with local law enforcement and community leaders. … He says the anti gang grant will be used on education, law enforcement and community re-integration programs for former felons."

Heaton Named US Attorney For Central Illinois. The Springfield (IL) State Journal-Register (4/27, Schoenburg) reports, "Rodger Heaton, interim U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, is President Bush's choice to continue as the top prosecutor in the region, The State Journal-Register has learned. … 'The White House has made the decision,' according to a local Republican source." The Journal-Register continues, "Copley News Service reported last week that the three people whose names had been forwarded to the White House by House Speaker Dennis Hastert and GOP congressional colleagues were: Heaton; Darin LaHood, the son of U.S. Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Peoria; and John Michelich, an Auburn native who works for the U.S. Department of Justice." The Journal-Register adds, "Sharon Paul, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield, said Heaton considers it a privilege to be serving in his current position. He is 'hopeful he'll be nominated, but as yet he hasn't been notified of any decision,' she said Tuesday. … Heaton, 46, was appointed to the interim post as of Dec. 1 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Heaton replaced U.S. Attorney Jan Paul Miller, who took a job with a St. Louis law firm."

DOJ Moves Toward More Inclusive Case Management System. Government Computer News (4/27, Miller) reports, "While the Justice Department was bogged down in awarding a $305 million contract for its do-over case management system called Sentinel, the Line of Business Consolidation initiative for a similar effort was treading water. … But with Sentinel awarded earlier this year to Lockheed Martin Corp., the Office of Management and Budget is pushing Justice to include all agencies under the LOB umbrella." GCN continues, "For litigation case management, Justice, which completed the target architecture in fiscal 2005, now will work with any agency that is involved with litigation, according to an administration official familiar with the LOB. … These agencies include the Environmental Protection Agency, IRS, Securities and Exchange Commission and many more. … 'We know it's more than just the Justice Department and we want to make sure whoever is going forward with a litigation system either builds onto or adds to the Justice system,' the official said. 'If we are going to build many times, we want to use a similar architecture so the systems can share information and components easily.' … Justice and OMB held a meeting last week to develop the plan with new LOB program manger Paul Garrett, who took over for Price Roe in March."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Angry Lay Trades Barbs With Federal Prosecutor At Enron Trial. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "Under hard questioning by a federal prosecutor, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay admitted that he probably violated the company's code of ethics and had to fend off accusations of hypocrisy and attempted witness tampering." The Journal continues, "The confrontation with prosecutor John Hueston came as the government began its questioning after Mr. Lay spent nearly three days testifying in his own defense. The two men clashed sharply as Mr. Hueston pushed to ruffle the usually affable Mr. Lay. … The witness angrily denied Mr. Hueston's allegations that calls he made as recently as this month to potential trial witnesses were attempts to improperly influence them to agree with his version of events. 'You are distorting the phrase "in agreement with my story,"; Mr. Lay shot back, adding that, 'I don't have a story.' Mr. Lay said he made the calls to educate himself and confirm his own recollections of events." The Journal notes, "The possible ethics-code violation concerned a $120,000 investment Mr. Lay made in a private Internet company called PhotoFete.com Inc. The PhotoFete issue first arose during the testimony of Mr. Lay's co-defendant, Jeffrey Skilling, who had made about a $160,000 investment in the firm, which did about $450,000 of business with Enron. Messrs. Lay and Skilling were supposed to notify Enron's board about the potential conflict of interest."

The Washington Post (4/27, D1, Johnson) reports that Lay "grew furious at the government attack, pointing his finger and answering questions from…Hueston in an increasingly aggressive tone." The Post continues, "Hueston began his presentation by throwing back at Lay a quote from his own lawyer's opening statement three months ago: 'By our deeds we are known.' The prosecutor followed up with unrelenting questions designed to cast doubt on actions Lay took before the energy trader hurtled into bankruptcy protection in December 2001."

The New York Times (4/27, Barrionuevo, Romero) reports that Lay "lost his legendary cool on the witness stand Wednesday." The Times continues, "Just minutes into his cross-examination by… Hueston, Mr. Lay…testily accused…Hueston of personally preventing him from repaying a company credit line Mr. Lay had used to shore up his personal finances. … 'Mr. Hueston, you know you blocked it,' Mr. Lay said, his voice booming. 'It's a simple answer.'" The Times notes, "Before he took the stand, a number of legal experts had predicted that Mr. Lay would use the same folksy charm he employed during his heyday as the public face of Enron to seek to win over the 12 jurors deciding his fate in the criminal fraud trial here. But during his three days so far as a witness, Mr. Lay has found it harder and harder to maintain a kindly grandfatherly image. … Instead, Mr. Lay,… has become increasingly agitated, at times reacting impatiently even to his own lawyer, George McCall Secrest Jr., and lashing out at what Mr. Lay portrayed as a cabal of former Enron executives, investors and journalists whom he repeatedly blamed for the company's downfall in late 2001."

The AP (4/27, Hays) reports that Lay "dropped his affable persona as his cross-examination began Wednesday, snarling at a prosecutor who accused him of witness tampering when Lay called several potential witnesses during his fraud and conspiracy trial. … Jurors who had been listening impassively snapped to attention. … 'Did you have any conversations to get your story straight for trial?' asked prosecutor John Hueston. … 'Can you elaborate on that Mr. Hueston?' Lay shot back. 'I'm not sure what story you're talking about.' … The prosecutor noted that Lay called two Goldman Sachs & Co. executives during the trial regarding a September 2001 meeting about Enron. … Former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow - whom Lay has dubbed a traitor, liar and crook - testified that he and Lay met with the executives to discuss restructuring Enron at the same time Lay was telling employees and reporters that the company was sound. Lay says the executives called the meeting to discuss Enron's vulnerability to a takeover. … Lay said he called the executives in March - the same month Fastow testified - but he said he did not try to align their memories of the meeting with his."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rove Makes Fifth Grand Jury Appearance In Plame Investigation. Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl Rove yesterday appeared before the grand jury investigating the leak of undercover CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity for the fifth time. The story was the lead on CBS and NBC, bumping coverage of the announcement Fox News commentator Tony Snow was joining the Administration as press secretary, while ABC ran a brief mention later in its newscast. It also garnered front page coverage in the Washington Post and New York Times.

The Washington Post (4/27, A1, Vandehei, 744K) in a front page story offers the most new details on Rove's testimony and says that he left the court house "unsure whether he would be indicted, according to a source close to the presidential aide." He "spent considerable time arguing that it would have been foolish for him to knowingly mislead investigators about his role in the disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media, the source said. His grand jury appearance, which was kept secret even from Rove's closest White House colleagues until shortly before he went to court yesterday, suggests that prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald remains keenly interested in Rove's role in the case." And "Rove for the first time partly waived his attorney-client privilege to detail conversations he had with his attorney, Robert Luskin, about the leak and his knowledge of it, the source said."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported Rove's appearance "makes it crystal clear that the special prosecutor's investigation is still very much alive, and that Karl Rove is very much under a cloud of suspicion." But his attorney, Robert Luskin, "said prosecutors had assured them that in connection with this appearance, Rove was not a target of investigation. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald apparently wanted to question Rove more about his conversations with reporters right before CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity was revealed in the press." The news "just couldn't come at a worse time for the President."

NBC Nightly News (4/26, lead story, 3:00, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The question is whether Rove only remembered the conversation later in this investigation or whether he tried to hide it. A former prosecutor says special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald remains skeptical." Tom Connolly, former Federal prosecutor: "I think it means that Fitzgerald is unwilling to take Mr. Rove's lawyer's word that Mr. Rove made a mistake in previous testimony." Gregory: "His lawyer said today Rove testified 'voluntarily' at the request of the special prosecutor, adding that Fitzgerald said Rove 'is not a target of the investigation.'"

On ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 4, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M), Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said, "Well, fifth time. That's the key. Criminal lawyers will tell you that five appearances before a grand jury is highly unusual. And a sign that you're in some legal jeopardy. But Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, told me that Fitzgerald assured him his client is not a target. He's made no decisions yet."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/25, Blitzer) reported Rove's fifth appearance is "spurring new speculation that Rove could become the second White House figure possibly to be indicted in the leak case." CNN (King) added that it is "highly unusual to be called for a fifth time before the federal grand jury. Sources sympathetic to Rove are saying they believe this could lead to the resolution. From their accounts, they say the special prosecutor has a few lingering questions in their view about Rove's account of exactly why he didn't tell the full story in his first grand jury testimony about conversations with reporters."

The New York Times (4/27, A1, Kornblut, 1.19M) in a front page story reports Fitzgerald "did not comment about calling Mr. Rove to testify, and no one involved in the case said they clearly understood its status. It did not appear that there would be any immediate resolution for Mr. Rove, who has spent months defending himself against assertions that his legal troubles are distracting him from his White House duties." Meanwhile, "Democrats pounced on the turn of events, one of several controversies they hope to capitalize on in the fall elections." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "This additional Rove visit clearly shows that the Plame investigation is far from over and that Patrick Fitzgerald is living up to his reputation as an impartial, dedicated prosecutor determined to turn over every stone."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Schmitt, Hamburger, 958K) notes, "As the White House was introducing a new press secretary in an effort to put a new face on a troubled administration, Rove testified for three hours before the grand jury." The shift in Rove's portfolio "helped inoculate the White House against Rove's latest appearance before the grand jury. If Rove is indicted and forced to resign, the White House can say that Rove's substantive policy responsibilities have already been transferred."

Lawyer Says Rove Is Not A Target Of Fitzgerald's Investigation. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, King) reported, "We do, though, have a statement from Rove attorney Robert Luskin. He says this: 'Karl Rove appeared today before the grand jury investigating the disclosure of a CIA agent's identity. He testified voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance in October 2005. In connection with his appearance, the special counsel has advised Mr. Rove that he is not a target of the investigation. Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges. At the request of the special counsel, Mr. Rove will not discuss the substance of his testimony."

Allen Downplays Concerns That Rove Is A Liability. Sen. George Allen was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (4/26) if he is concerned that Rove will be a liability for the White House going into this year's elections. Allen said, "Karl Rove has a proven track record of success for this President as well as for other candidates, and so I think he's going to be focused on politics and campaigns and he's been awfully good at it and he has a great track record of winning." Asked if Rove's fifth appearance before the grand jury is a distraction for Republicans and the White House, Allen said, "Karl Rove is somebody who I've worked with in the past when I was chairman of the Republican Senate Campaign Committee, and I really do admire his knowledge and I think the President also has a great deal of confidence invested in him."

Defense Lawyer Accuses Federal Investigators Of Spying On Pellicano. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Krikorian, Weinstein, Blankstein, 958K) reports Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano "has accused the federal government of spying on him in prison through a secret arrangement with his then-girlfriend." Pellicano lawyer Steven Gruel "filed motions this week in federal court saying Sandra Wil Carradine provided FBI agents and prosecutors with a 'fountain of information' after a series of jailhouse visits late last year, giving them insights into the lawyer's legal strategy and violating his attorney-client privilege." The Times adds, "In mid-December, Gruel says in the motions, Carradine told FBI Special Agent Stan Ornellas…that Pellicano was attempting to hire the attorney, making it 'likely that the government knew of Mr. Pellicano's interest in my representation even before I did.' Carradine also told Ornellas of Pellicano's interest in calling a particular defense witness, enabling the FBI to contact the person before Pellicano's defense did, according to Gruel." The California Recorder (4/27, Scheck) notes, "Based on discovery turned over by prosecutors and evidence gathered on his own, Gruel's filings challenge the FBI's reasons for initially searching the detective's office. … The warrant, which was obtained in connection with a threat made to former L.A. Times reporter Anita Busch, 'was a subterfuge,' Gruel wrote. … He argues that agents were actually seeking evidence of illegal wiretaps -- particularly a recording of an FBI agent -- but didn't have probable cause to get a warrant for such material."

The California Recorder (4/27, Scheck) reports, "Steven Gruel has long contended that the feds were out to get his client, the celebrity private eye Anthony Pellicano, well before they executed a 2003 search warrant that resulted in Pellicano's conviction on explosives charges -- and a protracted federal investigation aimed at some of Hollywood's biggest lawyers." The Recorder continues, "In court papers filed late Tuesday, Gruel, a former San Francisco federal prosecutor, gave the most detailed peek yet into how he plans to support that claim. He also outlined his contention that prosecutors improperly used Pellicano's girlfriend as an informant to pry into the detective's defense strategy. … All of the arguments are aimed at getting more discovery out of Los Angeles federal prosecutors and ultimately, Gruel said, getting the indictment tossed." The Recorder adds, "Based on discovery turned over by prosecutors and evidence gathered on his own, Gruel's filings challenge the FBI's reasons for initially searching the detective's office. … The warrant, which was obtained in connection with a threat made to former L.A. Times reporter Anita Busch, 'was a subterfuge,' Gruel wrote. … He argues that agents were actually seeking evidence of illegal wiretaps -- particularly a recording of an FBI agent -- but didn't have probable cause to get a warrant for such material."

Kidman-Cruise Recording Among Items Found By FBI At Pellicano Office. The New York Daily News (4/27, 729K) reports, "A recording of a phone call between Nicole Kidman and Tom Cruise was just one of the treasures the FBI found in the 'War Room' of jailed private eye Anthony Pellicano, according to the June Vanity Fair, now online. Kidman took to joking to friends during calls, 'So, Tom, are you listening? Am I saying what you want me to say?' … Both stars have been questioned by the FBI, according to the story by top investigators Bryan Burrough and John Connolly, who is writing a book about the P.I."

Thirteen-Year FBI International Manhunt Led To Fugitive Molester's Arrest. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Griggs, 958K) reports, "For nearly 13 years, law enforcement officials tried to bring convicted child molester Channa Pryia Ruberoe to justice. Now, Ruberoe, convicted in Ventura in 1993 of three counts of lewd acts against his stepdaughter, is behind bars." Ruberoe's "circuitous route through Europe and southern Asia and the dogged pursuit by investigators with the Ventura County district attorney's office and the local FBI office rival the plot of a spy novel." The Times adds that Superior Court Judge Don Coleman said yesterday, "The FBI and their international law enforcement contacts are the real heroes in this story." The Times notes, "Last week, Ruberoe was given the maximum sentence of 12 years."

Federal Prosecutors Considering New Charges Against Gotti. The New York Daily News (4/26, Zambito, 729K) reported that on Tuesday, "the feds raised the ante against John (Junior) Gotti…by telling a judge they may yet charge the mob scion -- and his little brother -- with new crimes. Prosecutors say they're looking into Gotti's transfer of ownership of his Long Island mansion to his wife, Kim, at a time when the government was trying to seize the property because it was bought with mob money. The government also is taking aim at brother Peter, citing testimony at Junior's recent trial that prosecutors believe could link the younger Gotti to possible crimes." The New York Post (4/26, Cornell, 624K) noted, "Prosecutors publicly disclosed that admissions by Gotti are 'a basis' for their sweeping investigation in a letter to Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin…as they defended sending subpoenas to witnesses who recently testified for Gotti. … Defense lawyer Charles Carnesi declined to comment, but the letter from prosecutors shows Gotti's attorneys have privately denied he 'admitted significant information about criminal activity in which he and others were involved.'"

Prosecutors Say Reputed Gambino Capo Exaggerating Illnesses To Avoid Trial. The New York Post (4/27, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Reputed Gambino acting capo Greg DePalma has borrowed a page from the notorious Mafia boss Vincent 'Chin' Gigante by pretending he's too sick to stand trial, prosecutors charge. Defense lawyer John Meringolo is expected to argue in Manhattan federal court today that DePalma, 73, is near death due to lung cancer, heart disease and other ailments -- and incapacitated by more than 20 medications he takes daily. But prosecutors are skeptical and have asked Judge Alvin Hellerstein to keep his racketeering trial scheduled for May 8." The Post notes, "The feds' court papers claim DePalma 'exaggerated the severity' of his illness to get a reduced sentence in 1999 and to 'garner sympathy' at a 2001 murder conspiracy trial. … As soon as DePalma hit the streets in February 2003, after finishing out a prison term, he got right back to mob business, prosecutors say."

Judge Bars Juror Background Checks In Chicago Corruption Trial. The AP (4/27, Robinson) reports, "A federal judge barred prosecutors Wednesday from conducting criminal background checks on prospective jurors in the upcoming trial of Mayor Richard M. Daley's one-time patronage chief and three other former city officials." The AP continues, "Prosecutors notified the judge that they planned to make such checks before jury selection gets under way May 10. But U.S. District Judge David H. Coar said such checks could have a 'coercive effect' if jurors found out. … 'Absent some showing that it would be appropriate or necessary, I don't think as a matter of policy any party ought to be allowed to conduct criminal background checks of the jurors,' the judge said." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors planned to look into the prospective jurors' backgrounds following the corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan. In the Ryan case, two jurors were removed in the middle of deliberations after The Chicago Tribune disclosed that they failed to indicate on a court questionnaire that they had arrest records. … Later, the judge in the Ryan case declined to dismiss four other jurors who failed to indicate that they had experiences with the court system, including a divorce and a theft charge."

South Carolina Administrator Faces Federal Charges. The Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News (4/27, Reports) reports, "Surfside Beach Town Administrator Clyde Merryman was indicted by a federal grand jury in Florence today on seven criminal counts in connection with an investigation into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach in 2002." The News continues, "The indictment was returned today against 60-year-old Merryman, a retired FBI agent. He is facing charges of mail fraud and theft of honest services, concealment of a material fact from a U.S. agency, falsification of records in a federal investigation, and obstruction of justice." The News adds, "Merryman launched the investigation as a FBI Special Agent in January 2002 into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach. The indictment says that the investigation questioned whether the spas used Korean women who were illegally in the United States for the purpose of prostitution. … According to the U.S. Justice Department, the indictment accuses Merryman of developing an ongoing 'personal relationship' with a woman who was a confidential witness of the investigation."

DOJ Will Not Seek Death Penalty In Alabama Carjacking Death. The Mobile Register (4/27, Kirby) reports, "Federal prosecutors will not seek the death penalty against a pair of Mobile men accused of committing a fatal carjacking last year." The Register continues, "Prosecutors last year announced they would seek permission from the Justice Department to try to execute Alexander L. Bohannon, 23, and Sebastian Sanchez Dubose, 25, for the March 2005 slaying of Michael Lee Rodgers outside of his home in south Mobile." The Register adds, "Lawyers on both sides of the case made presentations in Washington to Justice Department officials, who last month denied permission to go for the death penalty. Both men are scheduled to stand trial in June, and could get life prison terms if convicted. … The Justice Department did not explain its rationale, and federal prosecutors in Mobile did not return phone calls seeking comment."

FBI Seized Documents, Computers In San Diego Pension Probe. The AP (4/27) reports, "The FBI has seized computers and documents from the workplace of San Diego's former pension system president as part of a two-year investigation into the city finances. It's the first known time federal investigators probing the pension problems have sought information outside City Hall and the pension offices. FBI agents arrived unannounced earlier this month at the San Diego State University Foundation office where Frederick Pierce IV works as a developer. The FBI has not released further details of the search because the search warrant is sealed and Pierce said he was out of town when the FBI went to his office." The San Diego Union-Tribune (4/26, Hall, Petrillo, 353K) noted, "San Diego FBI Chief Dan Dzwilewski confirmed that agents searched Pierce's office, but declined further comment because the search warrant is sealed. Pierce and foundation spokeswoman Theresa Nakata would not say whether the scope of the search extended beyond the pension fund and its $1.43 billion deficit.

High Court Hears Challenge To Execution By Lethal Injection. Knight Ridder (4/27, Henderson) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared split Wednesday over how a lower court should handle a Florida death row inmate's contention that the state's method of lethal injection is unconstitutional because it could cause him great pain." Knight Ridder continues, "Clarence Hill, who shot and killed a Pensacola police officer in 1982, has exhausted the appeals regularly afforded to inmates who challenge their sentences. But his lawyers say his complaint about the lethal injection procedure is a civil rights claim that doesn't directly challenge his sentence, just the way it's going to be carried out. The state says essentially that Hill's claim is a ruse, an indirect way back into court to stop the state from taking his life. … Two lower courts have rejected Hill's claims, but that has happened against the backdrop of a mounting national debate over how cruel or humane lethal injection is. Eight executions have been delayed this year to consider the issue, thanks in part to medical studies that suggest some inmates may feel terrible pain when intravenous drugs are used to end their lives."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (4/27) reports, "The justices had a wide-ranging discussion about the way executions are carried out, and how they can be contested. Justice Antonin Scalia said that if they allow Florida death-row inmate Clarence Hill to pursue claims, that could drag out a case that has already been pending for more than two decades. … Justices have never ruled on the constitutionality of lethal injection, which is used by the federal government and every state that has capital punishment except Nebraska."

The Washington Post (4/27, A10, Lane) reports, ""With questions and comments from the justices revealing an even split along liberal-conservative lines, the outcome could depend on Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the centrist who is the court's swing voter now that Sandra Day O'Connor has retired." The Post notes that "the precise issue before the court is not whether lethal injection is unconstitutional. Rather, it is a related procedural question: Should courts treat a prisoner's assertion that a particular method of execution is unconstitutional as a federal civil rights lawsuit, as Hill argues, or as a petition for habeas corpus, as Florida says? … The question is critical, because Congress has put strict limits on habeas corpus claims but not on civil rights suits."

The Legal Times (4/27, Mauro) reports that "the justices appeared reluctant to give states carte blanche to use any combination of death-dealing chemicals they choose. … At one point in oral arguments in Hill v. McDonough, Justice Anthony Kennedy suggested that states have 'some minimal obligation' to ensure that the chemicals used in legal executions employ the 'most humane method' available."

McDermott Appeals Ruling In Case Involving Illegally Taped Phone Call. The AP (4/27, Daly) reports that WA7 Rep. Jim McDermott (D) "on Wednesday asked a full nine-member appeals court to hear an appeal of a case involving an illegally taped telephone call that was leaked to reporters nearly a decade ago." The AP notes, "In court papers filed Wednesday, McDermott asked all nine members of the appeals court to hear the case, saying it involved a crucial First Amendment issue." McDermott's "petition said the full court should hear arguments in the case 'because the divided panel decided a constitutional issue of exceptional importance in a manner inconsistent with on-point Supreme Court precedent.'"

Moore's Son Jailed For Slashing Tires On Election Day 2004. The Washington Times (4/27, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "A Wisconsin congresswoman's son and three Democratic campaign workers were sentenced yesterday to four to six months in jail for slashing tires outside a Bush-Cheney campaign office in Milwaukee on Election Day 2004. … Among those sentenced yesterday were Sowande A. Omokunde, the son of U.S. Rep. Gwen Moore, Wisconsin Democrat, and Michael Pratt, the son of former acting Milwaukee Mayor Marvin Pratt."

Pennsylvania County Settles INS Inmate Cost Dispute With DOJ. The AP (4/27, Walters) reports, "York County (AP) will pay the federal government $16 million to settle a dispute over how much its prison charged to house immigration detainees." The AP continues, "The Department of Justice alleged that the county knowingly understated the overall number of inmates at the prison, resulting in a higher rate being charged for federal immigration detainees being housed there between October 1999 and March 2003. … The county, however, does not admit any wrongdoing under the settlement reached Wednesday. … 'We disagree with their characterization concerning that agreement,' said Michael Flannelly, York County solicitor, adding that the county settled to avoid expensive litigation. 'Given the level of risk that we were facing, we believe it's an appropriate settlement.'" The AP adds, "In 2000, the now-defunct U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service agreed to increase the rate to $60 a day for each federal detainee based on York's statement of prison operating costs and the inmate population. … But York reported that the average daily population of the prison was 996 inmates for the applicable period, rather than the 1,544 it reported to the state, according to the U.S. government. … The difference in those figures led to the U.S. government being charged an inflated rate for detainees at York, one of the nation's largest immigration detention centers, federal officials said. … Charles Miller, a Justice Department spokesman, said he considered the legal matter closed."

Federal Contractor To Pay For Misrepresenting Size. Government Executive (4/27, Hardy) reports, "Insight Enterprises has agreed to pay the government $1 million to settle claims that its subsidiary, Insight Public Sector, fraudulently misrepresented itself as a small business to get a federal contract." GE continues, "Insight, an information technology solutions provider based in Tempe, Ariz., admitted no wrongdoing in agreeing to the settlement. Lloyd Chapman, president of the American Small Business League, initially pursued the case against Insight in a Small Business Administration complaint." GE adds, "Chapman believes that large companies often represent themselves as small businesses and that SBA and the General Services Administration rarely take action. … Insight's troubles arose after it acquired Comark and Comark Government and Education Services in 2002. CGES, which is now Insight Public Sector, had won a place on the GSA schedule as a small business in 1996. After investigating, the Justice Department and SBA contended that CGES had not been a small business in 1996 and had later received preference on some orders through the GSA schedule because of its reported size status. … The company disputes that claim, but agreed to settle to avoid the risk and expense of litigation, said Richard Fennessy, Insight's president and chief executive officer, in a statement issued late last month."

Archive Auditors Say Classified Files Wrongly Kept Secret. The Washington Post (4/27, A25, Lee, 744K) reports, "The CIA and other agencies wrongly kept secret about a third of the records they pulled from public shelves at the National Archives during reclassification efforts that were far more extensive than previously disclosed, according to an audit released yesterday." National Archives auditors "who reviewed a representative sample of thousands of formerly public records found that 24 percent were pulled despite being 'clearly inappropriate' for reclassification, and another 12 percent were 'questionable' as candidates for reclassification."

The New York Times (4/27, Shane, 1.19M) reports, "Calling the exposure of the hidden effort to reclassify records a 'turning-point moment,' Allen Weinstein, the head of the National Archives, announced a new effort to set consistent standards for deciding what records should be protected." The Times continues, "The pilot National Declassification Initiative, overseen by the archives, will seek to reduce what Mr. Weinstein called an 'unconscionable backlog' of historical records not yet released and to avoid unnecessary classification in the future." The AP (4/27, Yen) also reports on this story.

Tobacco Company Seeks Reversal Of Anti-Smoking Ad Ruling. Dow Jones (4/27) reports, "Lorillard Tobacco Co. Wednesday asked the Delaware Supreme Court to overturn a ruling that the 'truth' series of anti- smoking ads does not 'vilify' the tobacco industry." Dow Jones continues, "The maker of Newport, Kent, True and Old Gold cigarette brands says the ad campaign, which is targeted at children and teenagers, violates the bargain tobacco companies made in 1998 to settle lawsuits from 46 state attorneys general, an agreement that called for the industry to pay for anti-smoking ads. … Lorillard wants to strip funding from American Legacy Foundation, the non- profit organization behind the 'truth' ads and the recipient of $1.5 billion in funds under the settlement. According to the company, the ads breach restrictions against vilification and personal attacks contained in the settlement. … American Legacy says that the ads have to be edgy to reach the defiant youngsters most at risk of smoking but that the campaign is tailored to avoid personal attacks and vilification, which it defines as abusive and unfair portrayals of tobacco companies."

Michigan Court To Rule On Voter ID Law. The AP (4/27, Eggert) reports that the Michigan Supreme Court "agreed Wednesday to decide whether Michigan can require voters to show photo ID, entering a decade-long political fray over issues such as election fraud and voter intimidation." The AP continues, "The court voted 5-2 to issue an advisory opinion on the constitutionality of a 1997 state law requiring voters to show photo identification to get a ballot. A court spokeswoman said the ruling will be binding, though it could be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court." The AP adds, "Former Attorney General Frank Kelley, a Democrat, ruled nine years ago that the law violated the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which guarantees U.S. citizens the right to vote. … Opponents of the law say the requirement would keep poor people, non-drivers and others away from the polls. But supporters say it's needed to prevent election fraud. … The U.S. Justice Department, for example, has been investigating allegations that Detroit votes were cast last year in the names of dead people."

Virginia Activists Gearing Up Campaigns Ahead Of Vote On Gay Marriage Ban. The Washington Post (4/27, B9, Jenkins, 744K) that "beginnings of a statewide political campaign" are underway "over the proposed amendment to the Virginia Bill of Rights that would ban same-sex marriages and civil unions." The initiative "will be on the ballot statewide Nov. 7. … More than six months before Election Day, supporters and opponents have formed coalitions they hope will raise hundreds of thousands of dollars and lure scores of volunteers to their voter outreach efforts." The Post notes, "Organizers on both sides said they hope to raise enough money to fill the airwaves with radio and television ads. And they vowed to send volunteers to as many county fairs, clambakes and cookouts as needed to get the vote out."

Study Gauges Likelihood Of Gays Marrying. The AP (4/27, Crary) reports, "A new study attempts to gauge the percentage of gays and lesbians who have chosen to marry in places where that option is legal, with estimates ranging from as little as 2 percent to more than 16 percent, depending on the location." The AP continues, "A co-author of the report, released Wednesday, said both sides in the gay marriage debate may take heart from the findings. … The Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, which opposes gay marriage, reviewed data from the Netherlands, Belgium, Canada and Massachusetts, all of which allow same-sex partners to wed. … In each case, the study offered a range of estimates of the percentage of gays who had married, based on varying approximations - from 1 percent to 5 percent - of how many gays were in the general population." The AP notes, "The study estimated that between 2 percent and 5 percent of Belgium's gays and lesbians, and 5.9 percent to 16.7 percent of those in Massachusetts had married. Same-sex marriage became legal in Massachusetts in May 2004, and 7,341 gay and lesbians couples had wed there through last December."

"Don't Ask, Don't Tell" Protesters Detained At West Point. The AP (4/27, Virtanen) reports, "Twenty-one gay rights activists were detained at the U.S. Military Academy and issued federal citations Wednesday while protesting the Pentagon's 'don't ask, don't tell' policy." The academy was the last stop for the Soulforce Equality Riders' " 20-stop, cross-country tour of conservative Christian and military colleges that protest organizers say discriminate against gay, bisexual and transgendered people."

Brooks Says Democrats Moving Away From Multiculturalism. David Brooks writes in his column in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M), "Over the past few years, multiculturalism has faded away. A different sort of liberalism is taking over the Democratic Party." This "rebirth of liberal American nationalism is a significant event. Democrats are purging the last vestiges of the New Left and returning to the older civic liberalism of the 1950's and early 1960's." It happened because "the identity groups have ossified" even as "the intellectual energy on the left is now with the economists." Also, "the Democrats have come to understand that they need to pay less attention to minorities and more to the white working class," even as 9/11 "aroused feelings of national solidarity" which "discredited the multiculturalists' tribalism."

Senate To Examine Oil Firms' Tax Records As Industry Reports Record Profits. With oil companies again reporting record profits, the Senate Finance Committee has asked the IRS for the firms' tax returns. The committee last requested corporate tax records during its investigation into the collapse of Enron. The story was reported on each of the networks last night, which devoted over 11 minutes to the issue of higher gas and oil prices; ABC led with a report on the industry's profits.

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 2, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A Senate committee opened an investigation today into whether America's oil companies making record profits are paying all the taxes they should. The panel asked the IRS for the companies' tax returns. One of those oil companies, Conoco Phillips, today became the first of the big three to report their first-quarter profits. They were up 13% to nearly $33 billion."

The Washington Post/AP (4/27, A10) says the Senate committee's request is "highly unusual" and "came as Congress showed increasing concern amid political fallout over high gasoline prices and oil industry profits. Lawmakers began moving on various fronts to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars." A more extensive version of the AP (4/27, Hebert) article notes, "Bush on Wednesday urged Congress to remove those tax provisions, worth $2 billion over 10 years. He said people should not pay for such subsidies when the industry is wallowing in cash."

Bloomberg (4/27, Efstathiou) adds, "Bush, in a speech on energy issues yesterday in Washington, said the American people expect oil companies to plough more of their profits into investments in refineries and production projects that might eventually ease prices. He also said Congress should roll back incentives to the oil industry that will cost the U.S. about $2 billion over 10 years."

The Financial Times (4/27, Yeager) notes, "A spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the US industry, said the review of documents was within the committee's power, but added, 'I don't think there is anything in there that would have any bearing on gas prices. Gas prices are set by the law of supply and demand.'"

Gonzales Urges Consumers To Use Less Gas. The AP (4/27, Davis) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal and state investigations aren't a substitute for consumer belt-tightening to combat soaring gas prices across the nation. … 'If the gas companies are colluding together or committing fraud, we have an obligation to investigate that,' Gonzales said Wednesday during a visit to Florida to kickoff an anti-gang program. 'Obviously, this is not something that can be solved solely by law enforcement efforts. It requires, perhaps, a change in behavior by consumers. There are things we can do at a federal level, but also it's going to require a collective effort.' … Gonzales declined to comment on what evidence, if any, his agency has of price fixing in the gasoline market." The AP adds, "President Bush is trying to calm Americans' outrage over soaring gas prices by ordering the Department of Justice to investigate whether the price of gasoline is being illegally manipulated. Gas prices are hovering near $3 a gallon and polls give Bush low marks in handling the crisis. … On Monday, Gonzales shifted some of the focus to local authorities with a letter asking all 50 state attorneys general to be vigilant for price gouging. State authorities have primary authority in policing gouging. … 'We're all working together looking into this,' Gonzales said."

Oil Companies' Large Profits Draw Attention. ABC World News Tonight (4/26, lead story, 2:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "We begin with overflowing profits for the oil industry, as Americans struggle to pay rising prices at the pump. We have had a glimpse, our first glimpse, of how much the big oil companies are earning right now. And all indications are, new records are on the way. In the first three months of this year, Conoco Phillips said it made $3.3 billion in profits. BP, more than $5.5 billion. The windfalls are breathtaking. And larger ones are expected in the coming days." ABC (B. Stark) added, "Analysts expect the top five oil companies to make a whopping $27 billion in the first three months of 2006."

ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 2, 2:10, Vargas, 8.78M) also examined other beneficiaries of rising energy prices, such as Saudi Arabia, "the world's number one oil producer is expected to make $154 billion this year, fueling a building boom. Venezuela, which provides the US with more than 10% of its oil, is expected to make $34 billion. Its president is using those profits to support anti-US politicians across Latin America. There's no question, however, that US oil companies have hit a profits gusher, too."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 3, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Red Cavaney of the American Petroleum Institute "explains it this way: For every $1 spent on gas, 55 cents is the cost of crude, which the big oil companies really can't control. Twenty six cents goes to refining and distribution, where the bulk of their money is made; the last 19 cents in taxes. Why can't the industry simply lower their profits to help lower the price of gas?" Cavaney: "All of the companies here in the US that deal with the consumer are investor-owned companies. The responsibility of the management there is to ensure that they're providing for shareholder return." Pitts: "But surging oil profits aren't shared by gas station owners."

Justin Lahart in his "Ahead of the Tape" column in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, C1, 2.11M) notes, "Energy companies are in a bind most companies can only envy: They are doing so well that they have been at pains lately to convince others -- and themselves -- that things aren't as good as they seem." And experts expect Exxon Mobil to report it "earned $1.50 in the first quarter, up 30% from a year ago, when things weren't all that bad. In 2005, Exxon recorded the highest annual profit ever for a publicly traded company, $36 billion, on sales of $371 billion that surpassed Wal-Mart Stores'."

The New York Times/AP (4/27) also notes ConocoPhillips, Exxon Mobil and Chevron "are expected to report a total of more than $16 billion in first-quarter profit. James J. Mulva, chief executive at ConocoPhillips, said in a conference call with analysts and investors that the company would spend about $18 billion this year in capital investments, up from the $10 billion announced in December."

Oil Industry Warns Windfall Taxes Not The Answer. In response to the increased congressional attention on Capitol Hill, the Financial Times (4/27, Swann) notes American Petroleum Institute president Red Caverney said, "Windfall taxes were tried between 1980 and 1986 and it increased out dependence on foreign oil and reduced domestic production. … There is nothing good that comes of it."

Oil Industry Launches Counteroffensive. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Douglass, 958K) reports, "Oil executives have launched their own offensive to win American hearts and minds. In full-page advertisements and media interviews, they argue that the millions of Americans who own shares in oil concerns are winners too. Exxon Mobil, the world's biggest company with $1 billion a day in sales, insisted Wednesday that it was too small to influence the global oil market." Spokesman Mark Boudreaux said, "As big as we are, we are only 3% of the crude oil production in the world."

Lawmakers Follow Bush Lead On Examining Tax Breaks. The New York Times (4/27, A1, Andrews, Janofsky, 1.19M) in a front page story reports, "Leading Republicans echoed President Bush's call Tuesday to trim about $2 billion in tax breaks Congress passed as part of the energy bill last August. Several prominent Democrats, not to be outdone, pushed for repealing oil and gas tax breaks worth more than $10 billion over the next five years." But "experts contend that the government has few options that would quickly reduce gasoline prices, and competing party agendas could block Congressional agreement on any meaningful legislation." Legislators "have introduced more than 30 energy bills in the last several months. But they reflect often -conflicting goals of reducing prices, increasing production and soothing consumer anger about oil industry profits."

Policy Makers Have Few Options To Ease Price Pressure. NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 3, 2:05, Thompson, 9.87M) reported in a "reality check" segment that President Bush "wants to delay filling the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to put more oil on the market because he says every little bit helps." Phil Flynn, oil analyst: "Every little bit does help, but it doesn't get any littler than this." Thompson: "Oil analyst Phil Flynn says the move would only add 15,000 barrels a day, a drop in the bucket compared to the almost 21 million barrels a day we use." Thompson: "Experts say the cries to break up these behemoths ignore the reality that the US imports two-thirds of its oil, and these companies have little control over price. Market manipulation is what the Federal Trade Commission is investigating, but prior investigations found no evidence of price fixing or collusion." NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 8, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) also examined how the increase in gas prices has affected driver behavior.

Democrats Hold Press Conferences To Highlight Gas Prices. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Koppel) reported, "Yesterday Democrats both in the House and the Senate held back-to-back news conferences to get their message out. Today Democrats I guess you could say took their message on the road. Or at least down the road from the Hill. Senate Democrats made a point of walking to a nearby gas station, a sign with the latest gas prices, another chance to drill away at the White House and Republicans. … Democrats intend to call on Congress this week to spend $350 million so the federal government can better monitor oil companies and crack down on possible price gouging." CNN added that "a House leadership Republican aide tells CNN, Wolf, that the House speaker, Dennis Hastert, and other Republicans plan to take their message to the pumps tomorrow as well, to try to lay out some of the ideas that they say they have in store for lowering those prices."

Senate Ag Committee To Consider Alternative Fuel Options. The AP (4/27, Frommer) reports, "A day after President Bush touted the increased use of renewable fuels to help offset rising gas prices," the Senate Agriculture Committee "looked at ways to promote the use of such fuels." Committee chairman Saxby Chambliss "said that the energy bill passed by Congress last year has helped spur the renewable fuels industry by creating a national renewable fuel standard, and by extending the biodiesel tax credit."

Alternative Energy Programs Not Expected To Offer Short Term Relief. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Scherer, 61K) reports, "Prospects for alternative energy got a boost this week when President Bush spoke to the Renewable Energy Association. 'What we are seeing is more creativity,' says John McLennan, a director of technical services at ASRC Energy Services E&T, Inc. in Salt Lake City." But "don't expect to see changes overnight. 'As the oil price rises, it doesn't mean that we're all going to turn a switch on and be awash in alternative fuels,' says Aaron Brady, an energy analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. 'There is no one technology that is the silver bullet that will overturn the dominance of petroleum, but a lot of efforts will become part of the mix that increases the supply of liquid fuels for the world.'"

Alternative Energy Companies Expect Stocks To Rise. The Washington Times/AP (4/27, Seewer) reports, "Investors are betting that new energy regulations and high gas prices could lead to an earnings bonanza for companies such as Andersons, ADM and Pacific Ethanol that produce the fuel additive made from fermented corn that allows cars to run more cleanly." For example, Pacific Ethanol shares "nearly doubled in January, the same month that President Bush touted ethanol in his State of the Union speech. Its shares fell 30 cents yesterday to close at $33.00 on the Nasdaq Stock Market."

Milbank Says Lawmakers Rhetoric On Gas Prices Does Not Match Personal Behavior. Dana Milbank in his "Washington Sketch" column in the Washington Post (4/27, A2, 744K) faults lawmakers for trading jabs over responsibility for high gas prices while driving gas guzzling cars noting that the US "may be addicted to oil, as President Bush puts it. But America is in the denial phase of this addiction -- as evidenced by the behavior of its lawmakers. They have proposed all kinds of solutions to high gas prices: taxes on oil companies, domestic oil drilling and releasing petroleum reserves. But they ignore the obvious: that Americans drive too much in too-big cars."

SEC System For Measuring Oil Reserves Seen As Outdated. Cambridge Energy Research Associates chairman Daniel Yergin in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) questions the accuracy of SEC "proved reserves" reporting system saying it "has become antique, and the information it provides to investors increasingly diverges from the actual resource position of many companies. Nor does it serve the original intent of disclosure -- energy security." Yerges states, "The result is a disconnect between the mandated reserves disclosure and the reality of companies' plans, strategies and activities -- and how they are spending many billions of dollars. Owing to the current rules, much of what they are working on, though particularly relevant to their futures, cannot be counted. That divergence hardly helps investors understand the position of a company and its future prospects."

MediaNews To Purchase Four McClatchy Newspapers. The AP (4/27) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc., publisher of the Denver Post and other newspapers, is buying four newspapers from McClatchy Co. for $1 billion in cash with backing from Hearst Corp." The AP continues, "The four papers -- the San Jose Mercury News, the Contra Costa (Calif.) Times, the Monterey (Calif.) County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press -- currently are owned by Knight Ridder Inc., which McClatchy is buying. … The deal announced late yesterday would strengthen MediaNews's presence in Northern California, where it already owns several papers in the San Francisco Bay area." The AP adds, "The four papers are among the 12 Knight Ridder properties that McClatchy has said it intends to sell since they do not meet McClatchy's acquisition criteria, which include being located in rapidly growing markets. … MediaNews' interest in the newspapers had been widely known. The three Northern California papers would complement the company's existing holdings, which include the Oakland Tribune and the Marin Independent Journal. MediaNews owns a number of newspapers in geographic clusters, which helps reduce production and other costs and allows for group advertising sales. … McClatchy said yesterday that the Justice Department told the company that it would seek additional information regarding the Minneapolis-St. Paul area, indicating that regulators did not see other antitrust concerns with the Knight Ridder takeover."

TheStreet (4/27, Brown) reports, "McClatchy got a Justice Department request for additional information on its planned acquisition of Knight-Ridder. … The Sacramento-based newspaper company says the government wants information about papers in Minnesota." TheStreet continues, "McClatchy is owner of the Star Tribune in Minneapolis, and with the Knight-Ridder deal it gains control of the Pioneer Press in nearby St. Paul. … 'The scope of the DOJ's request is limited to information concerning the Minneapolis -- St. Paul, Minnesota area. McClatchy has previously announced its intention to divest the St. Paul Pioneer Press newspaper, currently owned by Knight-Ridder Inc., to a third party,' a company statement read."

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (4/27, Welbes) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc. is buying the St. Paul Pioneer Press in a complex transaction that involves the Hearst Corp., three other papers and a $1 billion price tag." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The proposed deal, announced Wednesday by MediaNews and the McClatchy Co., the owner of the Minneapolis-based Star Tribune, would end more than five months of speculation about who eventually would own the Pioneer Press. … Regulators are taking a close look at how the shuffling of ownership will affect competition in the Twin Cities and in the California markets where MediaNews will gain considerable strength."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (4/27, Phelps, Fiedler) reports, "The announcement capped a whirlwind spring for the St. Paul newspaper, the state's oldest. … It was put on the market along with 11 other Knight Ridder papers right after McClatchy bought the chain last month. Helping drive the sale of the Pioneer Press were antitrust concerns that regulators wouldn't be comfortable with two major papers under the ownership of one company in the Twin Cities market."

The Contra Costa Times (4/27, Avalos, Temple) reports, "The McClatchy Co. announced an agreement to sell the Times and three other newspapers for $1 billion to two parties. … Denver-based MediaNews, publisher of the Oakland Tribune and other East Bay papers, will purchase the Times and San Jose Mercury News." The Times adds, "The sale of the Times became increasingly certain starting last October when several big shareholders rebelled at the lackluster stock performance of its parent, San Jose-based Knight Ridder, and eventually forced Knight Ridder to put itself on the block. … Sacramento-based McClatchy announced it had won the sparsely contested auction on March 12, in a stock and cash deal then worth $4.5 billion. The news was greeted with optimism by Times reporters and employees, given McClatchy's reputation for quality journalism and financial stability." The Times notes, "Separately on Wednesday, McClatchy Corp. said that the U.S. Department of Justice is seeking additional information regarding its pending purchase of Knight-Ridder.The DOJ's request is limited to the St. Paul Pioneer-Press, but McClatchy said it extends the waiting period under antitrust law, giving the government additional time to review the transaction -- and potentially holding up any deal."

Newspaper Guild Seeks Revocation Of York, PA, JOA. Editor & Publisher (4/27) reports, "The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America filed a petition with the U.S. Attorney General's office claiming that MediaNews Group violated the Newspaper Preservation Act with two York, Pa., daily papers." E&P continues, "The Guild, along with York/Adams County Central Labor Council and City Council President Cameron Texter, charge that MediaNews Group has 'hidden the fact that it now is sole owner and publisher of both papers.'" E&P adds, "In 1989 the Justice Department approved a JOA between MediaNews, publisher of the York Dispatch, and Buckner News Alliance, publisher of the York Daily Record. … The union groups and city council president claim that 'the two publishers engaged in deception in 2004 by reporting that they had swapped ownership of the two papers' when in fact MediaNews bought the Daily Record from Buckner while retaining the Dispatch."

Microsoft Claims EU Ruling Undermines Trade Secrets. The AP (4/27, White, Moore) reports, "Microsoft Corp. complained Wednesday that the European Commission forced it to hand over trade secrets to rivals, effectively giving them a 'free ride' on the work the software maker did to acquire new customers and develop new technologies. … But Anthony Whelan, the Commission's lawyer, said that the 'super-dominant' software maker had managed to strangle its rivals' innovation and was unlikely to face 'an attack of the clones' if it gave companies the information they needed to make their programs work more smoothly with the Windows operating system. … 'Microsoft's alarmist claims about duplication have been made for your consideration only,' he told the panel of 13 judges who are considering the company's challenge to the Commission's 2004 antitrust order and record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine." The AP adds, "The weeklong hearing was in its third day Wednesday, and the focus shifted from media player software to the EU regulators' order that Microsoft give interoperability information to makers of rival server operating systems. … Whelan said Novell Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc. were reduced to catering to network servers with 'last century's technology' -- Windows NT -- because Microsoft withheld the code needed to allow them to work smoothly with PCs running the world's most-used desktop software."

Dow Jones (4/27) reports, "Microsoft is appealing a landmark antitrust punishment before a European court in Luxembourg. In 2004, the Commission found the company cripples rival software makers by withholding key 'interoperability' information. The regulator also said Microsoft illegally bundles its Media Player program with Windows. On these two counts, the Commission fined the company a record EUR497 million and ordered it to change its some of its business practices. … During the first two days of hearings, Microsoft defended its bundled Media Player software, claiming the Commission made 'serious errors' in its decision. Wednesday and Thursday, Microsoft is arguing that Windows isn't designed to hamper rivals' products."

Wehrum Approved For EPA Assistant Administrator. CQ Today (4/27, Tollefson) reports, "A divided Senate Environment and Public Works Committee approved" William L. Wehrum's nomination as assistant EPA administrator for air and radiation "on a straight party-line vote, as moderate Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., upheld the president's prerogative to choose his administration." The nomination has been "controversial," as Democrats and environmentalists…say Wehrum played a crucial role in developing rules that they contend undercut EPA's statutory authority to cut smokestack pollution from power plants. "

SCOTUS Rules Arkansas Wrongfully Seized Home. The New York Times (4/27, Greenhouse) reports that the Supreme Court ruled on Wednesday "that Arkansas violated a homeowner's right to due process when it sold his house for nonpayment of taxes after sending him two certified letters that came back 'unclaimed.' … Writing for a 5-to-3 majority, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said that 'it is not too much to insist that the state do a bit more' before using its 'extraordinary power' to take and sell a person's house." The Times adds, "Justices Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and Anthony M. Kennedy dissented, the latter two signing a dissenting opinion by Justice Thomas. The state did all that was constitutionally required, Justice Thomas said, adding that it was the homeowner's responsibility to make sure that the authorities knew how to contact him. The court was imposing a 'burdensome' and 'impractical' requirement on the government, he said. … Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote in the case, which was argued shortly before he joined the court in January. … For anyone watching the emergence of the Roberts court, the case provided intriguing tea leaves. It was the chief justice's fourth majority opinion, and the first to provoke any dissenting votes. "

National Parks Feel Budget Pinch. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports that while "nothing tops national parks as a popular government program," the "expenses for war in Iraq, hurricane cleanup, and other activities continue to push the federal deficit ever higher, parks around the country are facing a budget crunch." Managers at 12 national parks "told GAO officials that they do not have the financial resources to keep up with increasing costs," and parks advocates and former park service employees are "predicting reduced visitor services and increased fees."

WPost Rebukes EPA Over Anacostia River Monitoring. The Washington Post (4/27, A26, 744K) editorializes, "Barely a month ago, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit issued a stinging rebuke to the Environmental Protection Agency's efforts to rewrite federal clean air law to weaken rules concerning power companies upgrading old coal-fired equipment. This week, a cross-ideological panel of the court unanimously accused the agency, once again, of defying federal environmental law -- this time concerning efforts to clean up the Anacostia River." The "strong, derisive language should send a message to the agency to take congressional enactments seriously, as written." Still, "federal regulators shouldn't need such judicial reminders that the law means what it says."

9th Circuit Overturns Pot Guru's Conviction. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/27, Egelko) reports, "The federal marijuana cultivation convictions of noted pot advocate Ed Rosenthal were overturned by a federal appeals court (Wednesday) because of a juror's phone call to an attorney friend, who told her to follow the judge's instructions or she could get in trouble." The Chronicle continues, "The juror's unauthorized contact on the eve of the verdict in January 2003 was an 'improper influence' that denied Rosenthal a trial before an impartial jury, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said in a 3-0 ruling granting him a new trial. … 'Jurors cannot fairly determine the outcome of a case if they believe they will face "trouble" for a conclusion they reach as jurors,' said the opinion by Judge Betty Fletcher. 'The threat of punishment works a coercive influence on the jury's independence.'"

The AP (4/27, Kravets) reports, "Rosenthal was convicted in 2003 for cultivating hundreds of marijuana plants for a city of Oakland medical marijuana program. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced him to one day in prison, saying Rosenthal reasonably believed he was immune from prosecution because he was acting on behalf of city officials. … The government sought a two-year prison term and appealed. Rosenthal cross-appealed." The AP adds, "The case drew national attention, in part, because of Rosenthal's status as a leading author and proponent of marijuana. It also underscored the federal government's position that medical marijuana is illegal, it has no medical value and the will of California voters has no effect on nationwide drug laws. … U.S. Attorney's spokesman Luke Macaulay said the office was considering whether to appeal or go ahead with a new trial."

BankAtlantic Agrees To Forfeit $10 Million In Money-Laundering Settlement. The AP (4/27, Anderson) reports, "BankAtlantic agreed Wednesday to forfeit $10 million to the U.S. government to avoid criminal charges that it permitted millions of dollars in suspected drug money to be laundered through its accounts over a nearly seven-year period." The AP continues, "Under an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department filed in federal court, prosecution against the Fort Lauderdale-based bank will be deferred for at least 12 months in return for the payment. The charges will be dismissed altogether if BankAtlantic continues taking action to remedy the situation. … The investigation, led by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and federal bank regulators, identified more than $50 million in suspicious transactions between July 1997 and April 2004, according to court documents." The AP adds, "DEA agents working undercover as operatives for supposed Colombian drug lords found that drug money was being wire transferred to a handful of BankAtlantic accounts overseen by a specific branch manager. That led to the discovery of other BankAtlantic accounts being used to launder illicit drug proceeds. … BankAtlantic admitted in the agreement that it did not identify and report the suspicious transactions as required by the Bank Secrecy Act. Court papers say there were numerous "red flags" about the transactions, such as a high volume of both incoming and outgoing wire transfers to unrelated people and corporations."

Dow Jones (4/27) reports, "In the agreement, the Justice Department and Drug Enforcement Agency alleged that BankAtlantic allowed millions of dollars to illegally flow through its accounts from 1997 through April 2004. This included 'the deposit and transfer of more than $10 million in suspected drug proceeds originating from U.S. undercover law enforcement operations.' … Court records show that undercover drug enforcement officials made deals with suspected drug traffickers to help deposit drug proceeds into U.S. banks. On multiple occasions, money couriers handed undercover agents bags or briefcases with between $150,000 and $500,000 in cash. The agents then deposited the money into a secret government account and were asked by the suspected drug traffickers to wire the money to accounts at BankAtlantic."

Federal Grand Jury Indicts 12 In South Carolina On Meth Charges. The Charlotte Observer (4/27, Lyttle) reports, "Federal officials have indicted a dozen people from Burke and McDowell counties in a methamphetamine crackdown. … All but one of the 12 suspects have been apprehended, and 10 remain in federal custody." The Observer continues, "Suellen Pierce, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Justice Department, said the indictments are the result of an investigation that involved the Drug Enforcement Administration, the N.C. State Bureau of Investigation, the McDowell County Sheriff's Office, and the Marion Police Department. … Pierce did not give additional information on how the investigation and arrests took place." The Observer adds, "Each of the 12 faces one count of conspiracy to manufacture and possess, with the intent to distribute, methamphetamine. The indictments were returned by a federal grand jury in Asheville on April 4. The charge carries a penalty of 10 years or more in prison, plus a fine of up to $4 million."

San Francisco Man Found Dead May Have Stored Meth For Hells Angels. The AP (4/26) reports police said a man "suspected of storing methamphetamine for the ringleaders of an alleged Hells Angels drug ring was found shot to death at Ocean Beach. Michael Demetrescu Sr., 46, was wanted on federal drug trafficking charges after agents raided 19 Hells Angels locations last week and found a pound of methamphetamine in the garage of Demetrescu's home in San Francisco. … Investigators believe Demetrescu was storing drugs for his neighbor, Jason Peterson, 32, a top Hells Angels official who was arrested in the raids Thursday along with the San Francisco chapter president, 35-year-old Joseph Wilson."

The San Francisco Chronicle (4/26, Van Derbeken) reports Demetrescu is believed to have committed suicide and that he had told his girlfriend he was going to turn himself in, following the raids. Demetrescu "had faced 40 years to life in prison if convicted of federal methamphetamine trafficking charges that had been lodged against him after the raids Thursday."

15 Arrested In San Francisco Crack Cocaine Sweep. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/26, Van Derbeken, Writer) reports San Francisco police "trying to gain control over crime in the Western Addition have secured warrants for at least two dozen suspected crack cocaine dealers and have arrested 15 of them. Although none of those named in the warrants is wanted on murder charges, police said they were optimistic that taking crack dealers off the streets would reduce violent crime in the Western Addition. … The sweep was conducted by the narcotics detail, with assistance from the gang task force, officers from Northern Station, and agents with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration."

Texas Gym Owner Pleads Guilty To Cocaine Charge. The Brownsville (TX) Herald (4/27) reports the owner of a Brownsville gym pleaded guilty to a federal drug trafficking charge Wednesday morning. Powerhouse Gym owner Jose Alfredo DeLeon had maintained his innocence on the conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine charge until the Wednesday morning hearing where he told U.S. District Judge Andrew S. Hanen that he had a 'cocaine habit.' The 39-year-old man, who was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents in January, told Hanen that he last used cocaine three days before his arrest."

Man Gets 3-Year Sentence Following Cocaine Deal With DEA Informant. The Journal News (4/26) in White Plains, New York reports a New Rochelle man "was sentenced to more than three years in prison for cocaine trafficking. Victor M. Frias-Valencia…pleaded guilty in November in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport to possessing and intending to distribute a kilogram of cocaine. Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration arrested Frias-Valencia in Greenwich on Sept. 29, 2004, after he struck a deal with a DEA informant to sell the cocaine, roughly 2.2 pounds, according to court documents and Frias-Valencia's plea."

Massachusetts Man Found Guilty In Cocaine Case. The AP (4/26) reports, "A jury finds a Massachusetts man guilty of conspiring to deal cocaine. Domingo Gonzales was arrested last year after agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration raided a Providence [Rhode Island] house and interrupted a cocaine deal. … He was arrested after DEA agents found him hiding under a pile of rubbish in the basement."

Massachusetts Man Gets 5-Year Sentence For Role In Oxycodone Ring. The Salem (MA) News (4/27) reports a Peabody man "will spend more than five years behind bars for his part in a ring that peddled [oxycodone] on Cape Ann. Jose Melo…was sentenced to more than five years (63 months) for distribution. During an undercover drug raid in 2004, Melo was arrested along with a dozen others, most from Gloucester. … Deputies and the DEA said they purchased 1,096 80 milligram pills between October 2003 and June 2004."

Student, Teen Charged In Michigan Gun Case. The Detroit News (4/27) reports, "A 16-year-old student at the Academy of Business and Technology (in Melvindale, MI) and a 15-year old who formerly attended the school were charged Wednesday with carrying a concealed weapon and with making a terrorist threat in separate incidents at the school." The News continues, "Melvindale police were at the school Tuesday investigating an e-mail in which someone threatened to shoot up the school when a student approached the officers and told them they saw a student with a gun, said Chief Rick Cadez. … When officers located the 16-year-old, a Detroit resident, he was carrying an unloaded .25-caliber hand gun, the chief said. Police were not able to learn where he got the gun, as his parents refused to allow police to interview him." The News adds, "The gun was given to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) which will trace its ownership. The youth was turned over to Wayne County juvenile authorities. Wayne County Prosecutor Kym L. Worthy issued a warrant charging him with carrying a concealed weapon."

South Carolina Man Given Probation For Bomb Possession. The Georgetown (SC) Times (4/27, Harper) reports, "An Andrews (SC) man arrested last year for possessing homemade bombs will not go to jail after it was determined he had no criminal intentions." The Times continues, "Norman Weaver, 30, pled guilty to multiple counts of possession of a destructive device and was sentenced to 18 months probation Tuesday. … He was arrested in October after Georgetown County deputies went to his Big Dam Swamp home to investigate another matter." The Times adds, "Deputy Solicitor Matthew Modica told Judge Edward Cottingham while the officers were at the home they found eight bombs made of PCP pipe that were packed with black powder. … He said South Carolina Law Enforcement Division and federal ATF agents were called in to assist with the investigation. He said after the inquest, it was decided the matter did not warrant federal prosecution.Modica said Weaver's name did not appear on any intelligence watch lists and the ATF agents 'did not believe he posed a threat.' … However, Modica noted, 'it is against the law in South Carolina to possess' such devices."

ATF Search In Michigan Called Politically Motivated. The Saginaw News (4/27, Bohn) reports, "Time will tell if federal agents will return with arrest warrants after carting away numerous firearms from the home of an embattled Brady Township official whose husband is a convicted felon. … Federal law says felons cannot own firearms." The News continues, "While Clerk Melissa Alcorn is at odds with the township supervisor, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on Tuesday morning focused on her husband, Douglas A. Alcorn, 41, who served a month in jail and four years of probation, the first two on electronic tether. … He pleaded no contest in 1993 to a charge of second-degree child abuse. In return, prosecutors dismissed a count of first-degree child abuse, court records show." The News adds, "Court documents show his first wife filed the charges two months into their marriage. … Arnold D. Dunchock of Corunna, an attorney for the Alcorns, said the firearms were in a gun safe in the home and Douglas Alcorn 'did not have access to them.' … Dunchock said the family is incensed that agents 'apprehended' Melissa Alcorn while she was driving home after dropping one of her four children off to school and conducted the search of their home in front of their other three children. … She has bickered for months with Brady Township Supervisor John Schoch, who faces a recall election Tuesday. … While Schoch blames Alcorn for orchestrating the recall, the timing of the raid prompted the Alcorns' attorney to complain about political motivations. … Dunchock suggested that Schoch prompted the ATF search on the couple in retaliation for the recall effort, but Schoch said he knew nothing about the raid until it happened."

IMMIGRATION:

Former Nazi Guard Seeks Review Of Citizenship Revocation. The AP (4/27, Wilson) reports, "A lawyer for a former Nazi concentration camp guard has asked a federal appeals court to review its ruling to revoke the man's U.S. citizenship." The AP continues, "Lisa Mattson, a lawyer for John Hansl, filed documents with the U.S. 8th Circuit Court of Appeals last week, seeking a review by the entire court. … A three-judge panel of the St. Louis-based court ruled March 7 that a U.S. District Court judge was correct in revoking the citizenship of Hansl, 81, who lives in Des Moines." The AP adds, "The U.S. Department of Justice filed a complaint against Hansl in July 2003, claiming he hid his service with the Waffen SS when he applied for a visa to come the United States in 1955. He was granted a visa and became a U.S. citizen in 1960. … The case revolved around a 1953 law designed to control the flow of immigrants to the U.S. after World War II. … Mattson claimed the law required a person to have 'personally assisted' in the persecution of others before they could be denied a visa. … U.S. District Court Judge Robert Pratt revoked Hansl's citizenship in April 2005, ruling that Hansl's conduct as a Nazi concentration camp guard left 'no room for factual dispute whether he personally advocated or assisted in persecution.'"

Justices Appear Reluctant To Allow Use Of RICO In Immigration Case. The Legal Times (4/27, Mauro) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared sympathetic to pleas by business advocates not to 'RICO-ize' all types of business relationships, as Justice Stephen Breyer put it, during oral arguments Wednesday." The Times continues, "The Court heard debate in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, a class action brought against Georgia carpet manufacturer Mohawk Industries under the civil portion of RICO, the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. Current and former employees of Mohawk claimed that its hiring of illegal aliens -- in concert with outside recruiting and temp agencies -- depressed wages and amounted to racketeering as defined under RICO. If the suit fits under RICO and the plaintiffs prevail, Mohawk would be exposed to treble damages and could be forced to pay plaintiffs' attorney fees. … 'These are enormous penalties that are imposed,' Mohawk's lawyer, Carter Phillips, told the justices. Congress passed RICO to target organized crime, he asserted, not ordinary dealings between businesses and their agents and contractors. 'It is not free for the government or anyone else' to broaden the law unilaterally, said Phillips, a partner in the D.C. office of Sidley Austin. … In advance billing it appeared that the Mohawk case would draw the high court into some of the immigration issues causing controversy across the nation, including the contention that the corporate hiring of illegal aliens has had the indirect effect of keeping wages low for American citizens. … Instead immigration was barely mentioned, as oral arguments devolved quickly into a dense debate over the ambiguous wording of the RICO statute and whether a corporation like Mohawk can be part of a separate 'enterprise' covered by the law."

TAX:

Negotiators Hopeful Deal On Tax Cut Package Near. CQ (4/26, Van Dongen) reports negotiators "said they hope to announce a deal Thursday on a long-delayed $70 billion tax cut package, but the top tax writers in the House and Senate continued to squabble over strategy." Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas "said that a meeting late Wednesday in the office of Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., allowed conferees to 'move forward.' The bill (HR 4297) is expected to include a two-year extension of cuts to capital gains and dividend taxes, as well as a provision to extend for 2006 an adjustment to the alternative minimum tax (AMT) to blunt its effect on middle-class taxpayers." CQ adds that despite "pressure from Bush and House and Senate GOP leaders to finish the tax package, Thomas and Senate Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley, R-Iowa, have yet to strike a final deal." Conferees still "were sparring Wednesday over the costs and content of a separate package of tax breaks expected to contain business tax breaks, including extending the research-and-development tax credit, which has bipartisan support."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Poll Shows Bush Approval At 36% Over Concerns About Gas Prices, Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Harwood, 2.11M) reports, "Rising gas prices have intensified discontent with Washington and handed Congress a frightening midterm election backdrop: a deeply pessimistic electorate, despite a robust economy." The latest "Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. Fully 77% call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data showed new-home sales and factory orders remain strong." The public is concerned about "the prolonged and unpopular Iraq war. But it also shows the impact of pump prices topping $3 a gallon in many places, passing Iraq to become the nation's highest-priority issue." The low poll numbers represent "a powerful source of frustration for Republicans, who want Mr. Bush and Congress to get more credit for the economy. Doing just that is a top priority of new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and congressional Republican leaders, who are aiming to take a first step by accelerating House-Senate negotiations on tax-cut legislation that would extend the current 15% rates on capital gains and dividends." Bush's 36% approval rating is "the lowest he has ever received in the Journal/NBC survey."

On NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 2, 2:35, 9.87M), anchor Brian Williams and Washington bureau chief Tim Russert discussed the results of the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. Williams: "For this President during our polling this is an all-time low. The approval-disapproval number – 36% approval rating for the President, 57% disapprove." Russert added, "This is an unsettled country. Look at this -- wrong track, right track -- 67% of the American people, two-thirds, now believe we're on the wrong track. Why? The economy is a huge reason. Only 19% are confident about the direction of the economy. 77%, three out of four, uneasy about the economy. And what are the top concerns that create this unease? Gas prices at $3, 45% of our respondees; Iran nuclear weapon 33%; illegal immigration, 26. Gas prices have people hopping mad."

Similarly the Washington Post (4/27, A1, Whoriskey, 744K) in a front page story says "Anger over gas prices is gaining traction in many midterm races around the nation as Democrats attack Republicans for being too close to oil companies. With many in the GOP growing uneasy, President Bush this week called for price-fixing investigations. Political analysts say the rising prices could dovetail with growing public concern over the war in Iraq to give Democrats an opening in several key races."

Bartlett Says White House Is Not Demoralized By Low Poll Numbers. White House Communications Director Dan Bartlett was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (4/26) if the White House is "demoralized" because Bush is at "33% in the polls." Bartlett said, "No," adding that President Bush "has made some very difficult decisions, decisions that he feels in his heart of hearts were the right decisions to make, but he understands it makes people anxious." Asked if he attributes the low poll numbers to press coverage, Bartlett said, "Not always. I do think the media, particularly on Iraq, are trying to do the right thing. It is a newsworthy event any time there's a loss of life but it's a complex story to cover."

Bush To Address Fuel Efficiency, Pension Concerns With US Automakers. The New York Times (4/27, Maynard, 1.19M) reports, "President Bush, who touched a nerve this year when he told Detroit carmakers to build 'relevant' vehicles, will meet with the companies' leaders" May 18th. The meeting is expected to "focus on three areas: energy and the environment; costs like pensions and health care premiums that add hundreds of dollars to the price of a Detroit car; and how currency issues affect the Japanese automakers."

Bush Administration Pushing For Revived Nuclear Industry. Under the headline "Warming Up To Nuclear Power," the Washington Post (4/27, D1, Mufson, 744K) reports that while the nuclear industry has for years "lived in the shadow of Chernobyl," now "the Bush administration is pushing for a revival of nuclear power both abroad and in the United States, saying it wants to promote a domestic unlimited energy source. The Bush-backed Energy Policy Act of 2005 included a bevy of incentives for domestic nuclear power, and the administration has laid aside nuclear-proliferation issues to urge India to build nuclear power plants." The Post adds that new DOE assistant secretary for nuclear energy, Dennis Spurgeon, considers himself the "chief salesman for nuclear energy," and noted that Spurgeon believes that getting a "new US nuclear plant built is his 'number one priority.'"

WPost Faults Bush Policies, Says He Should Focus On Changing Consumer's Behavior. The Washington Post (4/27, A26, 744K) in an editorial writes, "No doubt it makes everyone feel better when the president states his concern for Americans. … Unfortunately, the measures President Bush chose to announce this week to combat high prices are either meaningless or possibly dangerous in the long run, even if they do offer a bit of temporary relief." Accusing Bush of also failing to pursue a more rational energy policy," while in office, the Post states that if Bush "were completely honest, the president would tell Americans that the main reason fuel prices are higher in this country is because demand is growing -- and one reason for growing demand is that people drive inefficient cars. They drive inefficient cars because public policy, long shaped by the president and by Congress, has made it advantageous to do so. Until that changes, little else will."

USA Today Faults Bush Response To High Gas Prices. USA Today (4/27, 2.31M) editorializes, "Bush's plan to suspend deposits into the National Petroleum Reserve and to push for more lenient pollution standards would have little impact. Just as useless are calls for a tax on oil company profits and the partisanfinger-pointing of many in Congress." And "it is also perhaps the most visible measure of the inability of the nation's leaders to speak the truth about long-term problems -- Social Security, health care and runaway spending to name three others. Today's high oil prices are the result of a quarter-century of low prices coupled with robust worldwide growth and instability in the world's oil-producing regions. Any meaningful energy polices will take years to unfold."

Snow To Replace McClellan As White House Press Secretary. President Bush yesterday announced Fox News commentator Tony Snow will join the Administration as press secretary. Snow was portrayed in media reports as likeable, independent, open, frank, and optimistic. While observers said these qualities would serve him well in establishing a better relationship between the White House and the press corps, some noted that Snow may find it difficult to adjust to the new position.

On ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 4, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M), chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said Snow is "going to do very well. He's made his living communicating. He's a smart and very likable guy, so he should lower the temperature in the briefing room and also increase the star power. Also, by picking him, President Bush has already helped himself by going outside his circle, picking someone of independent stature. He shows he's not afraid of having big people of with independent opinions in the White House." But he added the "toughest part of the job" will be the "psychological adjustment. As you showed, he's been out there for a long time, voicing his own opinions. Now, he's going to have to squelch those private opinions and deliver the party line with conviction. That's going to take some getting used to."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, lead story, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Interestingly enough, Mr. Snow has been rather critical of the President while he's been in the commentary business. Mr. Bush actually made light of that, said that he asked Mr. Snow about that during the job interview, said you've been quite critical of me. And Tony Snow said, 'Mr. President, you should have heard what I said about the other guy.'"

NBC Nightly News (4/26, lead story, 3:00, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The President appeared to welcome those knocks today as proof he wants advisors to give him unvarnished advice." Snow is "a reliable conservative and now he is expected to aggressively defend the President. Brian, also worth noting, that he is the first TV personality to be in the job since Gerald Ford hired away Ron Nessen from NBC News back in the 70s."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer) reported that President Bush "announced today that the FOX News anchor Tony Snow has agreed to replace Scott McClellan as the press secretary." CNN (Quijano) added, "Snow actually met with President Bush last Thursday in the residence. He accepted the job we are told yesterday after talking with Dan Bartlett, the counselor to the president, also the new White House chief-of-staff, Josh Bolten. Now Republican sources had said that before this, Snow had wanted and received assurances that he would play an active role in major policy debates. Nevertheless, Mr. Bush made it clear that ultimately, any decisions are still his to make."

The Washington Times (4/27, Curl, Dinan, 90K) reports that Snow "took the job after insisting that he be not just a spokesman, but a participant in administration policy debates. Yet Mr. Bush, in introducing Mr. Snow to reporters gathered in the White House briefing room yesterday, made clear the chain of command. 'My job is to make decisions, and his job is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people,' the president said, with a smiling Mr. Snow next to him."

The AP (4/26, Loven) reported that Snow's hiring "was intended in part to help improve the White House's frayed relationship with the press corps."

Knight Ridder (4/27, Hutcheson) reports that the selection of Snow "broke Bush's pattern of filling top jobs with trusted loyalists." Knight Ridder adds, "The job will give Snow a chance to put into practice his advice that Bush should be much more aggressive in confronting his critics. His appointment pleased Republicans who share that view, but skeptics questioned Snow's ability to influence an organization known for buttoned-down discipline and devotion to the president."

A front page story in the New York Times (4/27, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports that in naming Snow to be his press secretary, Bush "completed a decade-long transformation of the role of the presidential spokesman from behind-the-scenes functionary to daily on-camera personality. Mr. Snow is something the White House briefing room has not yet had at the lectern: a star of the opinionated cable news era. But he is also something Mr. Bush has never had: a free-wheeling outsider in a very public position, and one with a history of sharing critical opinions of the president." The Times also notes, "Mr. Snow's career change also might not be what Fox News executives want in terms of their public relations defense against criticism that their network is philosophically sympathetic to Mr. Bush."

A front page story in the Washington Post (4/27, A1, VandeHei, Fletcher, 744K) reports that the decision to hire Snow "reflects a consensus among the president and his top advisers that his White House operation has been too insular and needs to be more aggressive in engaging with the news media and other Washington constituencies, according to Bush aides and outside advisers."

An analysis by the AP (4/27, Fournier) says, "Naming conservative commentator Tony Snow as White House press secretary puts a fresh face on the administration and may help mend relations with the Washington press corps. But the move underscores how far Bush has fallen in the eyes of his allies -- conservative leaders and voters who helped elect him in 2000 and re-elect him in 2004." Bush "cannot rebound politically without regaining the faith of conservative voters whose support has waned in recent months. If conservatives are too frustrated to vote on Election Day, Republicans could lose control of Congress, and the final two years of Bush's presidency could be filled with Democratic-led investigations."

A separate AP (4/27, Raum) story notes, "If his party loses control of one, or both chambers of Congress, the next two years could be a political nightmare for Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill. With poll numbers at the lowest of his presidency, Bush has had trouble enough winning support for his priorities in his second term even with a Republican-led Congress. That helped lead to a recent reshuffling of the White House staff. A Democratic House or Senate and presidential stubbornness could spell legislative gridlock."

Democrats Note Snow's Past Criticism Of Bush. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer) reported, "Today some Democrats are gleefully pointing out Tony Snow's past criticism of President Bush. And even circulating e-mail with some of his most pointed comments. Snow wrote this about Mr. Bush on a Web site called townhall.com in November of 2005: 'His wavering conservatism' -- referring to the president -- 'has become an active concern among Republicans. The newly passive George Bush has become something of an embarrassment.'"

The AP (4/26, Benac) reported that although Snow is a strong supporter of the President, he "has used his column to label the president 'something of an embarrassment,' cast his domestic policy as 'listless' and compare him to 'the boy who can't say no' when it comes to federal spending." However, Snow has also "been a strong defender of Bush on many an occasion, applauding his 'brilliant' foreign policy, his stick-to-his-guns persistence in Iraq, his 'delicious disdain for the Beltway culture,' his 'visionary' Social Security plan. 'On the seminal issues of national security and global destiny, he positively dwarfs the political opposition,' he has written of Bush."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Gold, 958K) reports that "Snow's White House appointment reinforces for some the perception that Fox News is the go-to network for the administration, media observers said."

Snow Says He Will Express Differing Opinions To Bush. Tony Snow was asked on Fox News' Special Report (4/26) how he is going to deal with your past criticism of the President. Bush said, "Pretty simple answer. There's probably a lot of people who said I wish I hadn't written or said that. Here's the key, when I give advice to the President, it will be my advice. If I have differing opinions with some people, I will press express them. The job is not to come in as a surrogate President and say what I believe matters because frankly what matters is what the Administration has decided to do and that I will express as forcefully as I possibly can."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Wallsten, Havemann, 958K) reports, "Snow said he intended to continue expressing strong views. 'Look, they want people to express their opinions,' he said. 'You're not coming here to drink the Kool Aid, you're coming here to serve the president. And at this particular juncture, I think what you want is as much honest counsel as you can get. So when I agree, I agree, and when I disagree, I disagree. But on any opinion his vote's the tie-breaker.'"

USA Today (4/27, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports, "Snow said that he has been promised sufficient access to Bush and that he'll express his views privately to the president. However, he said, Bush always has final say: 'The president is the guy who runs the place.'"

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Gerstenzang, Brownstein, 958K) reports that Snow will be "one of the few officials with unscheduled access to the president and Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten. The arrangement could be helpful as Snow, 50, attempts to build trust with a White House press corps that had an adversarial relationship with his predecessor and as he tries to help Bush recover from low public approval ratings."

Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey wrote on Newsweek's (4/26) web site, "One GOP official privy to the negotiations told NEWSWEEK that Snow had pressed administration officials for a job that extended beyond simply being Bush's guy behind the podium and had successfully argued for increased access to the president. Additionally, Snow also argued for and won the ability to make staffing decisions within the press office, including the ability to hire or fire staffers."

Officials Say White House Shake Up Is Nearing Completion. Bloomberg News (4/27) notes that Snow's hiring "is part of an effort by Bush's new Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten to reorganize the White House team amid job approval ratings for the president that are at or near record lows.

Fox News' Special Report (4/26, Cameron) reported, "Senior administration officials say the White House shakeup is nearing completion. There are still a few more changes they'd like to make. For instance, replacing the Treasury Secretary, but that will likely come after the appointment of a new domestic policy adviser to the President, a position that's currently vacant, sometime in the next week or two, by which time Tony should be at the podium and the new face and voice of the Bush White House."

Fleischer Says White House Press Briefing Has Become A TV Show. Ari Fleischer, who was President Bush's press secretary from January 2001 to July 2003, writes in the Washington Post (4/27, A27, 744K) that the daily White House press briefing has become "a TV show. Gone are the days when this daily session was a serious affair, with mostly serious questions asked and mostly serious answers given. Instead, the public is now treated to a spectacle in which the media do their best to pressure the White House, regardless of which party is in power, into admitting that much of what the president is doing is wrong, and the White House pushes back. The two sides talk past each other, and the viewing public gets to watch a good fight."

Senate Diverts Funds From Iraq Supplemental Bill To Border Security. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer) reported, "The Senate voted today to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq and the war on terror to efforts to increase US border security. The move only intensified a battle over pork that spurred President Bush to issue a veiled veto threat." CNN (Bash) added, "Republicans offered to add that money to border security, as an effort to lure conservatives on the issue of immigration." But "because Republicans are really under the gun from conservatives, very angry at them about the amount of government spending, they had to cut it somewhere. And this is an emergency spending bill primarily to fund Iraq. So, that's where it was cut in this particular bill. And Democrats went to the Senate floor and called it outrageous."

The Washington Times (4/27, A1, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Republicans "turned back an effort by Minority Leader Harry Reid to grant the same expenditures for border security but without making cuts elsewhere in the emergency spending bill, which has ballooned to a $106.5 billion proposal. The Nevada Democrat, whose amendment failed on a mostly party-line 54-44 vote, said the Republican amendment would hurt the military." The Washington Post (4/27, A16, Weisman, 744K) reports that when "some Democrats said the move would take money from needed combat funds, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), the bill's sponsor, called the criticism 'pure poppycock.'"

The Baltimore Sun/AP (4/27, Taylor) reports the Senate "voted today to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead increase patrols against illegal immigrants on the nation's borders and provide the Coast Guard with new boats and helicopters." The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "Most of the funds would go to buying patrol boats, aircraft and other equipment for Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection operations. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) hopes to burnish the Republican image on border issues before again tackling immigration."

The AFP (4/27) reports the Senate voted 59-39 to approve the amendment "by Republican Senator Judd Gregg that would free up 1.9 billion dollars in credits for surveillance planes and building a fence near San Diego, California, along the border with Mexico."

Bloomberg (4/27, Faler) reports Democrats "denounced the border-security plan, saying it forced lawmakers to choose between supporting American troops and protecting the country's Southwestern border." Sen. Hillary Clinton said, "Border security is an urgent need and it should and must be addressed by this Congress. But our security and our values are not served by choosing between protecting our troops and protecting our homeland."

Gregg, Clinton Spar Over War-Funding Bill. The New Hampshire Union Leader (4/27) reports, "A war of words broke out yesterday between Sens. Judd Gregg and Hillary Clinton after the Senate approved Gregg's proposal to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead bolster U.S. border security." Clinton "said Gregg's cuts would 'take money from troop pay, body armor and even joint improvised explosive device defeat fund. Now that is a false choice, and it is a wrong choice.' Gregg responded heatedly, arguing that the cuts eventually would come from other parts of the massive Pentagon budget rather than U.S. forces in Iraq. 'To come down here and allege that these funds are going to come out of the needs of the people on the front lines in Iraq or Afghanistan is pure poppycock,' he said.

Bush Position On Senate Compromise Ambiguous. CQ (4/26, Sandler, Crowley) reports supporters "of putting most of the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants on a path to earned citizenship are all but certain" that President Bush "is on board with that concept. They met with the president April 25, and though he refrained from expressing outright support for the proposal, they left feeling secure about his position." But Republicans "who have labeled the earned citizenship approach as offering 'amnesty,' however, cautioned that view may be an overzealous interpretation." Sen. John Cornyn said, "The president didn't endorse the compromise."

Anti-Immigrant Group Says Marches Have Helped Recruitment. The AP (4/27, Flaccus) reports "Minuteman organizers say this spring's marches" by advocate for undocumented immigrants in the US "have proved to be an unexpected recruitment tool for Americans who feel uneasy about the burgeoning immigration movement but may have considered the organization a pack of gun-toting vigilantes." Executive director Stephen Eichler said, "We're not trying to be more mainstream — mainstream has found us." The AP adds, "Since this spring's huge pro-immigrant rallies, 300 people nationwide have applied to start local chapters, according to Eichler. The group's goal is 500 chapters by December and a membership of 1 million within 1 1/2 years, Eichler said."

Immigrant Advocate Groups Split Over Business Boycott. The Washington Post (4/27, B1, Brulliard, Williams, 744K) reports, "Disagreement over whether immigrants should walk off the job and boycott businesses Monday appeared to deepen yesterday as one immigrant group mustered support for the protest while another group cautioned immigrants that it might put their jobs at risk." Although "groups in Dallas and Los Angeles say momentum is building for a major May 1 boycott," the Washington-area coalition "that organized the recent rally on the Mall has discouraged participation for fear it could lead to firings and create a negative climate as Congress debates immigration legislation."

The Washington Times (4/27, Summers, 90K) reports, "Local Hispanic elected officials yesterday discouraged participation in Monday's nationwide immigrant boycott of work and school and instead urged immigrants to show solidarity with American citizens." The Hispanic leaders "were responding to calls for a nationwide immigrant boycott organized by the California-based Latino Movement USA and Act Now to Stop War & End Racism (ANSWER) coalition."

US Business Group Criticizes Call For Mexican Boycott Of US Goods. The AP (4/27, Clendenning) reports US lobbyists "lashed out Wednesday at the Mexican 'Nothing Gringo' campaign timed for May 1 to coincide with the 'Day Without Immigrants' boycott in the United States." The American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico "said organizers are risking a backlash and foolishly targeting some of their best allies, since U.S. corporations have actively lobbied the U.S. Congress for immigration reform including legalization for many of the estimated 11 million undocumented migrants." Chamber president Larry Rubin said Mexicans' "refusal to 'buy American' on May 1 could further polarize the debate and make reform supporters seem anti-American at the very moment that lobbyists are trying to persuade lawmakers in Washington to pass a bill that would benefit migrants."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Tobar, Sánchez, 958K) reports, "Spreading now by word of mouth as well as through cyberspace, the campaign calls for a 24-hour boycott Monday of American businesses in Mexico and other Latin American countries. The idea is to show solidarity with immigrant rights protests scheduled in several U.S. cities that day." This week, "a growing number of business groups, trade unions and political leaders in Mexico said they planned to join the boycott, which will be on the traditional May Day holiday here." There is a "growing sense among Mexicans that proposals being debated by the U.S. Congress could hurt millions of compatriots who crossed over illegally." But for "some Mexicans, however, the talk of a boycott is worrisome. In the Mexico City neighborhood of Anzures, Carlos Torres pointed out that his McDonald's franchise was the joint investment of 'many families that are completely Mexican.'"

Anti-Immigrant Group Seeks To Limit Immigrant Rights In San Bernardino, California. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Powers, 958K) reports the "founder of an anti-illegal immigrant group is pushing for San Bernardino to outlaw day labor sites and bar the undocumented from renting property." Joseph Turner, "executive director of the group Save Our State, submitted voter petition signatures this week that would force a City Council vote or a citywide election on the measure, which would also deny city permits, contracts and grants to businesses that employ illegal immigrants, and require that city business be done in English." The "reaction to the proposal in San Bernardino has already ignited a fiery local debate."

Supreme Court Hears RICO Lawsuit Against Employer's Use Of Immigrant Labor. The Washington Times (4/27, Taylor, 90K) reports the lawyers "for employees of a Georgia-based manufacturer yesterday urged the Supreme Court to allow a lawsuit that accuses the flooring company of suppressing workers' wages by recruiting illegal aliens." The case "involves the politically explosive matter of illegal labor," but it "arrived before the justices because of a dispute over the lawsuit's use of the Racketeering Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) -- a law traditionally used to prosecute organized crime." Winning parties "in RICO cases can be awarded triple damages -- notably higher awards than winners in non-racketeering criminal cases." The group "of current and former Mohawk employees say the company violated RICO by systematically contracting outside recruiting firms to hire illegals. The lawsuit says Mohawk provided identification cards to illegal aliens, which helped them avoid detection by immigration authorities."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Gaouette, 958K) reports the case "could provide a new way to crack down on firms that hire undocumented immigrants." The justices "focused on narrow questions: Whether a firm and an outside contractor fit the definition of an 'enterprise' under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute, or RICO, and whether corporations could be sued at all under a law originally meant to chase down the mob." But with "a handful of similar cases already in the courts, a decision for the Mohawk employees could generate numerous civil suits against businesses reliant on immigrants. The decision could also affect the use of RICO in criminal cases. The Justice Department, which had a lawyer in court to support the employees' argument, uses the law to send corrupt union leaders to prison and win financial damages from pension funds."

Gingrich Blasts Current Immigration Reform Proposals. The Washington Times (4/27, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "said the government's failure to enforce immigration laws resembles its handling of Hurricane Katrina, and described current reform proposals in Congress as a 'con.'" In a speech at the American Enterprise Institute, Gingrich said "he sympathizes with illegal aliens participating in protests and placed blame for the illegal immigration problem on businesses and the federal government." Gingrich said, "I do not blame someone who leaves poverty to seek prosperity. They showed up here to work under a social contract and then [the government] tried to change the terms. We need to quit lying about who is hiring illegals -- it's Americans." The AP adds Gingrich's "own immigration reform plan, 'Ending the Dishonesty: The Way Forward on Border Control and Patriotic Immigration,' calls first for gaining control of America's borders, followed by a worker-visa program."

Most Say Immigrant's Nationality Should Not Be Factor. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) reports that with "immigration reform a hot-button issue in Washington, a strong majority of Americans say nationality shouldn't be a factor in U.S. immigration policy, according to a new Harris Interactive poll." Nearly "three-quarters of those polled said children of U.S. citizens should receive favorable treatment in order to immigrate into the U.S. and 67% said spouses should receive favorable treatment. But "about two-thirds of those polled said U.S. immigration policy shouldn't give preference to people from some countries over people from other countries, compared with 21% who said the U.S. policy should give preference."

Senate GOP Claims Votes To Sustain Veto Of Supplemental Spending Bill. The Washington Times (4/27, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Thirty-five Senate Republicans signed a letter yesterday assuring President Bush they will back his veto of the emergency-spending bill for war efforts and hurricane relief if the final version exceeds his requested budget level." Majority Leader Bill Frist said, "The Senate's willingness to support a veto reflects that we're not kidding about fiscal restraint and responsibility." The Times adds the "signatures indicate there are more than enough votes to prevent the Senate from securing the two-thirds vote needed to override a veto." But the "first few tests of senators' willingness to cut the bill didn't go well. Senators voted 49-48 to kill a proposal that would have stripped a highly contentious $700 million plan to reroute a railroad in Mississippi -- dubbed by critics as 'the railroad to nowhere.'"

But the Los Angeles Times (4/27, Simon, Reynolds, 958K) reports that despite the "veto threat, the Republican-controlled Senate on Wednesday refused to pare back an emergency spending bill sought by President Bush that lawmakers had expanded to include their own pet projects, which included items as diverse as aid for farmers and money to reroute a Mississippi railroad." The vote "was a direct rebuff of Bush by a number of GOP senators and underscored a growing party rift at a time when the president's popularity has sunk to new lows in public opinion polls." Sen. Trent Lott said, "I might be intimidated by my constituents, but not the president." The Times adds the Senate 'vote against cutting the $106.5-billion bill was a lopsided 72-26, more than enough to override a veto."

NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 4, 1:50, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "Many senators want taxpayers to pay another $700 million to tear" up the Mississippi railroad "and move it inland to make room for a highway. What's worse, critics say, is that the money has been tacked on to an emergency spending bill for the war in Iraq and victims of Katrina." Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma: "Think how much $700 million could do for the victims of Katrina, how many classrooms could be opened."

CQ (4/26, Higa, Plummer) reports the Senate's "fiscal conservatives trumpeted a promise by 35 Republican senators to back a veto if the total price tag is not much closer to the president's original $92.2 billion request for war funds and hurricane relief." But the "full Senate's repeated votes against major cuts likely mean that cutting the bill enough to avoid a veto would have to take place in a House-Senate conference on the legislation (HR 4939)."

CRS Estimates Iraq Costs To Double Before War Ends. The Washington Post (4/27, A16, Weisman, 744K) reports the Congressional Research Service estimated this week that the "cost of the war in Iraq will reach $320 billion after the expected passage next month of an emergency spending bill currently before the Senate, and that total is likely to more than double before the war ends." The analysis "provides the most official cost estimate yet of a war whose price tag will rise by nearly 17 percent this year. Just last week, independent defense analysts looking only at Defense Department costs put the total at least $7 billion below the CRS figure." Once the "war spending bill is passed, military and diplomatic costs will have reached $101.8 billion this fiscal year, up from $87.3 billion in 2005, $77.3 billion in 2004 and $51 billion in 2003, the year of the invasion, congressional analysts said." When "factoring in costs of the war in Afghanistan, the $811 billion total for both wars would have far exceeded the inflation-adjusted $549 billion cost of the Vietnam War."

Schoomaker Laments Complaints About Size Of Defense Budget. The AP (4/27, Jelinek) reports Army chief of staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker said "Americans spent as much on 'plastic Santa Clauses,' tinsel and other holiday purchases last year as they will for defense in the coming year…lamenting complaints about the military's budget requests." Schoomaker said "the defense budget the Bush administration requested for the fiscal year starting in October — nearly $440 billion — plus the costs of war in Iraq and Afghanistan, is 3.9 percent of the nation's nearly $13 trillion overall economy." The AP adds Schoomaker "was discussing his concern that it might take a fight to get enough money from Congress to rebuild the Army's equipment and supplies worn down in Iraq and Afghanistan."

House Democrats Demand Hearings On Iraq Reconstruction Waste. The AP (4/27, Schweid) reports the 23 Democrats on the House International Relations Committee "demanded congressional hearings on what they said was waste and fraud in reconstruction efforts." But panel Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., "said he had held nine hearings on Iraq, and Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said 'many committees including ours' had reviewed the Iraq situation." Tempers "flared as Democrats accused President Bush of failure and the GOP-controlled committee of shirking its responsibilities."

Coburn Praised For Effort To Cut Mississippi Railroad Reroute Funding. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) praises Sen. Tom Coburn in an editorial for forcing "an up-or-down vote on whether to strip the bill of $700 million for the proposed 'Railroad to Nowhere.' This pet project of Mississippi Republicans Trent Lott and Thad Cochran would reroute railroad tracks that CSX spent $250 million to repair after Hurricane Katrina." Is "this a good use of tax dollars? Mississippians don't think so. Last year Governor Haley Barbour's commission on recovery from Hurricane Katrina rejected the project as 'no longer seen as practical' because of the steep price tag. If Mississippians don't want to foot the bill, why should federal taxpayers?"

NYTimes Criticizes Bush For Supplemental Veto Threat. The New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "President Bush is threatening to veto this year's emergency budget supplement for the Iraq war and hurricane recovery efforts — he's suddenly shocked, shocked that his own Republican-led Senate has steadily inflated it with $14 billion in unrelated goodies. As if this sort of fiscal mayhem is not the now-familiar fallout from the administration's own signature fecklessness in adding to the record debt and deficit for future generations to handle."

Medicare Policy Offers Stability In Prescription Drug Coverage. The New York Times (4/27, Pear, 1.19M) reports the Bush Administration "issued a new policy on Wednesday that protects Medicare beneficiaries against the sudden loss of coverage for drugs they are taking under the prescription drug program." Insurers can "still change their lists of covered drugs, known as formularies. But if they drop any drugs or impose new restrictions, they must exempt beneficiaries who are now taking those drugs."

About 20% Hurt Financially By Participating In Medicare Drug Plan. USA Today (4/27, Wolf, Appleby, 2.31M) reports on those Medicare recipients "hurt, rather than helped" by the Medicare prescription drug plan. Most of the program's beneficiaries "have saved money since it began Jan. 1. But for others, perhaps about 20%, the much-heralded program has meant higher costs, and in some cases greater pain and more worry." Before Medicare, 6.4 million of them "had drug coverage through Medicaid. Others had state help or free drugs from drug companies." On Wednesday, "two advocacy groups and three patients sued the federal government in an effort to improve the plight of the 6.4 million people transferred from Medicaid to the Medicare plan."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Lin, 958K) reports a "class-action lawsuit filed in federal court Wednesday alleges that Medicare has failed to properly enroll millions of low-income seniors and disabled beneficiaries into its new prescription drug plan." The suit, "filed in Oakland on behalf of three women and two senior-advocacy groups, also alleges that some low-income beneficiaries eligible for a subsidy were not properly notified about it or not receiving it.

As a result of the problems, many seniors and others who qualify for the program are going without critical medication, said lead attorney Jeanne Finberg of the National Senior Citizens Law Center."

USA Today (4/27, Wolf, 2.31M) reports although "most of the more than 30 million beneficiaries enrolled in the program are saving money, two recent surveys suggest a substantial minority of seniors and people with disabilities are not." A Kaiser Family Foundation poll "taken April 6-11 found 55% of 154 seniors who had enrolled said the plan would save them money, 19% said it would cost more, and another 19% said they would break even." A KRC Research poll "taken March 15-20 for the Medicare Rx Education Network, a consortium of groups working to implement the law, found 59% of 201 enrolled seniors saved money, but 23% did not."

House Panel To Investigate Title Insurance Industry. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) reports that in the "wake of recent state and federal investigations into title insurance," Washington lawmakers "are turning critical toward the industry." A subcommittee of the House Financial Services Committee "met yesterday, with an eye toward pushing for more consumer friendly competition in the title business." Officials "in Colorado, California and Washington, D.C., have investigated the industry in recent years, in some cases alleging that title companies paid what amounted to kickbacks to get business."

Mollohan Denies Impropriety In Purchase Of Farm With Contractor. The Washington Post (4/27, A6, 744K) reports Rep. Alan B. Mollohan "said this week that his purchase of farm property with a corporate chief executive has no relationship to his support for legislation providing a $2.1 million defense contract to the CEO's company. Responding to a Wall Street Journal report published Tuesday, Mollohan said he and Dale R. McBride, head of FMW Composite Systems Inc. of Bridgeport, W.Va., have been close friends for 50 years." The Post adds, "Mollohan said he supported the $2.1 million contract for FMW after asking the same questions he applies to all decisions concerning money going to his home state: 'Is it a good project, and does it mean jobs and economic development for West Virginia?'"

House Members Say Ethics Reform Has Low Priority For Constituents. The Washington Post (4/27, A6, Birnbaum, Edsall, 744K) reports the "scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has been a Washington obsession for months, but Republican lawmakers who returned from a two-week recess this week said they felt free to pass a relatively tepid ethics bill because their constituents rarely mention the issue." The House votes today "on ethics legislation to increase lobbyists' disclosures and require lawmakers to own up to the earmarks, or narrow projects, that they insert into appropriations bills. But the measure would not restrict the gifts or meals provided by lobbyists as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) had proposed in January, nor would it expand the number of enforcers of lobbying rules and laws." Lawmakers "acknowledge that the bill is more limited in its scope and impact than the provisions promised by congressional leaders immediately after Abramoff's guilty plea to federal charges of bribery, conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud nearly four months ago. But they say they do not feel compelled to push more stringent measures partly because voters do not appear to be demanding them."

Knight Ridder (4/27, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Just weeks after declaring themselves fiscal and ethical reformers, lawmakers are adding billions of dollars in special projects to a spending bill for the Iraq war while retreating from some of the lobbying restrictions they'd once touted as the antidote to a spate of scandals." Congress' "continued appetite for unchecked spending and backpedaling on ethics illustrates how hard it is to change behavior that's ingrained in Washington's political culture."

The AP (4/27, Abrams) reports House approval the ethics overhaul "was complicated Wednesday by a Republican split over how to deal with the issue of earmarks, those narrow and often wasteful pet projects that make their way into bigger bills." With a "vote on the lobbying package scheduled for Thursday, the GOP leadership was trying to resolve concerns, coming mainly from Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee." The bill "allows lawmakers to raise points of order against appropriations, or spending bills, that do not properly identify earmarks. But Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., said it was unfair that the crackdown on earmarks was limited to spending bills, and did not apply to tax and authorization, or policy, bills."

CQ (4/26, Dennis, Poole) reports appropriators had been "holding firm in their threat to block floor action on the wide-ranging lobbying overhaul (HR 4975) unless a new earmark proposal was applied equally to authorizing legislation and tax bills, creating an uncertain environment for Thursday's scheduled floor vote." But authorizing committee chairmen "have resisted the appropriators' proposal, and conservatives who have waged a long battle to get earmark rule changes suggested appropriators were trying to affix a 'poison pill' to the lobbying measure to ensure its defeat."

Stabenow Campaign Moves To Correct "Glitch" In Campaign Finance Reports. The AP (4/27, Thomas) reports that Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow's (D) "campaign has corrected her campaign finance reports to show that some donations from 2002 and 2003 came from an Indian tribe then represented by now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, not an individual as she reported at the time. Stabenow's campaign originally reported that $4,000 in donations came from Christopher Petras, who was the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe's legislative director at the time. The donations came during a period in which Stabenow and other Michigan lawmakers sought funding for the tribe and wrote letters to federal regulators on the tribe's behalf." O

House Veterans Affairs Democrats Seek Probe Into Principi Firm's Contract. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Roche, 958K) reports House Veterans Affairs Committee Democrats are calling for hearings into a "multimillion-dollar contract awarded to a firm now headed by former Veterans Affairs Secretary Anthony J. Principi." Principi's QTC Management "administers medical exams under contract for the VA." In a letter to committee chairman Steve Buyer, "seven Democrats asked for investigations into exam costs by the company and into possible conflicts of interest in awarding the contract." The letter requests a hearing date no later than October 6. Principi "previously told The Times that he fully complied with federal ethics laws, and that as VA secretary for four years he played no role whatsoever in the awarding or administration of the contracts."

Columnist Claims Bush Legacy One Of Ineptitude. Bob Herbert in his column in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) writes, "The nation seems, very belatedly, to be catching on to the tragic failures and monumental ineptitude of its president. Mr. Bush's poll numbers are abysmal. Republicans up for re-election are running from him as if he were the bogyman." For example, in the face of global warming warnings, "Bush took his cues from the honchos in the oil and gasoline industry, the very people who were setting the planet on fire. Now he talks about overcoming the nation's addiction to oil! This is amazing. Here's the president of the United States scaling the very heights of chutzpah. The Bush people and the oil people are indistinguishable. Condoleezza Rice, a former Chevron director, even had an oil tanker named after her."

WSJournal Argues Administration Must Act In Restricting Freddie Mac, Fannie Mae. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) editorializes, "Last week the Federal Election Commission shed some light on how Freddie Mac rewarded its friends," as "admitted to illegally raising $1.7 million for candidates from both parties between 2000 and 2003." While "Freddie agreed to fork over $3.8 million in fines," it "probably figures it also got its money's worth," as reform is stalled in Congress. "The Bush Administration has been forceful in calling for Congress to reform how Fannie and Freddie are regulated and run," but it "could itself take the opportunity to rein in Freddie and Fannie," as "An overlooked provision of the laws that founded the two companies already gives the Treasury Secretary the power to restrict the duo's mortgage portfolios that now threaten the U.S. financial system." If the Administration wants reform "to succeed, it is going to have to show Fan and Fred and their friends on the Hill that Treasury will act if Congress doesn't."

Reports On Manufacturing, Housing Indicate Economy Expanding At Healthy Pace. The Washington Times/AP (4/27) reports, "A jump in demand for commercial aircraft pushed orders for big-ticket manufactured goods higher last month while sales of new homes shot up at the fastest pace in 13 years, reflecting a rebound from bad weather in February." The AP notes, "The Fed's 12 regional banks used words such as 'solid' and 'steady' to describe the economy's performance last month and early this month. The Fed did note that 'higher energy prices were at the forefront of most districts' mention of cost pressures,' and that was before crude oil soared to a record $75.17 per barrel Friday."

Bloomberg (4/27, Torres) adds, "Labor markets are 'tightening"and companies are struggling with higher energy prices because they're finding it difficult to pass those costs on to their customers, the central bank said today in its regional survey of the economy." The US economy "probably expanded at a 4.9 percent pace in the first quarter, the fastest since the third quarter of 2003, according to economists surveyed by Bloomberg."

The Financial Times (4/27, Swann) says "The figures suggest that US industry remains in extremely strong shape and increase the chances that the Federal Reserve may need to continue raising interest rates beyond 5 per cent."

But questioning the future of the US economy, the Wall Street Journal (4/27, Conkey, lp, 2.11M) reports, "The latest readings suggest the nation's economy is carrying significant momentum into the second quarter, raising new questions about when a slowdown might come after a torrid start to the year." After an expected growth of roughly 5% in the first quarter, "over the rest of the year, Federal Reserve officials expect growth to moderate to a long-term rate of 3% to 3.5%, slow enough to keep inflation at bay but fast enough to keep unemployment from rising. That would permit the Fed to stop the campaign of interest-rate increases it began in June 2004." Yet recently "the economy has been sending signals that it might not be ready to settle down. The housing market, though softer, is holding up better than many skeptics predicted and consumer confidence remains surprisingly strong, despite soaring gasoline prices, and concerns about President Bush's handling of the economy. Meanwhile, solid job creation and wage gains are providing a cushion for consumer spending, and orders for capital equipment are picking up."

Similarly, the New York Times (4/27, Bajaj, 1.19M) reports that "economists cautioned that higher energy costs and interest rates might sap some of that vitality."

Stock Market Sends Mixed Signals On Strong Economic Data. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Patterson, 2.11M) reports, "Wall Street can't seem to make up its mind about interest rates. New signs that the economy is on solid footing have caused investors to rethink expectations about the future course of interest rates in recent days -- and what higher rates mean for stocks." Recently, "the Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to a six-year high amid hopes the Federal Reserve would stop raising its target rate after one more quarter-point increase to 5% at their May meeting. Now, after several reports indicating the economy is stronger than previously thought, more investors think the Fed is likely to increase rates to 5.25% or more."

Bloomberg (4/27, Lawrence) adds, "The Dow average rose 71.24, or 0.6 percent, to 11,354.49, its highest since Jan. 19, 2000. The Dow, which first reached a six-year high last week, got an added lift from General Motors Corp. after Merrill Lynch & Co. said the carmaker has enough cash to pay workers who accept buyout offers. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 3.67, or 0.3 percent, to 1305.41, while the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 3.33, or 0.1 percent, to 2333.63. It was the first time all three indexes rose this week." The Financial Times (4/27John O', Doherty) also reports on the stock market.

Bernanke Not Expected To Reveal Plans On Interest Rates. The Washington Post (4/27, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke is going to disappoint a lot of listeners when he addresses Congress today and provides no guidance on when the central bank will stop raising interest rates to keep inflation under control." Observers "have longed for such a signal and thought they saw it last week when a summary of Fed officials' last policymaking meeting in March suggested they might be done after lifting their benchmark short-term rate once more in May." Yet, "that expectation has wilted as several new government reports have shown the economy is growing briskly and inflation may be moving higher. Fed policymakers almost certainly will raise their benchmark rate again at their May 10 meeting but will be unable to indicate then whether they are done or see more increases in store."

Democrats' Generic Ballot Advantage Shrinks By Seven Points To 45%-39%. On NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 2, 2:35, 9.87M), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert discussed the results of the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. Russert said, "65% of the American people disapprove the job Congress is doing. Only 22% approve. That disapproval rate is up 12 points." But "when asked who do you want to control Congress, 39% say Republicans, 45% say Democrats, a six point plus fro the Dems. But a month ago, look at this, Brian, it was 13 points. So the people seem to be saying we're mad at both parties. We prefer the Democrats a little bit but we prefer to hear some viable alternatives coming from them."

Professor Says Discontent With War May Cost GOP Control Of Congress. Rutgers University professor

Ross Baker in an op-ed in USA Today (4/27, 2.31M) writes, "A pattern emerges from all elections of the past century conducted in wartime: The contest turns into an expression of discontent with war." And "a war of uncertain duration, even one in which the trend lines are promising, might be too great a surge for members of the president's party to withstand. Combat fatigue is not a condition found only on the battlefield; it is also an affliction that has often been diagnosed in the voting booth."

Poll Says Only 12% Of Democrats Believe Clinton Can Win White House. AFP (4/26) reported that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "is the favorite among Democratic voters to be the party's candidate in the 2008 presidential election, according to a poll. But only 12 percent of Democrat electors believe" she "can overcome the hostility of US Republicans to take the White House, according to the Financial Dynamics poll for The Hotline political newsletter." Clinton "had support from 38 percent of Democrats, a 24 percentage point lead over nearest rival," Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D). On the GOP side, Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "was the leading Republican candidate among Democrats. Fifty-five percent of the 603 people questioned had a favorable view of" McCain, "a higher rating than many Democratic party chiefs received. The poll, carried out April 19-23, had a margin of error of four percentage points."

Study Finds Increasing Proportion Of Uninsured Americans. ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 6, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A new study out today shows a sharp increase in the number of middle income workers who lack health insurance. Last year 41% of this group was uninsured for at least part of the year, up from 28% in 2001. There were also more likely to skip health screenings such as mammograms."

The AP (4/27, Agovino) reports that a report by the Commonwealth Fund, a New York-based private, health care policy foundation "paints a bleak health care picture for the uninsured." It found that "the percentage of working-age Americans with moderate to middle incomes who lacked health insurance for at least part of the year rose to 41 percent in 2005, a dramatic increase from the 28 percent in 2001." Also, "more than half of the uninsured adults said they were having problems paying their medical bills or had incurred debt to cover their expenses."

Electricity Consumers Face Massive Rate Hikes In Fifteen States. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 4, 2:25, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "Fifteen states, all of them states that deregulated electricity years ago, are facing major electrical price shocks, including a 100% hike in parts of Delaware. Here's what happened: Under deregulation, utilities like Baltimore Gas and Electric, BG&E, would sell off their power plants, buy power wholesale and let the market determine the true price of electricity. But in return, consumers were supposed to be allowed to buy their electricity from different suppliers who would compete to lower the prices. That part has not happened. Ratepayers, in other words, were supposed to have a choice, not a 'take it or leave it' electric bill." At BG&E, "officials point out that electric rates have been capped for seven years, years in which fuel costs for natural gas, for oil, and even for coal have shot skyward. Welcome, they are saying, to the real price of energy."

Khamenei Threatens Retaliation If Attacked. Iran's leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned that his country would attack U.S. targets world wide if Iran is attacked for continuing its nuclear program. In a front page story, the Washington Post (4/27, A1, Moore, Ricks, 744K) reports that the Ayatollah is "escalating the threats between Washington and Tehran" and is part of "a campaign of defiance by senior Iranian officials." Besides this threat, "in a spate of statements this week, Iranian officials have also threatened to cut oil production, export nuclear technology, bar international nuclear monitors, make their nuclear program entirely secret and withdraw from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty." The AP (4/27, Karimi) quotes Khamenei: "Iran will respond twofold to any attack."

The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "With neither side blinking, Iran and the international community are preparing to take the next step in their showdown over Tehran's nuclear ambitions." The dispute "returns Friday to the United Nations Security Council, where the Iranian regime is hoping a divide-and-conquer strategy will prevent the UN body from taking any coercive action to limit its nuclear program. It may be a bold gambit: Just a month ago, the Council acted - unanimously - to give Iran 30 days to show it had ceased uranium enrichment." Yet, "the Security Council, in fact, is split over the need for action against a defiant Tehran."

House Passes Bill To Toughen Sanctions On Iran. The Washington Times (4/27, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "The House yesterday overwhelmingly passed a bipartisan bill" by a vote of 397-21 "that toughens sanctions against Iran until the country dismantles its nuclear programs, with supporters saying the move is a "key component of our war on terror." It "sends the message 'the United States expects Iran to be a responsible member of the international community,' said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican."

The AP (4/27, Abrams) adds, "Supporters emphasized that the legislation does not authorize the use of force in Iran and was a proper response to the Tehran government's nuclear ambitions. A nuclear Iran, said Rep. Christopher Smith (news, bio, voting record), R-N.J. 'will be a devastating blow to peace and security, not only in the Middle East, but in the entire world.'"

Chinese Leader Not Expected To Support Sanctions. The Washington Times (4/27, Gertz, 90K) reports, "President Bush directly appealed to Chinese President Hu Jintao last week to support economic sanctions on Iran for not abiding by international controls on its nuclear program, but Mr. Hu refused to do so now, Bush administration officials said." One source said, "They left open the possibility that they could support sanctions in the future."

Azerbaijan Will Not Host US Strikes Against Iran. The start of Azeri President Ilham Aliev's US visit was sparsely covered. However, the AP (4/26, Schweid) reported Aliev "opened a three-day visit to the United States on Wednesday by saying he would not allow his country to be used by the U.S. for any operations against neighboring Iran. Aliev, scheduled to meet with President Bush on Friday, cited a 'very clear' agreement with Iran that the two countries would not permit their territory to be used for operations against the other." Aliev "said he would remain at arms' length from" any military action against Tehran. "Azerbaijan wants to remain an 'island of stability' in the region, Aliev said." On a key regional issue, Aliev "said Azerbaijan's recovery of the" Nagorno-Karabakh enclave, currently controlled by Armenia, "was not subject to negotiations."

Poll Shows Rice Is The Most Popular Of Top Administration Officials. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer)) reported, "Our new CNN poll conducted by Opinion Research Corporation shows, Rice is the most popular of the top Bush administration officials. She's rated favorably by more than 57 percent of respondents. President Bush is next at 40 percent, although 57 percent viewed him unfavorably. Thirty-five percent view Vice President Cheney favorably, while Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld finds favor with just 33 percent."

Rice To Attend ASEAN Regional Forum. AFP (4/26) reported Secretary Rice "has confirmed she will attend Southeast Asia's annual security meeting here in [Kuala Lumpur], Malaysian Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar said." Hamid noted Bangladesh will attend for the first time as an observer, and "discussions will focus on issues including global terrorism and energy prices." AFP adds, "Rice shunned the ARF meeting in Laos last year, instead sending her deputy in what was seen as an attempt to pressure ASEAN into pushing its recalcitrant member Myanmar to introduce democratic reforms."

Latin American Leaders Unhappy With US Trade Deals. The AP (4/27, Goodman) reports, "Since 2003, when attempts to secure a hemispheric-wide free trade zone broke down, U.S. negotiators have signed bilateral, free trade agreements with nine Latin American nations. Two more, with Ecuador and Panama, are in the pipeline." The deals "have been an unqualified success for American exporters. For example, U.S. exports to Chile have almost doubled, to $5.2 billion last year, in the two years since the two countries signed a deal, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative said." Yet "among Latin Americans, the dollar diplomacy has left a bitter taste."

US Targets UN Peacekeeping Operations. The Washington Times (4/27, Pisik, 90K) reports, "The United Nations confirmed yesterday the U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating suspected wrongdoing in the office that handles procurement for U.N. peacekeeping operations." And a GAO report "to be delivered to Congress today describes the procurement office as understaffed, poorly trained and badly lacking the oversight that would uncover corruption, fraud and waste."

Suicide Bombers Target Peacekeepers In Egypt. Two days after the Egyptian resort bombings, suicide bombers targeted a multinational peacekeeping force, but killed only themselves. The New York Times (4/27, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that the bombers' timing "and the location in one of the Egypt's highest security zones raised concerns that the country might again be faced with the kind of sustained terrorist threat it struggled to suppress a decade ago," and the government "appeared stumped over to how to safeguard its tourist industry in the Sinai, one of the pillars of the nation's economy." Coming after Monday's attacks, these "added to a general sense of anxiety, both inside and outside the government, over challenges facing" Egypt. The Washington Post (4/27, A14, Williams, 744K) adds that the bombings "displayed the Egyptian government's continuing difficulty in pacifying the rugged Sinai region."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 6, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "There was another bomb attack today in Egypt's Sinai Desert. Two suicide bombers struck international peacekeepers near the Gaza border, but only blew themselves up."

Egypt Blames Resort Bombings On Bedouin Tribesmen. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 7, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Also today, Egypt said its investigation of Monday's bombings in the Sinai tourist town of Dahab has turned up a link to Bedouin tribesmen who are blamed for earlier attacks on resorts in the same area."

Putin Warns Europe Russian Oil Could Go East. The New York Times (4/27, Kramer, 1.19M) reports that "President Vladimir V. Putin said Wednesday that Russia should direct future oil and natural gas exports to Asia because 'unprincipled competition' had blocked its energy companies from expanding elsewhere." The comments "seemed to reflect, in part, unhappiness at Gazprom," as, "outside of Germany, Gazprom's business is not progressing smoothly." Putin's "swagger…suggests his government believes it now has a strong negotiating hand with Europe on energy issues." However, "energy analysts say it is unlikely that Russia could intentionally curtail exports to Europe because of the high cost of unused export capacity."

The Wall Street Journal (4/27, A6, Chazan, 2.11M) runs a headline calling the warning a "power play" and agrees that "many analysts say that for the time being, Gazprom's threat to sell its gas elsewhere is empty rhetoric." It says that the comments are "ratcheting up the tension in an escalating row over Russia's international energy ambitions."

Putin Reverses Pipeline Decision. The New York Times (4/27, Myers, 1.19M) reports that, in a decision that "underscored Mr. Putin's highly centralized power and his penchant for dramatic gestures," he "reversed a controversial government decision" and ordered "that an oil pipeline being built across Siberia be rerouted away from the northern shore of Lake Baikal." The "unexpected reversal" that "appeared choreographed for state television networks," followed "rare public protests."

Sudan's Bashir Rejects UN Peacekeepers In Darfur. The Washington Post (4/27, A21, Lynch, 744K) reports Sudanese President Omar Bashir "rejected a U.N. appeal to allow its peacekeepers into the Darfur region to help stem" the "tide of violence" there. It "represented a setback for a U.S.-backed proposal to send more than 15,000 U.N. and NATO peacekeepers to Darfur to replace an underequipped African Union force of more than 6,000 troops." Continued denial of access to the UN assessment team will, UN officials have said, prevent UN planning for the mission takeover to proceed. The Post says "the Bush administration accused Khartoum of stalling. 'This is just delaying and delaying and delaying, and it's consistent with the pattern that the Sudanese government has followed for years in this,' said" US Ambassador John Bolton.

In a dim assessment of diplomatic options to resolve the Darfur conflict, the New York Times (4/27, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports, "As the violence…grows ever more deadly, Bush administration officials now acknowledge that they have few if any promising policy options for containing the carnage. If there is no agreement by Sunday on a way to resolve the crisis, the long-running peace talks are to be disbanded. But hopes for an agreement are low. … For the administration, the greatest hope centers on the peace talks in Abuja, Nigeria, which have limped along for almost two years." Deputy Secretary Zoellick "said in an interview on Wednesday, 'There's a fighting chance' to reach agreement by Sunday. … 'If there is no peace accord, then it becomes a different mission.'"

Maoists Declare Truce In Nepal, Show Signs Of Inner Conflict. The Financial Times (4/27, Bhattarai) reports, "Maoist rebels in Nepal declared a unilateral three-month truce on Thursday ahead of the country's first parliamentary meeting" and "lifted their blockades on highways following assurances by the leaders of the seven parties that they would hold a constituent assembly election." Maoist party chairman Prachanda said it is "an attempt to 'encourage' the seven parties to declare an 'unconditional' constituent assembly election to re-write the constitution for a 'democratic republic.'"

The Washington Post (4/27, A19, Lancaster, 744K) adds that the Maoists have a dilemma in they want "to retain a voice in above-ground politics but not at the price of abandoning its weapons or dreams of communist utopia." Their "struggle to reconcile its hard-line ideology with popular will was evident in its muddled response to Gyanendra's announcement" he would reinstate politics. However, "some analysts…say they believe that the tumult of recent weeks could open the way for an end to the insurgency, by creating a new political framework in which the Maoists can work peacefully."

Series Of Challenges Said To Tax Blair's Survival Skills. In highly pessimistic tones, the AP (4/26, Gardiner) reports, "In a single disastrous day, one of Prime Minister Tony Blair's closest allies came under fire over a prisoner release scandal, his deputy admitted an extramarital fling, and his health secretary endured jeers from nurses. The headaches are piling up for Blair and his Labour Party ahead of local elections that could reduce the British leader's chances of hanging on to power if they go badly." Although Blair's Labor government routinely faces criticism, the AP notes, "crime and immigration are key political issues, so the disclosures have the potential to do real damage to Blair. Clarke is a crucial ally in Blair's power struggle with Treasury chief Gordon Brown, who is eager for the prime minister to step aside so he can take over."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Jury Ends Third Day Of Deliberations. The AP (4/27) reports, "Jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui case completed a third day of deliberations Wednesday without deciding whether the Sept. 11 conspirator should be executed or imprisoned for life." The AP continues, "After 6 1/4 hours of work on Wednesday, the nine men and three women had deliberated for 16 hours over three days. They were to return Thursday morning. … Jurors have asked only one question - a request on Tuesday for a dictionary. U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema denied the request, saying that giving them a dictionary would be like placing extraneous evidence in the jury room. She said jurors could submit a written question if they needed specific definitions."

Judge Denies Reporters' Request For Juror Interviews. The AP (4/27, Ohlemacher) reports, "The judge in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial turned down a request from reporters from 14 news organizations Wednesday to ask jurors to discuss their verdict once the trial ends. … 'I do not believe it is appropriate for the court to serve as an intermediary between the media and the jurors,' U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in a letter to the news organizations. 'Accordingly, I will not communicate your request to the jurors.'" The AP adds, "The reporters, backed by a half-dozen other news organizations, delivered a letter to the judge early Wednesday asking her to tell jurors - whose identities have remained secret - of the public's interest in knowing how the jury reached its verdict. They requested that the message be delivered as the jurors prepare to leave the courthouse at the end of the trial. … The reporters' letter offered willing jurors a place away from the courthouse for interviews and, for those concerned about their safety, the possibility of doing it off-camera."

Report Finds Hundreds Of Detainees Abused. Knight Ridder (4/27, Brown) reports, "Three human rights groups said Wednesday that they had found credible evidence that U.S. troops and government civilians in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had abused, tortured or killed at least 460 detainees." Knight Ridder continues, "The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved. The findings are in a report by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch. … At least 600 U.S. service members or civilians have been implicated in the cases of abuse. About 400 of them have been investigated, and only one-third of those who have been investigated have faced punishment of any kind, researchers said." Knight Ridder adds, "The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers. … It shows that detainee abuse has been more widespread that government officials have admitted and the American military and other government agencies have made only limited attempts to investigate and punish those responsible, the rights groups charged."

Judge Won't Block Detainees' Confinement To Maximum Security, Solitary. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Williams, 958K) reports that a war crimes tribunal judge has decided "against second-guessing detention camp authorities in their decision to confine to maximum security and solitary confinement the 10 terrorism suspects who have been charged. Navy Capt. Daniel O'Toole rejected a request by the Army defense lawyer for accused bomb maker Sufyian Barhoumi that his handicapped client be returned to the communal detention camp where he had been living until four weeks ago in recognition of his good behavior."

Gitmo Called A "Great Lie." P. Sabin Willett, a Boston lawyer who represents Saddiq Ahmad Turkistani, who is about to begin his fifth year of imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay, writes in the Washington Post (4/27, A27, 744K), "One day the sordid history of Guantanamo will be written. There will be chapters on torture, chapters on the how the courts turned a blind eye, chapters on cruelties large and petty, on the massive stupidity and uselessness of the place. Many pages will illustrate the great lie of Guantanamo -- that it is a 'terrorist detention facility' -- with accounts of goatherds and chicken farmers and stray foreigners sold by Pakistani grifters to the United States for bounties."

UK Studies Saudi's Use Of Clerics To Moderate Terror Prisoners. The Washington Times (4/27, Guardia, 90K) reports, "British security chiefs are studying a novel Saudi approach to combating terror -- using clerics to debate 'jihad' with imprisoned militants and convert them to more moderate beliefs. The Saudi authorities said about 400 of 700 extremists had been re-educated and released from prison. The Islamic 'counseling' program is part of what British experts regard as Saudi Arabia's 'model counterterrorism campaign.'"

US Seeks To Combat Terrorism Financing. Voice of America (4/27, Ferdinando) reports, "Money laundering and terrorist financing are global problems that transcend borders. Terrorist supporters funnel money through charities and international criminal gangs constantly adapt their techniques, while law enforcement agencies try to stay one step ahead." VOA continues, "Terrorists are financed by smuggled funds, criminal activities or any other number of ways -- even by governments themselves, according to U.S. officials. … Targeting that support is a key action for law enforcement, as top U.S. Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser explains: 'By taking the steps that we're taking by disrupting, dismantling these financial networks that are supporting these activities, we are degrading the ability of these organizations to get to the stage where they only have a few more dollars to spend to complete a terrorist attack.' … But it's impossible to say how much money goes into terrorism each year. And stopping that flow is extremely challenging, according to David Caruso, founder of the Virginia-based Dominion Advisory Group, an anti-money laundering consulting firm. … And terrorists are constantly looking for new methods to avoid detection and secure funding, says Jeffrey Breinholt, deputy counterterrorism chief at the U.S. Department of Justice. … 'It's important to view terrorists as being organized criminals,' says Breinholt. 'Terrorists are nothing if not adaptable and opportunistic. And so if we accept that as a notion, that large terrorist groups that we are targeting -- al-Qaida, Hezbollah, Hamas -- they will be ones that will pay very much attention to things that arise that are new opportunistic crimes.'"

Mueller Says Decentralized Terror Cells Emerging As US Disrupts Al Qaeda. The AP (4/27, Milton) reports that since 9/11, "law enforcement has witnessed the emergence of a new threat, homegrown terrorist cells, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Wednesday" in a speech at the James M. Fox memorial lecture series in New York City. Mueller noted, "What we see is a new threat that is decentralized. We have seen homegrown terrorist cells not answerable to a particular leader but to an ideology." Mueller said that US "success in driving terrorists from Afghanistan, cutting off their funding and disrupting their operations has forced them to change" and caused "law enforcement to adapt its traditional strategy of pursuing terrorists." Still, Mueller added, "We cannot forget that people overseas are plotting against the United States and would want nothing more than to replicate September 11th."

US Attorney, FBI Say Lodi Terror Investigation Continues. The AP (4/27, Thompson) reports Lodi, Calif. residents "had hoped to set aside the suspicions that divided them in the 11 months since federal agents arrested" Hamid and Umer Hayat on terrorism charges, but US Attorney McGregor Scott "said Wednesday that the investigation is continuing." FBI Sacramento SAC Drew Parenti added, "There are aspects of this (case) which remain under investigation." But Lodi Mayor Susan Hitchcock said that "Scott's comment about a continuing investigation 'reopens an old wound,' aggravating suspicions of and within the Muslim community that had just begun to heal, said Hitchcock."

Legal Experts Say Hamid Hayat Conviction Likely To Be Overturned. The New York Times (4/27, Broder, 1.19M) reports US Attorney McGregor Scott "said in a telephone interview Wednesday that the conviction…showed that the government was capable of winning a jury trial on terrorism charges after a number of high-profile failures elsewhere. … But legal experts said the prosecution's celebration might be short-lived because a federal appeals court had twice ruled unconstitutional some aspects" of the material support law "on which Mr. Hayat was convicted. They also said Mr. Hayat's reported confessions to F.B.I. agents could be challenged on the ground they were coerced from a frightened suspect with a limited command of English."

Foreman Says Jury Voted Overwhelmingly For Conviction. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Tempest, Bailey, 958K) reports that in the Hamid Hayat jury deliberations, "the scorecard read like an NBA blowout. By the time the jury finished voting on each piece of evidence, the score was 135-40 for the prosecution." Hamid Hayat jury foreman Joe Cote said that "key to the jury's decision…were Hayat's own words on an FBI videotape that he had attended a camp, his comments secretly recorded by an undercover informant that indicated Hayat's 'willingness' to go for training and a handwritten warrior's prayer in Arabic found in his wallet." Regarding the one undecided juror last week, who prompted a letter to the judge Friday warning of a possible deadlock, "Cote and others denied any ganging up. … She came to her guilty verdict simply by 'thinking about it over the weekend.'"

Juror Says She Hopes Verdict Deters Terrorism. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Tempest, Bailey, 958K) also reports that juror Starr Scaccia "said she hoped the jury verdict would be a deterrent in the war on terrorism. 'I hope it gets the message out: Don't mess with the United States,' she said. 'It's not worth it.'"

CIA Dismisses Allegations It Has Warned Former Agents Against Contacts With Media. The Financial Times (4/27, Sevastopulo) reports, "The Central Intelligence Agency has warned former employees not to have unapproved contacts with reporters, as part of a mounting campaign by the administration to crack down on officials who leak information on national security issues." One "former official said the CIA recently warned several retired employees who have consulting contracts with the agency that they could lose their pensions by talking to reporters without permission. He added that while the threats might be legally 'hollow,' they were having a chilling effect on former employees." But the CIA "called the allegations 'rubbish'. Jennifer Millerwise Dyke, spokeswoman for CIA director Porter Goss, said former employees with consulting deals could lose their contracts for violating the CIA secrecy agreement by having unauthorised conversations with reporters. But she stressed that under current law, 'termination of a contract does not affect pensions.'"

Broder Blames Bush For Tension Between Administration, Reporters. David Broder in his column in the Washington Post (4/27, A27, 744K) writes, "The tension between the legitimate claims of secrecy and the need for public accountability remains, however, and in many respects has grown worse. The main reason is the reluctance of this president and his administration to accept a broad and continuing responsibility to keep the public and the press informed on the reasons for the policies they have adopted." His "approach has been one of announcing a policy after it has been completed in his relatively closed circle of decision makers and then simply reiterating that policy in any number of prearranged settings. His news conferences and interviews are infrequent, and they rarely offer insights into the reasoning behind his conclusions."

European Investigators Allege CIA Made Rendition Flights. The New York Times (4/27, Bilefsky, 1.19M) reports, "Investigators for the European Parliament said Wednesday that data gathered from air safety regulators and others found that the Central Intelligence Agency had flown 1,000 undeclared flights over European territory since 2001. Sometimes the planes stopped to pick up terrorism suspects who had been kidnapped to take them to countries that use torture, the investigators added." Butt "hey could not say how many flights involved the transport of suspects" and "the new report offered no hard evidence" about alleged secret detention centers in Europe.

The AP (4/27, Sliva) reports, "Cases of terror suspects being secretly handed over to U.S. agents did not appear to be isolated, the lawmakers said in a preliminary report on their inquiry. European human rights treaties prohibit sending suspects to states known to torture prisoners."

The Washington Post (4/27, A20, Whitlock, 744K) adds, "The preliminary report also criticized several European countries -- including Sweden, Italy and Macedonia -- saying they had allowed CIA officers to apprehend or detain terrorism suspects on their soil and then covered up their presence."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Jurors Hear More Informant Tapes At NYC Subway Bomb Plot Trial. The New York Times (4/27, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "A fuller picture emerged yesterday of an alleged plot to bomb the Herald Square subway station and of the Pakistani immigrant charged as its prime author, as prosecutors again played secretly recorded conversations between the man and a police informer." In the recordings, Shahawar Matin Siraj told "the informer he expected that the blast in the subway station would bring down the Manhattan Mall on the street above," but in another conversation, "he said he wanted to bomb the station in the early morning hours to cause only economic damage and kill as few people as possible." The Times adds, "On the tapes…Siraj seemed to alternate between shrewd, bumbling and bizarre."

Closing Arguments Made At 9/11 Perjury Trial. The New York Times (4/27, Confessore, Baranauckas, 1.19M) reports, "A tangled four-and-half-year legal battle drew toward an end yesterday as prosecutors and defense lawyers made closing arguments in the case of a Jordanian college student accused of lying to a federal grand jury about his relationship with two Sept. 11 hijackers. Prosecutors say the student, Osama Awadallah…lied when he testified under oath at an October 2001 grand jury hearing that he did not know…Khalid al-Midhar, and denied having written his name in a school notebook before conceding during a later hearing that he had met Mr. Midhar." But defense attorney Jesse Berman "painted a very different picture, that of a young immigrant…with limited English, disoriented after nearly three weeks of solitary confinement and with no reason to mislead the grand jury."

Van Hollen Says Terrorists Training In Wisconsin. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (4/2, Forster, 266K) reports, "There are terrorists training and raising money in Wisconsin, Republican attorney general candidate J.B. Van Hollen said Wednesday in a Capitol news conference. … Van Hollen said that based on information he had access to as U.S. attorney, he was aware that the FBI and other law enforcement officials were monitoring potential threats, but that there wasn't enough activity or information to act." Milwaukee FBI Supervisory Special Agent Mike Johnson "said Van Hollen's comment about the FBI was 'completely inappropriate' because Van Hollen doesn't speak for the agency." The AP (4/27) notes that Van Hollen's Republican and Democratic "opponents immediately demanded that he give up what he knows."

House Panel Passes Port Security Bill. One day after Secretary Chertoff announced that the Department of Homeland Security will begin conducting background checks on 400,000 seaport workers, the House Homeland Security Committee unanimously passed a $2.4 billion bill yesterday that would increase random cargo inspections. The Washington Times (4/27, Hudson, 90K) reports that the bill "requires…98 percent of all containers be screened for nuclear materials." Democrats, whose proposal that all containers be screened for nuclear devices within five years was rejected by a 18-16 vote, "say the nuclear screening requirement is weak," but the "legislation has bipartisan support."

The AP (4/27, Barrett) reports Republicans said the five year deadline amendment, offered by Rep. Edward Markey, "was unrealistic and the scanner technology is still too faulty to deploy through a mammoth port system that handles 20,000 cargo containers every day. At that, some Democrats erupted." Rep. Peter DeFazio accused "GOP leaders of buckling to pressure from business groups that oppose greater regulation. Republicans denied any influence from lobbyists."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (4/27, Hulse, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that "a little-noticed provision added to a spending measure last year" by Rep. Harold Rogers designated an arm of a "trade group with which he has longstanding ties as the central operator of a new federal program to perform background checks on 750,000 maritime workers." Rogers argued yesterday that the American Association of Airport Executives' Transportation Security Clearinghouse "had already performed 2 million background checks on airport workers" and that he saw "no reason to waste more time and money reinventing the wheel," but the Bush administration says "that the earmark is threatening to further delay a program to issue new tamper-proof identification cards to the nation's port workers." Secretary Chertoff said yesterday that "he intends to start the new program by the end of this year," though "the administration, in proposing the 2007 federal budget, made clear that it opposed the requirement by Mr. Rogers, asking Congress to strike it."

New Hampshire Taking Lead In Opposition To Real ID. The Washington Times/AP (4/27) reports, "New Hampshire suddenly has become a battleground in the fight over privacy rights versus homeland security, with state legislators voting against strict new federal standards for issuing driver's licenses." New Hampshire's "Republican-controlled" House "voted overwhelmingly" last month to block the state from participating in the Real ID. "A vote in the Republican-dominated Senate is expected in two weeks after a committee endorsement yesterday. Gov. John Lynch, a Democrat, remains undecided." The state's bill is the toughest measure making real progress anywhere," according to Barry Steinhardt, director of the Technology and Liberty Program of the ACLU.

Number Of TSA Fines Declined Last Year. USA Today (4/27, Levin, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "The number of passengers fined for security violations at airports fell dramatically last year as the federal government focused on more serious threats, according to records and government officials. The Transportation Security Administration issued 4,459 fines against passengers in 2005, a 54% decrease from 2004. The vast majority of fines are doled out to people trying to bring weapons and other dangerous items on planes."

Since 9/11, Pentagon Has Stepped Up Domestic Surveillance. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, Block, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that the 9/11 terror attacks "have sparked a broad effort by the Pentagon to gather intelligence within US borders. Its goals are both to protect military facilities and keep an eye out for any threat on American soil." The Journal reports that "several parts of the vast Pentagon bureaucracy are building large databases of information from sources including local police, military personnel and the Internet. In doing so, the military is edging toward a sensitive area that has been off-limits to it since the 1970s: domestic surveillance and law enforcement." The Journal adds, "The broad Pentagon effort comes amid a surge of popular support after the 9/11 attacks for more vigilant efforts to prevent terrorism."

Questions Raised About Use Of Private Security Firms On Military Bases. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Marks, 61K) reports that since the 9/11 attacks, some of America's most sensitive military installations have been guarded by private security companies. The installations include "Fort Bragg in North Carolina, the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico, and the Picatinny Arsenal in New Jersey. Now, concerns about accountability and the caliber of the private guards are leading some critics, both inside and outside government, to ask whether this is a job too vital for the military to outsource to civilians." A recent GAO report found that some of the private contractors "had hired felons, had missing and incomplete records, and in one case, had falsified records on weapons and training. … The GAO's conclusion: The Army's screening procedures for the private guards are 'inadequate and put the Army at risk,' despite previous agency warnings about such problems during the past three years."

Bill Would Provide Nearly $1 Billion For Negroponte's Office. The house yesterday passed an intelligence bill that would increase the money available to National Intelligence director John Negroponte. The AP (4/27, Shrader) reports, "Democrats made an unsuccessful, last-minute push to block the bill to protest that Republicans wouldn't allow adequate debate on the legality of the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program. The legislation was nevertheless approved 327-96. It provides budgeting guidelines for 16 U.S. spy agencies and the office of National Intelligence Director John Negroponte. The bill's total cost is classified, but intelligence agencies' spending is believed to top $40 billion a year. Under the legislation, Negroponte's office would get nearly $1 billion."

Rizzo Hearing Likely To Become Forum To Discuss CIA Practices. Newsweek (4/27, Hosenball) reports, "John Rizzo's upcoming confirmation hearing should offer administration critics a forum to discuss controversial practices by the CIA. It's not exactly the full-scale congressional inquiry Bush critics have long demanded. But some time fairly soon, members of the Senate Intelligence Committee are going to have an opportunity to grill a senior Central Intelligence Agency official in public and private about the agency's controversial procedures for handling high-level terrorist suspects—and about the CIA's efforts to thwart media leaks." Newsweek adds that "officials on Capitol Hill and inside the intelligence community said that everyone involved in the confirmation process is aware that the hearings are likely to become a forum in which administration critics, particularly Senate Democrats, can question a senior agency official in detail about contentious CIA procedures for detaining and interrogating prisoners, as well as the agency's practice of 'rendition,' in which terror suspects are transported by undercover agency operatives to foreign countries."

Developer, State Reach Deal On WTC Site. The AP (4/27, Westfeldt) reports that developer Larry Silverstein reached an agreement with New York state officials under which he will give up control over the planned, 1,776-foot Freedom Tower at the World Trade Center cite in New York City. The AP reports, "Officials with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the property, had been pressing Silverstein, who holds the 99-year lease on the site, to give up some control over the project. City and state officials had argued that Silverstein lacked the money to build it all and was running the risk of an embarrassing failure. … Silverstein agreed to give control of the $2.1 billion Freedom Tower and another planned skyscraper to the Port Authority. He will still build three other towers at the site."

NYTimes Praises Silverstein Deal. An editorial in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) calls Silverstein's acceptance of a deal that will reduce his role at ground zero "some of the best news" New York City "had about Lower Manhattan in the past four years." The Times adds, "The widespread relief over this agreement is a perfect testament to how badly blocked the redevelopment effort in Lower Manhattan has been in the last two years. There have been many obstructions, including Mr. Silverstein himself."

Questions Raised About Plans For Ground Zero. The New York Times (4/27, Bagli, 1.19M) reports, "The new plan for ground zero calls for the accelerated construction of a sprawling commercial complex: 8.8 million square feet of office space in four towers 58 to 70 stories high. All would open within a year of each other, by 2012. Gov. George E. Pataki and others say the conceptual plan, officially approved yesterday by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey after months of gridlock, will rejuvenate Lower Manhattan and ensure that it remains the financial capital of the world." However some construction and real estate industry executives "are questioning whether the rapid building of so much speculative office space would have the same destabilizing consequences for the downtown market as the twin towers had in the 1970's."

Film On United Flight 93 Premieres. NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 9, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Something extraordinary happened a few blocks from here in New York City last night. It was the premiere at the Ziegfeld Theater of the new film called 'United 93.' First, an important point here -- the film's distributor is Universal and our parent company is NBC Universal and this could not be less about selling tickets." When "the film came to its jolting stop, the theater was filled with the eerie and awful and achingly sad sound of people crying, heaving with emotion, the sobs and moans from those who were overpowered by what they had just seen. A thousand people then left the theater in silence."

Father Of Flight 93 Passenger Praises "United 93." David Beamer, father of Todd Beamer, a passenger on United Airlines Flight 93, writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) that the makers of "United 93," the film about the passengers and crew of United Flight 93 who fought back against the terrorists who hijacked their plane on 9/11, "set about the task of telling this story with a genuine intent to get it right -- the actions of those on board and honor their memory. Their extensive research included reaching out to all the families who had lost loved ones on United Flight 93 as the first casualties of this war. And Paul and his team got it right." Beamer adds, "This film further reminds us of the nature of the enemy we face. An enemy who will stop at nothing to achieve world domination and force a life devoid of freedom upon all. … I encourage my fellow Americans and free people everywhere to see 'United 93.'"

Senate Panel Says FEMA Should Be Dismantled, Rebuilt. The Washington Post (4/27, Hsu, 744K) reports the final report on the response to Hurricane Katrina by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, titled "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," finds that the storm "exposed flaws in the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Department of Homeland Security that are 'too substantial to mend,' and FEMA should be dismantled and rebuilt inside the troubled department." It "makes 86 recommendations that would undo major changes made when President Bush and Congress launched the department in 2003, and would reverse parts of a reorganization ordered by Secretary

Michael Chertoff last summer." Meanwhile, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman "added a written statement excoriating Bush and his aides for being 'surprisingly detached' before and just after the storm and for not cooperating with Senate investigators, who he said should have subpoenaed the White House."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (4/27, Shields) reports that "FEMA spokesman Russ Knocke" said the agency is "intensely focused on the coming storm season." Meanwhile, White House spokesman Blair C. Jones "disagreed" with Lieberman's statement that Bush and his aides were "surprisingly detached," "noting that administration officials such as Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff appeared before the committee."

The AP (4/27) reports that the report is "short on specifics, such as funding levels," but suggests "the US is still woefully unprepared for a disaster of Katrina's magnitude." It "urges yet another overhaul of the beleaguered Homeland Security Department -- FEMA's parent agency -- which was created three years ago and already has undergone major restructuring of duties and responsibilities. It proposes creating a new agency, called the National Preparedness and Response Authority, that would plan and carry out relief missions for domestic disasters" and have "a direct line of communication with the president during major crises."

A separate AP (4/27, Jordan) report says the report's "86 proposed reforms charge the United States is still woefully unprepared for a disaster such as Katrina with the start of the hurricane season a little more than month away. 'The United States was, and is, ill-prepared to respond to a catastrophic event of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina,' the recommendations warn."

USA Today (4/27, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "Homeland Security said a new agency is not needed. 'It is time to stop playing around with organizational charts and start focusing on how governments at all levels are preparing for the fast-approaching storm season,' spokesman Russ Knocke said. Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the committee, said the investigation revealed broad leadership lapses." The same quote from Knocke appears in the New York Times, Jordan's AP piece and the Los Angeles Times.

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Neuman, 958K) adds that "FEMA had been an independent -- and highly regarded -- agency until March 2003, when the Department of Homeland Security was created in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times notes, "The release of the Senate committee's 800-page report comes as Bush travels to Louisiana on Thursday and as agencies grapple with being ready for the official start of hurricane season on June 1."

The New York Times (4/27, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Bruce Baughman, the director of emergency management for the state of Alabama and the president of the National Emergency Management Association, said that despite the bureaucratic-sounding nature of the Senate committee's draft recommendations, he believed they would create a more capable agency. 'Whatever the hell you call it, FEMA or National Preparedness and Response Authority, it does not matter,' Mr. Baughman said. 'But what this does is it ties all the pieces together.'" USA Today (4/27, Hall, 2.31M) and the Los Angeles Times (4/27, Neuman, 958K) file a similar reports.

GAO Says FEMA Is Likely To Repeat Disaster Aid Mistakes. GAO Investigators say FEMA is likely to repeat mistakes of disaster aid waste and fraud this hurricane season unless it can establish controls for verifying names and addresses. The AP (4/27, Yen) reports that the GAO's managing director of special investigations Gregory Kurtz "said he has little confidence that FEMA will be ready by June 1 to safeguard taxpayer dollars should a major disaster like Hurricane Katrina strike again." The AP adds, "Responding to the audit, FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said Wednesday that FEMA officials have been working hard to improve and tighten controls in its disaster aid program."

FEMA Ending Housing Grants For Many Evacuees. The New York Times (4/27, Dewan, 1.19M) reports that FEMA is telling thousands of hurricane evacuees that they are no longer eligible for free housing and utilities and must either begin paying rent themselves or leave. According to the Times, "Of about 55,000 families who were given long-term housing vouchers, nearly a third are receiving notices that they no longer qualify, FEMA officials said. For the rest, benefits are also being cut: they will have to sign new leases, pay their own gas and electric bills and requalify for rental assistance every three months." The Times notes that many had been counting on "a year of free housing and utilities."

Nagin, FEMA Reach Agreement On Trailers. The AP (4/27) reports that New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and federal officials have revived efforts "to place thousands of trailers throughout the city as stopgap housing for people who lost their homes during Hurricane Katrina. Three weeks ago Nagin halted work on new trailer sites, complaining that the Federal Emergency Management Agency used 'bullying' tactics and built a site outside a gated community without the proper permits. On Wednesday, Nagin and FEMA officials announced that they had bridged their differences." The AP adds, "Officials hope to install about 8,000 trailers by the end of June."

Insurers Canceling Homeowners' Policies In Hurricane Vulnerable Areas. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 10, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Last year's disastrous hurricane season cost insurers a record $60 billion. Now, with a new season approaching, they're looking to cut their risk. In Florida, insurers are serving notice they plan to cancel 500,000 policies. In New York State, Allstate is canceling 28,000 policies and won't write new policies in New York and its suburbs. And in Texas, Allstate says no new policies in 14 coastal counties."

Hurricane Victims Claim Mistreatment By Mortgage Lenders. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Bauerlein, 2.11M) reports, "As homeowners along the Gulf Coast try to recover from the devastation of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, some say mortgage lenders are refusing to turn over insurance proceeds while demanding immediate payment on overdue loans. Hurricane victims in Louisiana and Mississippi have filed nearly 1,000 complaints with state regulators claiming mistreatment by mortgage lenders. About 800 of the complaints have been resolved, often as a result of mediation initiated by regulators."

Democrats Blast FEMA's Handling Of Gulf Coast Schools. The Washington Times (4/27, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Putting the Federal Emergency Management Agency in charge of rebuilding and reopening schools on the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina was a critical mistake, congressional Democrats on the House Education and the Workforce Committee said yesterday. … The Democrats issued a report asserting that eight months after the storm hit the region, its schools remain in crisis. The lawmakers called for the creation of an education-recovery czar to oversee the reopening of Gulf Coast schools and colleges."

Army Corps Of Engineers Surveying New Orleans Levees For Weaknesses. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 11, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "In New Orleans, engineers are doing a risk assessment of their own, trying to determine whether the levees will hold." CBS (Strassmann) added, "Only now, just five weeks before New Orleans faces another hurricane season, the US Army Corps of Engineers is finally doing what thousands of residents have demanded ever since Katrina hit seven months ago: A detailed survey of every inch of the levees and floodwalls that are this city's only hope." Just last week, "the Corps discovered more trouble: A floodwall supposed to protect the city's airport. It's being replaced like miles of levees damaged by Katrina. But design flaws may compromise the entire system, including 181 miles of levees and floodwalls that held during Katrina. Even the American Society of Civil Engineers says the system is 'open to question' and 'too close to the margin' to protect human life."

WAR NEWS:

Rice, Rumsfeld Offer Support To New Iraqi Government. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld yesterday made an unannounced visit to Baghdad in a show of support for the new Iraqi government led by Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Malaki. The story was reported on both ABC and CBS in full segments, while NBC mentioned it in a brief. Their trip was also covered in the major US newspapers.

ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 3, 2:00, Brown, 8.78M) reported, "Secretaries Rumsfeld and Rice praised the political progress there." Secretary Rice: "We are focused on the success of this Iraqi government." Brown: "And they said there is progress on the military front, as well. Secretary Rumsfeld started the day at a training center for Iraqi army recruits." Secretary Rumsfeld: "It's appropriate for us to begin the discussions with the new government, about the conditions on the ground and the pace at which we'll be able to turn over responsibility." Brown: "Privately, officials at the Pentagon tell ABC News, they hope is to reduce the number of US troops in Iraq to 100,000 by the end of the year."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 8, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It was a show of support for the government Iraqi leaders are trying to put together. Otherwise, it was a day like so many other days in Iraq. At least 20 civilians and police died in bombings and other violence, and American forces killed 13 people when they raided what was described as a an insurgent hideout." CBS (Assuras) added, "The top two US foreign policy officials made surprise landings in Baghdad only a few hours apart, and then joined up in a well-choreographed show of support for Iraq's emerging government." NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 5, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Both were there to show support for Iraq's new designated prime minister."

The New York Times (4/27, Weisman, Cloud, 1.19M) reports that the two sought to "press the prime minister-designate to re-establish public confidence in the government and rid the country's security forces of infiltration by sectarian militias." While Rice said that removing the militias' influence is "clearly one of the high priorities for the government," she added, "How they go about that I think is something they will have to work through." In her entourage, "there was an atmosphere that the joint visit might offer a last chance to reverse some of the mistakes of the past three years." Rice and Rumsfeld sought to "put the past differences between the departments behind them by emphasizing that they would be working more cooperatively to bolster the Iraqi government."

The Wall Street Journal (4/27, A4, Dreazen, 2.11M) calls the visit "a concerted diplomatic effort to capitalize on the selection of Iraq's new prime minister." The Washington

Post (4/27, A16, Kessler, 744K) says the visit aimed to make clear "that the sometimes disjointed U.S. political and military operations are working seamlessly during the transition to a permanent government." Rice called "the creation of a permanent government…a turning point in the war and 'an important message to the American people.'" Government officials "indicated that they were embracing perhaps the last chance the Bush administration had to turn around public opinion at home and to ensure that Iraq has a viable political future."

The AP (4/27, Gearan, Burns) adds that the two secretaries "embraced the country's fledgling leaders as independent and focused on the future." Rice said that al-Maliki's priorities and commitment are "refreshing and really heartening." The story also notes that the visit "was meant to resonate in Iraq and among Americans."

The Washington Times (4/27, Kralev, 90K) reports, "The unprecedented joint visit by the top two Cabinet officials demonstrated Washington's full backing of Nouri al-Maliki." Rumsfeld said, "I came away most encouraged." Rice said, "I found him to be very focused and very clear that he understood his role and the role of the new government to really demonstrate that it is a government of national unity."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Roug, Richter, 958K) reports that the visit by Rice and Rumsfeld "drew criticism from Iraqi politicians who said they feared the unannounced visit might do more harm than good." The Times notes, "'We didn't invite them,' said Kamal Saadi, a Shiite legislator close to the new prime minister-designate, Nouri Maliki." He "said Iraqi leaders had not been given advance notice of the visit, which came just days after Iraqi politicians broke through a months-long impasse on the selection of a prime minister."

Rice Says US Is Prepared To Support Iraq's Government. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice discussed her trip to Iraq on CNN's The Situation Room (4/26), saying, "We first wanted to bring a message that President Bush asked us to bring, which is that we are ready to support this government and support it fully. But supporting it fully means that we have to make certain that the United States government is really ready to do that, and so we are here to look at those issues that are at that nexus of political and military. There are many now. The security issues here even have both a political element and a military element. We are here to look at Defense Department operations, and I'm looking at embassy operations to make sure that we're really properly organized to help this government hit the ground running, because, clearly, they are ready to show the Iraqi people that it's going to be a different day."

GOP Lawmakers Resigned To Dealing With Rumsfeld. The Los Angeles Times/AP (4/27, Sidoti) reports, "Senate Republican critics of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld are deferring to President Bush's support for the Pentagon chief, mindful that his fate is out of their hands." Yet "those GOP lawmakers remain uncomfortable with him. Given the chance, they offer no words of support." Sen. John McCain said, "He still is in the confidence of the president. The president reiterated that the other day, so I'll continue to try to work with him."

Iraqis Complain Little To Show For US Reconstruction Effort. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 9, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "After security and a stable government, what Iraq needs most is rebuilding. Since the US invasion, infrastructure that was neglected by Saddam Hussein has been battered by constant attack and American reconstruction efforts have been hampered by mismanagement and corruption." CBS (Dozier) added, "Plenty has been done in many parts of Iraq, thanks to $20 billion US tax dollars. Almost half of that has already been spent, but Iraqis complain there is little to show for it: $1.6 billion has gone to electricity projects, but there's less daily power now than before the war; $390 million has gone to water projects, but fewer Iraqis have clean water now than before; and half a billion dollars has gone to oil infrastructure, but production has stagnated, mostly because of terrorist attacks. So much for the Bush Administration's promise that oil revenues would pay for the rebuilding of Iraq. Twenty five percent of the US construction budget now goes to security, which means the money is running out faster."

NYTimes Criticizes No Bid Halliburton Contract In Iraq. An editorial in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) says, "The Bush administration's promise that Iraq's reconstruction could be paid for with the country's own oil revenues was one of the many false assertions and assurances that ushered in the invasion. But unlike the predictions of weapons of mass destruction and streets filled with cheering Iraqis, this claim might have been at least partly true -- if the administration had more carefully supervised the lucrative no-bid oil industry repair contract it awarded to a subsidiary of Halliburton, the firm formerly headed by Vice President Dick Cheney." The Times adds, "On the Fatah pipeline crossing project, American taxpayers got a particularly raw deal. The repair work they originally paid for wasn't done. The government agency that was supposed to supervise the work did not do an effective job. And the oil exports that could have helped pay Iraq's reconstruction bills never made it through the pipeline."

Internet Tuesday," is "seen as a mythical figure by many Iraqis, a fiction designed to spread fear and put a face on the Sunni Arab insurgents who have spread so much terror here." Thalib Jabbar, a businessman in Baghdad said, "Zarqawi wants to show his power and frighten people. But in reality, he's the one who should be afraid. We want him dead." According to the Monitor, that is "a common sentiment among many ordinary Iraqis, one played on by Iraqi officials Wednesday who condemned Zarqawi as a foreigner trying to destroy their country. Their strong response highlights the risk such a video poses for Zarqawi: The effort to show his strength within the insurgency also puts a foreign face on the movement, leaving an opening for his opponents to appeal to national unity."

The AP (4/27, Frayer) reports that Zarqawi's latest video "marks a shift by the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq toward a less radical image, one that might appeal to the Iraqi insurgency more than the beheadings for which he's become notorious, analysts said Wednesday."

WPost Says Video Is A Sign Of Good News In War On Terror. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/27, A26, 744K) says, "The appearance of an al-Qaeda video on the Internet more often than not is a sign of good news in the war on terrorism. Tuesday's posting by Iraqi commander Abu Musab al-Zarqawi is the latest example: The 34-minute show by the newly unhooded extremist is in part a bid for advantage in factional feuding that has curtailed al-Qaeda's visibility and effectiveness." The Post adds, "The administration and U.S. commanders are clearly eager to find reasons to draw down troops from the current total of 132,500 by the fall. … But so far Iraq's slow political progress has had no impact on the violence, which has been growing steadily worse. Before welcoming Iraq's new government by pulling out tens of thousands of soldiers, President Bush ought to carefully consider whether that is the best way to achieve the victory he says he seeks."

Hamas, Sudan Distance Themselves From Bin Laden. The Palestinian group Hamas and the government of Sudan both sought to distance themselves from Osama bin Laden in the wake of his latest audio tape. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Bright, 61K) reports, "Al Jazeera reports that shortly after it broadcast bin Laden's message on Sunday, Sami Abu Zuhri, a spokesman for Hamas, declared that Hamas's ideology was 'totally different' from bin Laden's. … The Associated Press reports that, like Hamas, the Sudanese government distanced itself from bin Laden's statements, saying, 'We are not concerned with such statements, or any other statement that comes from foreign quarters about the crisis in Darfur.'"

US Forces Strike Suspected Insurgent Safehouse. The AP (4/27, Keath) reports that the US military said Wednesday that US forces truck a suspected safehouse of foreign insurgents, "killing 12 militants and a woman in a raid near the site where an American helicopter crashed." Coalition forces 'hit the suspected safehouse Tuesday in Youssifiyah, 12 miles south of Baghdad, near where a U.S. Apache helicopter crashed April 1. The U.S. command said the helicopter was believed to have been shot down."

Baghdad Residents Construct Makeshift Roadblocks. The AP (4/27, Castaneda) reports that Baghdad residents have become to construct makeshift roadblocks in an effort to protect their homes from makeshift violence. The AP notes that in some areas, "the majority of streets are blocked off or protected by homemade barriers that slow traffic. Some barriers have been in place for over a year in both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods. But many more have appeared since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra that ignited a wave of sectarian violence and left the country struggling to defuse another crisis." The AP adds, "Some of the barriers are sophisticated, built in curved 'serpentine' shapes that allow traffic to pass at a reduced speed. Residents said this would allow them to fire back at roaming militants trying to gun down pedestrians."

Questions Raised About Battle In Baghdad's Adhamiya District. Time (4/26, Ware) reports, "When Baghdad's notorious Adhamiya district exploded in vicious gun battles last week, few were really surprised. … The basic facts of the battle are not in dispute. … The question is exactly what triggered this battle and who fought it. Sunni community leaders claim that local residents grabbed whatever weapons they had to defend their homes from a sectarian attack by Shi'ite militias in government uniforms. … However, American officers say the men they ended up fighting weren't mere homeowners. They used the fire and movement techniques of trained soldiers."

Abuse Charges Expected Against Abu Ghraib Colonel. The AP (4/27, Jelinek) reports that the Army is expected to formally charge Lt. Col. Steven Jordan with criminal offenses in connection with the abuse of prisoners at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. Formal charges are expected against Jordan next week. The AP reports that charges against Jordan "would make him the highest-ranking officer charged in the case, three defense officials said. They spoke only on condition of anonymity because Jordan had not yet been charged. They did not say specifically what the charges might be."

Report Says Hundreds Of Iraqi Detainees Were Abused. A report issued yesterday by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch has found credible evidence that at least 460 detainees were abused, tortured or killed by US troops and government civilians in Iraq. Knight Ridder (4/27, Brown) reports, "The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved." Knight Ridder adds, "The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers."

Iraqis Move To Hide Sunni Names. USA Today (4/27, Jervis, Sabah, 2.31M) reports, "Iraqis in Baghdad named Omar or Othman — two of the most recognizable names identified with Sunni Islam — are getting fake IDs, changing their names legally in court, even teaching their young children to say more neutral-sounding names if asked." USA adds, "The rush to mask identities underscores the increased sectarian tensions in Iraq since February's bombing of a sacred Shiite mosque in Samarra. The attack led to reprisals by Shiite gunmen and continuing violence between Sunnis and Shiites."

Shanghai Cooperation Organization To Conduct Anti-Terror Exercises. The Washington Post (4/27, A20, Cody, 744K) reports that China, Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan yesterday announced plans to hold "joint anti-terrorism exercises next year, emphasizing a desire to balance U.S. military influence in Asia with stepped-up preparations of their own." The activities of the regional security grouping, known as the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, said in a communiqué that "next year's exercises will be held in Russia. They did not detail what activities were planned."

US Seeks To Improve Security At Afghan Base. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Barnes, 958K) reports, "The Army's chief of staff said Wednesday that he was frustrated by security lapses at Bagram air base in Afghanistan that led to the loss of potentially sensitive data, and that the military must learn how to be more careful with new technology." Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker "said the Army was trying to improve how soldiers used and secured flash drives." The Times adds, "U.S. military officials have been vague about the steps they are taking to improve security practices in Afghanistan and throughout the armed forces."

Slain Reporter's Family Says US Targeted Journalists. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Wilkinson, Zucchino, 958K) reports on a Spanish cameraman who was killed by US fire in Baghdad. Jose Couso was killed when a US tank fired a high-explosive round into the side of his hotel believing an enemy spotter was on the balcony. The tank gunner "said he had been stung by Couso family contentions that his unit targeted journalists, and by their lawsuit accusing him and two officers of war crimes and murder. His wife received threatening phone calls after the incident, he said."

Lawsuit Alleges DOD Is Illegally Using A Recruitment Database. The AP (4/27) reports the New York Civil Liberties Union, in a federal lawsuit, claims that "the Defense Department is violating the privacy of millions of high school students nationwide with a detailed database it uses for military recruitment." It says they are "ignoring privacy rules set by Congress regarding the collection and distribution of students' personal information" by "flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private."

Gonzales Announces Anti-Gang Grant For Tampa. The Tampa Tribune (4/27, McCartney) reports, "Saying gangs represent a threat to the 'American dream,' U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced a $2.5 million grant to combat the spread of gangs in Hillsborough County." The Tribune continues, "Gonzales spent about half a day in Tampa and Hillsborough County, touring the site of a suspected gang shooting that killed two people in February and the shooting of a deputy with a BB gun days later. … But Gonzales' tour of Tampa and northwest Hillsborough County touched on numerous other topics, including opportunity, education and immigration. … He spoke to a group of students at Leto High School, who he said were curious about his security detail, immigration and whether he had any presidential ambitions. (He didn't indicate any to a group of reporters later.)" … Gonzales acknowledged that the Tampa Bay area is not a hub of gang activity that other cities awarded the grant are, but said even one gang member poses a threat to the community."

WUSF AM , Tampa (4/27, Ingram) reports, "Gonzales also met with local law enforcement and community leaders. … He says the anti gang grant will be used on education, law enforcement and community re-integration programs for former felons."

Heaton Named US Attorney For Central Illinois. The Springfield (IL) State Journal-Register (4/27, Schoenburg) reports, "Rodger Heaton, interim U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, is President Bush's choice to continue as the top prosecutor in the region, The State Journal-Register has learned. … 'The White House has made the decision,' according to a local Republican source." The Journal-Register continues, "Copley News Service reported last week that the three people whose names had been forwarded to the White House by House Speaker Dennis Hastert and GOP congressional colleagues were: Heaton; Darin LaHood, the son of U.S. Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Peoria; and John Michelich, an Auburn native who works for the U.S. Department of Justice." The Journal-Register adds, "Sharon Paul, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield, said Heaton considers it a privilege to be serving in his current position. He is 'hopeful he'll be nominated, but as yet he hasn't been notified of any decision,' she said Tuesday. … Heaton, 46, was appointed to the interim post as of Dec. 1 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Heaton replaced U.S. Attorney Jan Paul Miller, who took a job with a St. Louis law firm."

DOJ Moves Toward More Inclusive Case Management System. Government Computer News (4/27, Miller) reports, "While the Justice Department was bogged down in awarding a $305 million contract for its do-over case management system called Sentinel, the Line of Business Consolidation initiative for a similar effort was treading water. … But with Sentinel awarded earlier this year to Lockheed Martin Corp., the Office of Management and Budget is pushing Justice to include all agencies under the LOB umbrella." GCN continues, "For litigation case management, Justice, which completed the target architecture in fiscal 2005, now will work with any agency that is involved with litigation, according to an administration official familiar with the LOB. … These agencies include the Environmental Protection Agency, IRS, Securities and Exchange Commission and many more. … 'We know it's more than just the Justice Department and we want to make sure whoever is going forward with a litigation system either builds onto or adds to the Justice system,' the official said. 'If we are going to build many times, we want to use a similar architecture so the systems can share information and components easily.' … Justice and OMB held a meeting last week to develop the plan with new LOB program manger Paul Garrett, who took over for Price Roe in March."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Angry Lay Trades Barbs With Federal Prosecutor At Enron Trial. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "Under hard questioning by a federal prosecutor, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay admitted that he probably violated the company's code of ethics and had to fend off accusations of hypocrisy and attempted witness tampering." The Journal continues, "The confrontation with prosecutor John Hueston came as the government began its questioning after Mr. Lay spent nearly three days testifying in his own defense. The two men clashed sharply as Mr. Hueston pushed to ruffle the usually affable Mr. Lay. … The witness angrily denied Mr. Hueston's allegations that calls he made as recently as this month to potential trial witnesses were attempts to improperly influence them to agree with his version of events. 'You are distorting the phrase "in agreement with my story,"; Mr. Lay shot back, adding that, 'I don't have a story.' Mr. Lay said he made the calls to educate himself and confirm his own recollections of events." The Journal notes, "The possible ethics-code violation concerned a $120,000 investment Mr. Lay made in a private Internet company called PhotoFete.com Inc. The PhotoFete issue first arose during the testimony of Mr. Lay's co-defendant, Jeffrey Skilling, who had made about a $160,000 investment in the firm, which did about $450,000 of business with Enron. Messrs. Lay and Skilling were supposed to notify Enron's board about the potential conflict of interest."

The Washington Post (4/27, D1, Johnson) reports that Lay "grew furious at the government attack, pointing his finger and answering questions from…Hueston in an increasingly aggressive tone." The Post continues, "Hueston began his presentation by throwing back at Lay a quote from his own lawyer's opening statement three months ago: 'By our deeds we are known.' The prosecutor followed up with unrelenting questions designed to cast doubt on actions Lay took before the energy trader hurtled into bankruptcy protection in December 2001."

The New York Times (4/27, Barrionuevo, Romero) reports that Lay "lost his legendary cool on the witness stand Wednesday." The Times continues, "Just minutes into his cross-examination by… Hueston, Mr. Lay…testily accused…Hueston of personally preventing him from repaying a company credit line Mr. Lay had used to shore up his personal finances. … 'Mr. Hueston, you know you blocked it,' Mr. Lay said, his voice booming. 'It's a simple answer.'" The Times notes, "Before he took the stand, a number of legal experts had predicted that Mr. Lay would use the same folksy charm he employed during his heyday as the public face of Enron to seek to win over the 12 jurors deciding his fate in the criminal fraud trial here. But during his three days so far as a witness, Mr. Lay has found it harder and harder to maintain a kindly grandfatherly image. … Instead, Mr. Lay,… has become increasingly agitated, at times reacting impatiently even to his own lawyer, George McCall Secrest Jr., and lashing out at what Mr. Lay portrayed as a cabal of former Enron executives, investors and journalists whom he repeatedly blamed for the company's downfall in late 2001."

The AP (4/27, Hays) reports that Lay "dropped his affable persona as his cross-examination began Wednesday, snarling at a prosecutor who accused him of witness tampering when Lay called several potential witnesses during his fraud and conspiracy trial. … Jurors who had been listening impassively snapped to attention. … 'Did you have any conversations to get your story straight for trial?' asked prosecutor John Hueston. … 'Can you elaborate on that Mr. Hueston?' Lay shot back. 'I'm not sure what story you're talking about.' … The prosecutor noted that Lay called two Goldman Sachs & Co. executives during the trial regarding a September 2001 meeting about Enron. … Former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow - whom Lay has dubbed a traitor, liar and crook - testified that he and Lay met with the executives to discuss restructuring Enron at the same time Lay was telling employees and reporters that the company was sound. Lay says the executives called the meeting to discuss Enron's vulnerability to a takeover. … Lay said he called the executives in March - the same month Fastow testified - but he said he did not try to align their memories of the meeting with his."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rove Makes Fifth Grand Jury Appearance In Plame Investigation. Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl Rove yesterday appeared before the grand jury investigating the leak of undercover CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity for the fifth time. The story was the lead on CBS and NBC, bumping coverage of the announcement Fox News commentator Tony Snow was joining the Administration as press secretary, while ABC ran a brief mention later in its newscast. It also garnered front page coverage in the Washington Post and New York Times.

The Washington Post (4/27, A1, Vandehei, 744K) in a front page story offers the most new details on Rove's testimony and says that he left the court house "unsure whether he would be indicted, according to a source close to the presidential aide." He "spent considerable time arguing that it would have been foolish for him to knowingly mislead investigators about his role in the disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media, the source said. His grand jury appearance, which was kept secret even from Rove's closest White House colleagues until shortly before he went to court yesterday, suggests that prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald remains keenly interested in Rove's role in the case." And "Rove for the first time partly waived his attorney-client privilege to detail conversations he had with his attorney, Robert Luskin, about the leak and his knowledge of it, the source said."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported Rove's appearance "makes it crystal clear that the special prosecutor's investigation is still very much alive, and that Karl Rove is very much under a cloud of suspicion." But his attorney, Robert Luskin, "said prosecutors had assured them that in connection with this appearance, Rove was not a target of investigation. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald apparently wanted to question Rove more about his conversations with reporters right before CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity was revealed in the press." The news "just couldn't come at a worse time for the President."

NBC Nightly News (4/26, lead story, 3:00, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The question is whether Rove only remembered the conversation later in this investigation or whether he tried to hide it. A former prosecutor says special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald remains skeptical." Tom Connolly, former Federal prosecutor: "I think it means that Fitzgerald is unwilling to take Mr. Rove's lawyer's word that Mr. Rove made a mistake in previous testimony." Gregory: "His lawyer said today Rove testified 'voluntarily' at the request of the special prosecutor, adding that Fitzgerald said Rove 'is not a target of the investigation.'"

On ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 4, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M), Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said, "Well, fifth time. That's the key. Criminal lawyers will tell you that five appearances before a grand jury is highly unusual. And a sign that you're in some legal jeopardy. But Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, told me that Fitzgerald assured him his client is not a target. He's made no decisions yet."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/25, Blitzer) reported Rove's fifth appearance is "spurring new speculation that Rove could become the second White House figure possibly to be indicted in the leak case." CNN (King) added that it is "highly unusual to be called for a fifth time before the federal grand jury. Sources sympathetic to Rove are saying they believe this could lead to the resolution. From their accounts, they say the special prosecutor has a few lingering questions in their view about Rove's account of exactly why he didn't tell the full story in his first grand jury testimony about conversations with reporters."

The New York Times (4/27, A1, Kornblut, 1.19M) in a front page story reports Fitzgerald "did not comment about calling Mr. Rove to testify, and no one involved in the case said they clearly understood its status. It did not appear that there would be any immediate resolution for Mr. Rove, who has spent months defending himself against assertions that his legal troubles are distracting him from his White House duties." Meanwhile, "Democrats pounced on the turn of events, one of several controversies they hope to capitalize on in the fall elections." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "This additional Rove visit clearly shows that the Plame investigation is far from over and that Patrick Fitzgerald is living up to his reputation as an impartial, dedicated prosecutor determined to turn over every stone."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Schmitt, Hamburger, 958K) notes, "As the White House was introducing a new press secretary in an effort to put a new face on a troubled administration, Rove testified for three hours before the grand jury." The shift in Rove's portfolio "helped inoculate the White House against Rove's latest appearance before the grand jury. If Rove is indicted and forced to resign, the White House can say that Rove's substantive policy responsibilities have already been transferred."

The AP (4/27, Yost) says "Rove appeared at ease as he left the U.S. courthouse." The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Squeo, 2.11M) reports similar details on Rove's testimony.

Lawyer Says Rove Is Not A Target Of Fitzgerald's Investigation. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, King) reported, "We do, though, have a statement from Rove attorney Robert Luskin. He says this: 'Karl Rove appeared today before the grand jury investigating the disclosure of a CIA agent's identity. He testified voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance in October 2005. In connection with his appearance, the special counsel has advised Mr. Rove that he is not a target of the investigation. Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges. At the request of the special counsel, Mr. Rove will not discuss the substance of his testimony."

Allen Downplays Concerns That Rove Is A Liability. Sen. George Allen was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (4/26) if he is concerned that Rove will be a liability for the White House going into this year's elections. Allen said, "Karl Rove has a proven track record of success for this President as well as for other candidates, and so I think he's going to be focused on politics and campaigns and he's been awfully good at it and he has a great track record of winning." Asked if Rove's fifth appearance before the grand jury is a distraction for Republicans and the White House, Allen said, "Karl Rove is somebody who I've worked with in the past when I was chairman of the Republican Senate Campaign Committee, and I really do admire his knowledge and I think the President also has a great deal of confidence invested in him."

Defense Lawyer Accuses Federal Investigators Of Spying On Pellicano. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Krikorian, Weinstein, Blankstein, 958K) reports Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano "has accused the federal government of spying on him in prison through a secret arrangement with his then-girlfriend." Pellicano lawyer Steven Gruel "filed motions this week in federal court saying Sandra Wil Carradine provided FBI agents and prosecutors with a 'fountain of information' after a series of jailhouse visits late last year, giving them insights into the lawyer's legal strategy and violating his attorney-client privilege." The Times adds, "In mid-December, Gruel says in the motions, Carradine told FBI Special Agent Stan Ornellas…that Pellicano was attempting to hire the attorney, making it 'likely that the government knew of Mr. Pellicano's interest in my representation even before I did.' Carradine also told Ornellas of Pellicano's interest in calling a particular defense witness, enabling the FBI to contact the person before Pellicano's defense did, according to Gruel." The California Recorder (4/27, Scheck) notes, "Based on discovery turned over by prosecutors and evidence gathered on his own, Gruel's filings challenge the FBI's reasons for initially searching the detective's office. … The warrant, which was obtained in connection with a threat made to former L.A. Times reporter Anita Busch, 'was a subterfuge,' Gruel wrote. … He argues that agents were actually seeking evidence of illegal wiretaps -- particularly a recording of an FBI agent -- but didn't have probable cause to get a warrant for such material."

The California Recorder (4/27, Scheck) reports, "Steven Gruel has long contended that the feds were out to get his client, the celebrity private eye Anthony Pellicano, well before they executed a 2003 search warrant that resulted in Pellicano's conviction on explosives charges -- and a protracted federal investigation aimed at some of Hollywood's biggest lawyers." The Recorder continues, "In court papers filed late Tuesday, Gruel, a former San Francisco federal prosecutor, gave the most detailed peek yet into how he plans to support that claim. He also outlined his contention that prosecutors improperly used Pellicano's girlfriend as an informant to pry into the detective's defense strategy. … All of the arguments are aimed at getting more discovery out of Los Angeles federal prosecutors and ultimately, Gruel said, getting the indictment tossed." The Recorder adds, "Based on discovery turned over by prosecutors and evidence gathered on his own, Gruel's filings challenge the FBI's reasons for initially searching the detective's office. … The warrant, which was obtained in connection with a threat made to former L.A. Times reporter Anita Busch, 'was a subterfuge,' Gruel wrote. … He argues that agents were actually seeking evidence of illegal wiretaps -- particularly a recording of an FBI agent -- but didn't have probable cause to get a warrant for such material."

Kidman-Cruise Recording Among Items Found By FBI At Pellicano Office. The New York Daily News (4/27, 729K) reports, "A recording of a phone call between Nicole Kidman and Tom Cruise was just one of the treasures the FBI found in the 'War Room' of jailed private eye Anthony Pellicano, according to the June Vanity Fair, now online. Kidman took to joking to friends during calls, 'So, Tom, are you listening? Am I saying what you want me to say?' … Both stars have been questioned by the FBI, according to the story by top investigators Bryan Burrough and John Connolly, who is writing a book about the P.I."

Thirteen-Year FBI International Manhunt Led To Fugitive Molester's Arrest. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Griggs, 958K) reports, "For nearly 13 years, law enforcement officials tried to bring convicted child molester Channa Pryia Ruberoe to justice. Now, Ruberoe, convicted in Ventura in 1993 of three counts of lewd acts against his stepdaughter, is behind bars." Ruberoe's "circuitous route through Europe and southern Asia and the dogged pursuit by investigators with the Ventura County district attorney's office and the local FBI office rival the plot of a spy novel." The Times adds that Superior Court Judge Don Coleman said yesterday, "The FBI and their international law enforcement contacts are the real heroes in this story." The Times notes, "Last week, Ruberoe was given the maximum sentence of 12 years."

Federal Prosecutors Considering New Charges Against Gotti. The New York Daily News (4/26, Zambito, 729K) reported that on Tuesday, "the feds raised the ante against John (Junior) Gotti…by telling a judge they may yet charge the mob scion -- and his little brother -- with new crimes. Prosecutors say they're looking into Gotti's transfer of ownership of his Long Island mansion to his wife, Kim, at a time when the government was trying to seize the property because it was bought with mob money. The government also is taking aim at brother Peter, citing testimony at Junior's recent trial that prosecutors believe could link the younger Gotti to possible crimes." The New York Post (4/26, Cornell, 624K) noted, "Prosecutors publicly disclosed that admissions by Gotti are 'a basis' for their sweeping investigation in a letter to Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin…as they defended sending subpoenas to witnesses who recently testified for Gotti. … Defense lawyer Charles Carnesi declined to comment, but the letter from prosecutors shows Gotti's attorneys have privately denied he 'admitted significant information about criminal activity in which he and others were involved.'"

Prosecutors Say Reputed Gambino Capo Exaggerating Illnesses To Avoid Trial. The New York Post (4/27, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Reputed Gambino acting capo Greg DePalma has borrowed a page from the notorious Mafia boss Vincent 'Chin' Gigante by pretending he's too sick to stand trial, prosecutors charge. Defense lawyer John Meringolo is expected to argue in Manhattan federal court today that DePalma, 73, is near death due to lung cancer, heart disease and other ailments -- and incapacitated by more than 20 medications he takes daily. But prosecutors are skeptical and have asked Judge Alvin Hellerstein to keep his racketeering trial scheduled for May 8." The Post notes, "The feds' court papers claim DePalma 'exaggerated the severity' of his illness to get a reduced sentence in 1999 and to 'garner sympathy' at a 2001 murder conspiracy trial. … As soon as DePalma hit the streets in February 2003, after finishing out a prison term, he got right back to mob business, prosecutors say."

Judge Bars Juror Background Checks In Chicago Corruption Trial. The AP (4/27, Robinson) reports, "A federal judge barred prosecutors Wednesday from conducting criminal background checks on prospective jurors in the upcoming trial of Mayor Richard M. Daley's one-time patronage chief and three other former city officials." The AP continues, "Prosecutors notified the judge that they planned to make such checks before jury selection gets under way May 10. But U.S. District Judge David H. Coar said such checks could have a 'coercive effect' if jurors found out. … 'Absent some showing that it would be appropriate or necessary, I don't think as a matter of policy any party ought to be allowed to conduct criminal background checks of the jurors,' the judge said." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors planned to look into the prospective jurors' backgrounds following the corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan. In the Ryan case, two jurors were removed in the middle of deliberations after The Chicago Tribune disclosed that they failed to indicate on a court questionnaire that they had arrest records. … Later, the judge in the Ryan case declined to dismiss four other jurors who failed to indicate that they had experiences with the court system, including a divorce and a theft charge."

South Carolina Administrator Faces Federal Charges. The Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News (4/27, Reports) reports, "Surfside Beach Town Administrator Clyde Merryman was indicted by a federal grand jury in Florence today on seven criminal counts in connection with an investigation into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach in 2002." The News continues, "The indictment was returned today against 60-year-old Merryman, a retired FBI agent. He is facing charges of mail fraud and theft of honest services, concealment of a material fact from a U.S. agency, falsification of records in a federal investigation, and obstruction of justice." The News adds, "Merryman launched the investigation as a FBI Special Agent in January 2002 into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach. The indictment says that the investigation questioned whether the spas used Korean women who were illegally in the United States for the purpose of prostitution. … According to the U.S. Justice Department, the indictment accuses Merryman of developing an ongoing 'personal relationship' with a woman who was a confidential witness of the investigation."

DOJ Will Not Seek Death Penalty In Alabama Carjacking Death. The Mobile Register (4/27, Kirby) reports, "Federal prosecutors will not seek the death penalty against a pair of Mobile men accused of committing a fatal carjacking last year." The Register continues, "Prosecutors last year announced they would seek permission from the Justice Department to try to execute Alexander L. Bohannon, 23, and Sebastian Sanchez Dubose, 25, for the March 2005 slaying of Michael Lee Rodgers outside of his home in south Mobile." The Register adds, "Lawyers on both sides of the case made presentations in Washington to Justice Department officials, who last month denied permission to go for the death penalty. Both men are scheduled to stand trial in June, and could get life prison terms if convicted. … The Justice Department did not explain its rationale, and federal prosecutors in Mobile did not return phone calls seeking comment."

FBI Seized Documents, Computers In San Diego Pension Probe. The AP (4/27) reports, "The FBI has seized computers and documents from the workplace of San Diego's former pension system president as part of a two-year investigation into the city finances. It's the first known time federal investigators probing the pension problems have sought information outside City Hall and the pension offices. FBI agents arrived unannounced earlier this month at the San Diego State University Foundation office where Frederick Pierce IV works as a developer. The FBI has not released further details of the search because the search warrant is sealed and Pierce said he was out of town when the FBI went to his office." The San Diego Union-Tribune (4/26, Hall, Petrillo, 353K) noted, "San Diego FBI Chief Dan Dzwilewski confirmed that agents searched Pierce's office, but declined further comment because the search warrant is sealed. Pierce and foundation spokeswoman Theresa Nakata would not say whether the scope of the search extended beyond the pension fund and its $1.43 billion deficit.

High Court Hears Challenge To Execution By Lethal Injection. Knight Ridder (4/27, Henderson) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared split Wednesday over how a lower court should handle a Florida death row inmate's contention that the state's method of lethal injection is unconstitutional because it could cause him great pain." Knight Ridder continues, "Clarence Hill, who shot and killed a Pensacola police officer in 1982, has exhausted the appeals regularly afforded to inmates who challenge their sentences. But his lawyers say his complaint about the lethal injection procedure is a civil rights claim that doesn't directly challenge his sentence, just the way it's going to be carried out. The state says essentially that Hill's claim is a ruse, an indirect way back into court to stop the state from taking his life. … Two lower courts have rejected Hill's claims, but that has happened against the backdrop of a mounting national debate over how cruel or humane lethal injection is. Eight executions have been delayed this year to consider the issue, thanks in part to medical studies that suggest some inmates may feel terrible pain when intravenous drugs are used to end their lives."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (4/27) reports, "The justices had a wide-ranging discussion about the way executions are carried out, and how they can be contested. Justice Antonin Scalia said that if they allow Florida death-row inmate Clarence Hill to pursue claims, that could drag out a case that has already been pending for more than two decades. … Justices have never ruled on the constitutionality of lethal injection, which is used by the federal government and every state that has capital punishment except Nebraska."

The Washington Post (4/27, A10, Lane) reports, ""With questions and comments from the justices revealing an even split along liberal-conservative lines, the outcome could depend on Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the centrist who is the court's swing voter now that Sandra Day O'Connor has retired." The Post notes that "the precise issue before the court is not whether lethal injection is unconstitutional. Rather, it is a related procedural question: Should courts treat a prisoner's assertion that a particular method of execution is unconstitutional as a federal civil rights lawsuit, as Hill argues, or as a petition for habeas corpus, as Florida says? … The question is critical, because Congress has put strict limits on habeas corpus claims but not on civil rights suits."

The Legal Times (4/27, Mauro) reports that "the justices appeared reluctant to give states carte blanche to use any combination of death-dealing chemicals they choose. … At one point in oral arguments in Hill v. McDonough, Justice Anthony Kennedy suggested that states have 'some minimal obligation' to ensure that the chemicals used in legal executions employ the 'most humane method' available."

McDermott Appeals Ruling In Case Involving Illegally Taped Phone Call. The AP (4/27, Daly) reports that WA7 Rep. Jim McDermott (D) "on Wednesday asked a full nine-member appeals court to hear an appeal of a case involving an illegally taped telephone call that was leaked to reporters nearly a decade ago." The AP notes, "In court papers filed Wednesday, McDermott asked all nine members of the appeals court to hear the case, saying it involved a crucial First Amendment issue." McDermott's "petition said the full court should hear arguments in the case 'because the divided panel decided a constitutional issue of exceptional importance in a manner inconsistent with on-point Supreme Court precedent.'"

Moore's Son Jailed For Slashing Tires On Election Day 2004. The Washington Times (4/27, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "A Wisconsin congresswoman's son and three Democratic campaign workers were sentenced yesterday to four to six months in jail for slashing tires outside a Bush-Cheney campaign office in Milwaukee on Election Day 2004. … Among those sentenced yesterday were Sowande A. Omokunde, the son of U.S. Rep. Gwen Moore, Wisconsin Democrat, and Michael Pratt, the son of former acting Milwaukee Mayor Marvin Pratt."

Pennsylvania County Settles INS Inmate Cost Dispute With DOJ. The AP (4/27, Walters) reports, "York County (AP) will pay the federal government $16 million to settle a dispute over how much its prison charged to house immigration detainees." The AP continues, "The Department of Justice alleged that the county knowingly understated the overall number of inmates at the prison, resulting in a higher rate being charged for federal immigration detainees being housed there between October 1999 and March 2003. … The county, however, does not admit any wrongdoing under the settlement reached Wednesday. … 'We disagree with their characterization concerning that agreement,' said Michael Flannelly, York County solicitor, adding that the county settled to avoid expensive litigation. 'Given the level of risk that we were facing, we believe it's an appropriate settlement.'" The AP adds, "In 2000, the now-defunct U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service agreed to increase the rate to $60 a day for each federal detainee based on York's statement of prison operating costs and the inmate population. … But York reported that the average daily population of the prison was 996 inmates for the applicable period, rather than the 1,544 it reported to the state, according to the U.S. government. … The difference in those figures led to the U.S. government being charged an inflated rate for detainees at York, one of the nation's largest immigration detention centers, federal officials said. … Charles Miller, a Justice Department spokesman, said he considered the legal matter closed."

Federal Contractor To Pay For Misrepresenting Size. Government Executive (4/27, Hardy) reports, "Insight Enterprises has agreed to pay the government $1 million to settle claims that its subsidiary, Insight Public Sector, fraudulently misrepresented itself as a small business to get a federal contract." GE continues, "Insight, an information technology solutions provider based in Tempe, Ariz., admitted no wrongdoing in agreeing to the settlement. Lloyd Chapman, president of the American Small Business League, initially pursued the case against Insight in a Small Business Administration complaint." GE adds, "Chapman believes that large companies often represent themselves as small businesses and that SBA and the General Services Administration rarely take action. … Insight's troubles arose after it acquired Comark and Comark Government and Education Services in 2002. CGES, which is now Insight Public Sector, had won a place on the GSA schedule as a small business in 1996. After investigating, the Justice Department and SBA contended that CGES had not been a small business in 1996 and had later received preference on some orders through the GSA schedule because of its reported size status. … The company disputes that claim, but agreed to settle to avoid the risk and expense of litigation, said Richard Fennessy, Insight's president and chief executive officer, in a statement issued late last month."

Archive Auditors Say Classified Files Wrongly Kept Secret. The Washington Post (4/27, A25, Lee, 744K) reports, "The CIA and other agencies wrongly kept secret about a third of the records they pulled from public shelves at the National Archives during reclassification efforts that were far more extensive than previously disclosed, according to an audit released yesterday." National Archives auditors "who reviewed a representative sample of thousands of formerly public records found that 24 percent were pulled despite being 'clearly inappropriate' for reclassification, and another 12 percent were 'questionable' as candidates for reclassification."

The New York Times (4/27, Shane, 1.19M) reports, "Calling the exposure of the hidden effort to reclassify records a 'turning-point moment,' Allen Weinstein, the head of the National Archives, announced a new effort to set consistent standards for deciding what records should be protected." The Times continues, "The pilot National Declassification Initiative, overseen by the archives, will seek to reduce what Mr. Weinstein called an 'unconscionable backlog' of historical records not yet released and to avoid unnecessary classification in the future." The AP (4/27, Yen) also reports on this story.

Tobacco Company Seeks Reversal Of Anti-Smoking Ad Ruling. Dow Jones (4/27) reports, "Lorillard Tobacco Co. Wednesday asked the Delaware Supreme Court to overturn a ruling that the 'truth' series of anti- smoking ads does not 'vilify' the tobacco industry." Dow Jones continues, "The maker of Newport, Kent, True and Old Gold cigarette brands says the ad campaign, which is targeted at children and teenagers, violates the bargain tobacco companies made in 1998 to settle lawsuits from 46 state attorneys general, an agreement that called for the industry to pay for anti-smoking ads. … Lorillard wants to strip funding from American Legacy Foundation, the non-profit organization behind the 'truth' ads and the recipient of $1.5 billion in funds under the settlement. According to the company, the ads breach restrictions against vilification and personal attacks contained in the settlement. … American Legacy says that the ads have to be edgy to reach the defiant youngsters most at risk of smoking but that the campaign is tailored to avoid personal attacks and vilification, which it defines as abusive and unfair portrayals of tobacco companies."

Michigan Court To Rule On Voter ID Law. The AP (4/27, Eggert) reports that the Michigan Supreme Court "agreed Wednesday to decide whether Michigan can require voters to show photo ID, entering a decade-long political fray over issues such as election fraud and voter intimidation." The AP continues, "The court voted 5-2 to issue an advisory opinion on the constitutionality of a 1997 state law requiring voters to show photo identification to get a ballot. A court spokeswoman said the ruling will be binding, though it could be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court." The AP adds, "Former Attorney General Frank Kelley, a Democrat, ruled nine years ago that the law violated the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which guarantees U.S. citizens the right to vote. … Opponents of the law say the requirement would keep poor people, non-drivers and others away from the polls. But supporters say it's needed to prevent election fraud. … The U.S. Justice Department, for example, has been investigating allegations that Detroit votes were cast last year in the names of dead people."

Virginia Activists Gearing Up Campaigns Ahead Of Vote On Gay Marriage Ban. The Washington Post (4/27, B9, Jenkins, 744K) that "beginnings of a statewide political campaign" are underway "over the proposed amendment to the Virginia Bill of Rights that would ban same-sex marriages and civil unions." The initiative "will be on the ballot statewide Nov. 7. … More than six months before Election Day, supporters and opponents have formed coalitions they hope will raise hundreds of thousands of dollars and lure scores of volunteers to their voter outreach efforts." The Post notes, "Organizers on both sides said they hope to raise enough money to fill the airwaves with radio and television ads. And they vowed to send volunteers to as many county fairs, clambakes and cookouts as needed to get the vote out."

Study Gauges Likelihood Of Gays Marrying. The AP (4/27, Crary) reports, "A new study attempts to gauge the percentage of gays and lesbians who have chosen to marry in places where that option is legal, with estimates ranging from as little as 2 percent to more than 16 percent, depending on the location." The AP continues, "A co-author of the report, released Wednesday, said both sides in the gay marriage debate may take heart from the findings. … The Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, which opposes gay marriage, reviewed data from the Netherlands, Belgium, Canada and Massachusetts, all of which allow same-sex partners to wed. … In each case, the study offered a range of estimates of the percentage of gays who had married, based on varying approximations - from 1 percent to 5 percent - of how many gays were in the general population." The AP notes, "The study estimated that between 2 percent and 5 percent of Belgium's gays and lesbians, and 5.9 percent to 16.7 percent of those in Massachusetts had married. Same-sex marriage became legal in Massachusetts in May 2004, and 7,341 gay and lesbians couples had wed there through last December."

"Don't Ask, Don't Tell" Protesters Detained At West Point. The AP (4/27, Virtanen) reports, "Twenty-one gay rights activists were detained at the U.S. Military Academy and issued federal citations Wednesday while protesting the Pentagon's 'don't ask, don't tell' policy." The academy was the last stop for the Soulforce Equality Riders' " 20-stop, cross-country tour of conservative Christian and military colleges that protest organizers say discriminate against gay, bisexual and transgendered people."

Brooks Says Democrats Moving Away From Multiculturalism. David Brooks writes in his column in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M), "Over the past few years, multiculturalism has faded away. A different sort of liberalism is taking over the Democratic Party." This "rebirth of liberal American nationalism is a significant event. Democrats are purging the last vestiges of the New Left and returning to the older civic liberalism of the 1950's and early 1960's." It happened because "the identity groups have ossified" even as "the intellectual energy on the left is now with the economists." Also, "the Democrats have come to understand that they need to pay less attention to minorities and more to the white working class," even as 9/11 "aroused feelings of national solidarity" which "discredited the multiculturalists' tribalism."

ANTITRUST:

Senate To Examine Oil Firms' Tax Records As Industry Reports Record Profits. With oil companies again reporting record profits, the Senate Finance Committee has asked the IRS for the firms' tax returns. The committee last requested corporate tax records during its investigation into the collapse of Enron. The story was reported on each of the networks last night, which devoted over 11 minutes to the issue of higher gas and oil prices; ABC led with a report on the industry's profits.

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 2, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A Senate committee opened an investigation today into whether America's oil companies making record profits are paying all the taxes they should. The panel asked the IRS for the companies' tax returns. One of those oil companies, Conoco Phillips, today became the first of the big three to report their first-quarter profits. They were up 13% to nearly $33 billion."

The Washington Post/AP (4/27, A10) says the Senate committee's request is "highly unusual" and "came as Congress showed increasing concern amid political fallout over high gasoline prices and oil industry profits. Lawmakers began moving on various fronts to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars." A more extensive version of the AP (4/27, Hebert) article notes, "Bush on Wednesday urged Congress to remove those tax provisions, worth $2 billion over 10 years. He said people should not pay for such subsidies when the industry is wallowing in cash."

Bloomberg (4/27, Efstathiou) adds, "Bush, in a speech on energy issues yesterday in Washington, said the American people expect oil companies to plough more of their profits into investments in refineries and production projects that might eventually ease prices. He also said Congress should roll back incentives to the oil industry that will cost the U.S. about $2 billion over 10 years."

The Financial Times (4/27, Yeager) notes, "A spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the US industry, said the review of documents was within the committee's power, but added, 'I don't think there is anything in there that would have any bearing on gas prices. Gas prices are set by the law of supply and demand.'"

Gonzales Urges Consumers To Use Less Gas. The AP (4/27, Davis) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal and state investigations aren't a substitute for consumer belt-tightening to combat soaring gas prices across the nation. … 'If the gas companies are colluding together or committing fraud, we have an obligation to investigate that,' Gonzales said Wednesday during a visit to Florida to kickoff an anti-gang program. 'Obviously, this is not something that can be solved solely by law enforcement efforts. It requires, perhaps, a change in behavior by consumers. There are things we can do at a federal level, but also it's going to require a collective effort.' … Gonzales declined to comment on what evidence, if any, his agency has of price fixing in the gasoline market." The AP adds, "President Bush is trying to calm Americans' outrage over soaring gas prices by ordering the Department of Justice to investigate whether the price of gasoline is being illegally manipulated. Gas prices are hovering near $3 a gallon and polls give Bush low marks in handling the crisis. … On Monday, Gonzales shifted some of the focus to local authorities with a letter asking all 50 state attorneys general to be vigilant for price gouging. State authorities have primary authority in policing gouging. … 'We're all working together looking into this,' Gonzales said."

Oil Companies' Large Profits Draw Attention. ABC World News Tonight (4/26, lead story, 2:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "We begin with overflowing profits for the oil industry, as Americans struggle to pay rising prices at the pump. We have had a glimpse, our first glimpse, of how much the big oil companies are earning right now. And all indications are, new records are on the way. In the first three months of this year, Conoco Phillips said it made $3.3 billion in profits. BP, more than $5.5 billion. The windfalls are breathtaking. And larger ones are expected in the coming days." ABC (B. Stark) added, "Analysts expect the top five oil companies to make a whopping $27 billion in the first three months of 2006."

ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 2, 2:10, Vargas, 8.78M) also examined other beneficiaries of rising energy prices, such as Saudi Arabia, "the world's number one oil producer is expected to make $154 billion this year, fueling a building boom. Venezuela, which provides the US with more than 10% of its oil, is expected to make $34 billion. Its president is using those profits to support anti-US politicians across Latin America. There's no question, however, that US oil companies have hit a profits gusher, too."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 3, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Red Cavaney of the American Petroleum Institute "explains it this way: For every $1 spent on gas, 55 cents is the cost of crude, which the big oil companies really can't control. Twenty six cents goes to refining and distribution, where the bulk of their money is made; the last 19 cents in taxes. Why can't the industry simply lower their profits to help lower the price of gas?" Cavaney: "All of the companies here in the US that deal with the consumer are investor-owned companies. The responsibility of the management there is to ensure that they're providing for shareholder return." Pitts: "But surging oil profits aren't shared by gas station owners."

Justin Lahart in his "Ahead of the Tape" column in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, C1, 2.11M) notes, "Energy companies are in a bind most companies can only envy: They are doing so well that they have been at pains lately to convince others -- and themselves -- that things aren't as good as they seem." And experts expect Exxon Mobil to report it "earned $1.50 in the first quarter, up 30% from a year ago, when things weren't all that bad. In 2005, Exxon recorded the highest annual profit ever for a publicly traded company, $36 billion, on sales of $371 billion that surpassed Wal-Mart Stores'."

The New York Times/AP (4/27) also notes ConocoPhillips, Exxon Mobil and Chevron "are expected to report a total of more than $16 billion in first-quarter profit. James J. Mulva, chief executive at ConocoPhillips, said in a conference call with analysts and investors that the company would spend about $18 billion this year in capital investments, up from the $10 billion announced in December."

Oil Industry Warns Windfall Taxes Not The Answer. In response to the increased congressional attention on Capitol Hill, the Financial Times (4/27, Swann) notes American Petroleum Institute president Red Caverney said, "Windfall taxes were tried between 1980 and 1986 and it increased out dependence on foreign oil and reduced domestic production. … There is nothing good that comes of it."

Oil Industry Launches Counteroffensive. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Douglass, 958K) reports, "Oil executives have launched their own offensive to win American hearts and minds. In full-page advertisements and media interviews, they argue that the millions of Americans who own shares in oil concerns are winners too. Exxon Mobil, the world's biggest company with $1 billion a day in sales, insisted Wednesday that it was too small to influence the global oil market." Spokesman Mark Boudreaux said, "As big as we are, we are only 3% of the crude oil production in the world."

Lawmakers Follow Bush Lead On Examining Tax Breaks. The New York Times (4/27, A1, Andrews, Janofsky, 1.19M) in a front page story reports, "Leading Republicans echoed President Bush's call Tuesday to trim about $2 billion in tax breaks Congress passed as part of the energy bill last August. Several prominent Democrats, not to be outdone, pushed for repealing oil and gas tax breaks worth more than $10 billion over the next five years." But "experts contend that the government has few options that would quickly reduce gasoline prices, and competing party agendas could block Congressional agreement on any meaningful legislation." Legislators "have introduced more than 30 energy bills in the last several months. But they reflect often - conflicting goals of reducing prices, increasing production and soothing consumer anger about oil industry profits."

Policy Makers Have Few Options To Ease Price Pressure. NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 3, 2:05, Thompson, 9.87M) reported in a "reality check" segment that President Bush "wants to delay filling the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to put more oil on the market because he says every little bit helps." Phil Flynn, oil analyst: "Every little bit does help, but it doesn't get any littler than this." Thompson: "Oil analyst Phil Flynn says the move would only add 15,000 barrels a day, a drop in the bucket compared to the almost 21 million barrels a day we use." Thompson: "Experts say the cries to break up these behemoths ignore the reality that the US imports two-thirds of its oil, and these companies have little control over price. Market manipulation is what the Federal Trade Commission is investigating, but prior investigations found no evidence of price fixing or collusion." NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 8, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) also examined how the increase in gas prices has affected driver behavior.

Democrats Hold Press Conferences To Highlight Gas Prices. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Koppel) reported, "Yesterday Democrats both in the House and the Senate held back-to-back news conferences to get their message out. Today Democrats I guess you could say took their message on the road. Or at least down the road from the Hill. Senate Democrats made a point of walking to a nearby gas station, a sign with the latest gas prices, another chance to drill away at the White House and Republicans. … Democrats intend to call on Congress this week to spend $350 million so the federal government can better monitor oil companies and crack down on possible price gouging." CNN added that "a House leadership Republican aide tells CNN, Wolf, that the House speaker, Dennis Hastert, and other Republicans plan to take their message to the pumps tomorrow as well, to try to lay out some of the ideas that they say they have in store for lowering those prices."

Senate Ag Committee To Consider Alternative Fuel Options. The AP (4/27, Frommer) reports, "A day after President Bush touted the increased use of renewable fuels to help offset rising gas prices," the Senate Agriculture Committee "looked at ways to promote the use of such fuels." Committee chairman Saxby Chambliss "said that the energy bill passed by Congress last year has helped spur the renewable fuels industry by creating a national renewable fuel standard, and by extending the biodiesel tax credit."

Alternative Energy Programs Not Expected To Offer Short Term Relief. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Scherer, 61K) reports, "Prospects for alternative energy got a boost this week when President Bush spoke to the Renewable Energy Association. 'What we are seeing is more creativity,' says John McLennan, a director of technical services at ASRC Energy Services E&T, Inc. in Salt Lake City." But "don't expect to see changes overnight. 'As the oil price rises, it doesn't mean that we're all going to turn a switch on and be awash in alternative fuels,' says Aaron Brady, an energy analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. 'There is no one technology that is the silver bullet that will overturn the dominance of petroleum, but a lot of efforts will become part of the mix that increases the supply of liquid fuels for the world.'"

Alternative Energy Companies Expect Stocks To Rise. The Washington Times/AP (4/27, Seewer) reports, "Investors are betting that new energy regulations and high gas prices could lead to an earnings bonanza for companies such as Andersons, ADM and Pacific Ethanol that produce the fuel additive made from fermented corn that allows cars to run more cleanly." For example, Pacific Ethanol shares "nearly doubled in January, the same month that President Bush touted ethanol in his State of the Union speech. Its shares fell 30 cents yesterday to close at $33.00 on the Nasdaq Stock Market."

Milbank Says Lawmakers Rhetoric On Gas Prices Does Not Match Personal Behavior. Dana Milbank in his "Washington Sketch" column in the Washington Post (4/27, A2, 744K) faults lawmakers for trading jabs over responsibility for high gas prices while driving gas guzzling cars noting that the US "may be addicted to oil, as President Bush puts it. But America is in the denial phase of this addiction -- as evidenced by the behavior of its lawmakers. They have proposed all kinds of solutions to high gas prices: taxes on oil companies, domestic oil drilling and releasing petroleum reserves. But they ignore the obvious: that Americans drive too much in too-big cars."

SEC System For Measuring Oil Reserves Seen As Outdated. Cambridge Energy Research Associates chairman Daniel Yergin in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) questions the accuracy of SEC "proved reserves" reporting system saying it "has become antique, and the information it provides to investors increasingly diverges from the actual resource position of many companies. Nor does it serve the original intent of disclosure -- energy security." Yerges states, "The result is a disconnect between the mandated reserves disclosure and the reality of companies' plans, strategies and activities -- and how they are spending many billions of dollars. Owing to the current rules, much of what they are working on, though particularly relevant to their futures, cannot be counted. That divergence hardly helps investors understand the position of a company and its future prospects."

MediaNews To Purchase Four McClatchy Newspapers. The AP (4/27) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc., publisher of the Denver Post and other newspapers, is buying four newspapers from McClatchy Co. for $1 billion in cash with backing from Hearst Corp." The AP continues, "The four papers -- the San Jose Mercury News, the Contra Costa (Calif.) Times, the Monterey (Calif.) County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press -- currently are owned by Knight Ridder Inc., which McClatchy is buying. … The deal announced late yesterday would strengthen MediaNews's presence in Northern California, where it already owns several papers in the San Francisco Bay area." The AP adds, "The four papers are among the 12 Knight Ridder properties that McClatchy has said it intends to sell since they do not meet McClatchy's acquisition criteria, which include being located in rapidly growing markets. … MediaNews' interest in the newspapers had been widely known. The three Northern California papers would complement the company's existing holdings, which include the Oakland Tribune and the Marin Independent Journal. MediaNews owns a number of newspapers in geographic clusters, which helps reduce production and other costs and allows for group advertising sales. … McClatchy said yesterday that the Justice Department told the company that it would seek additional information regarding the Minneapolis-St. Paul area, indicating that regulators did not see other antitrust concerns with the Knight Ridder takeover."

TheStreet (4/27, Brown) reports, "McClatchy got a Justice Department request for additional information on its planned acquisition of Knight-Ridder. … The Sacramento-based newspaper company says the government wants information about papers in Minnesota." TheStreet continues, "McClatchy is owner of the Star Tribune in Minneapolis, and with the Knight-Ridder deal it gains control of the Pioneer Press in nearby St. Paul. … 'The scope of the DOJ's request is limited to information concerning the Minneapolis -- St. Paul, Minnesota area. McClatchy has previously announced its intention to divest the St. Paul Pioneer Press newspaper, currently owned by Knight-Ridder Inc., to a third party,' a company statement read."

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (4/27, Welbes) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc. is buying the St. Paul Pioneer Press in a complex transaction that involves the Hearst Corp., three other papers and a $1 billion price tag." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The proposed deal, announced Wednesday by MediaNews and the McClatchy Co., the owner of the Minneapolis-based Star Tribune, would end more than five months of speculation about who eventually would own the Pioneer Press. … Regulators are taking a close look at how the shuffling of ownership will affect competition in the Twin Cities and in the California markets where MediaNews will gain considerable strength."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (4/27, Phelps, Fiedler) reports, "The announcement capped a whirlwind spring for the St. Paul newspaper, the state's oldest. … It was put on the market along with 11 other Knight Ridder papers right after McClatchy bought the chain last month. Helping drive the sale of the Pioneer Press were antitrust concerns that regulators wouldn't be comfortable with two major papers under the ownership of one company in the Twin Cities market."

The Contra Costa Times (4/27, Avalos, Temple) reports, "The McClatchy Co. announced an agreement to sell the Times and three other newspapers for $1 billion to two parties. … Denver-based MediaNews, publisher of the Oakland Tribune and other East Bay papers, will purchase the Times and San Jose Mercury News." The Times adds, "The sale of the Times became increasingly certain starting last October when several big shareholders rebelled at the lackluster stock performance of its parent, San Jose-based Knight Ridder, and eventually forced Knight Ridder to put itself on the block. … Sacramento-based McClatchy announced it had won the sparsely contested auction on March 12, in a stock and cash deal then worth $4.5 billion. The news was greeted with optimism by Times reporters and employees, given McClatchy's reputation for quality journalism and financial stability." The Times notes, "Separately on Wednesday, McClatchy Corp. said that the U.S. Department of Justice is seeking additional information regarding its pending purchase of Knight-Ridder.The DOJ's request is limited to the St. Paul Pioneer-Press, but McClatchy said it extends the waiting period under antitrust law, giving the government additional time to review the transaction -- and potentially holding up any deal."

Newspaper Guild Seeks Revocation Of York, PA, JOA. Editor & Publisher (4/27) reports, "The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America filed a petition with the U.S. Attorney General's office claiming that MediaNews Group violated the Newspaper Preservation Act with two York, Pa., daily papers." E&P continues, "The Guild, along with York/Adams County Central Labor Council and City Council President Cameron Texter, charge that MediaNews Group has 'hidden the fact that it now is sole owner and publisher of both papers.'" E&P adds, "In 1989 the Justice Department approved a JOA between MediaNews, publisher of the York Dispatch, and Buckner News Alliance, publisher of the York Daily Record. … The union groups and city council president claim that 'the two publishers engaged in deception in 2004 by reporting that they had swapped ownership of the two papers' when in fact MediaNews bought the Daily Record from Buckner while retaining the Dispatch."

Microsoft Claims EU Ruling Undermines Trade Secrets. The AP (4/27, White, Moore) reports, "Microsoft Corp. complained Wednesday that the European Commission forced it to hand over trade secrets to rivals, effectively giving them a 'free ride' on the work the software maker did to acquire new customers and develop new technologies. … But Anthony Whelan, the Commission's lawyer, said that the 'super-dominant' software maker had managed to strangle its rivals' innovation and was unlikely to face 'an attack of the clones' if it gave companies the information they needed to make their programs work more smoothly with the Windows operating system. … 'Microsoft's alarmist claims about duplication have been made for your consideration only,' he told the panel of 13 judges who are considering the company's challenge to the Commission's 2004 antitrust order and record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine." The AP adds, "The weeklong hearing was in its third day Wednesday, and the focus shifted from media player software to the EU regulators' order that Microsoft give interoperability information to makers of rival server operating systems. … Whelan said Novell Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc. were reduced to catering to network servers with 'last century's technology' -- Windows NT -- because Microsoft withheld the code needed to allow them to work smoothly with PCs running the world's most-used desktop software."

Dow Jones (4/27) reports, "Microsoft is appealing a landmark antitrust punishment before a European court in Luxembourg. In 2004, the Commission found the company cripples rival software makers by withholding key 'interoperability' information. The regulator also said Microsoft illegally bundles its Media Player program with Windows. On these two counts, the Commission fined the company a record EUR497 million and ordered it to change its some of its business practices. … During the first two days of hearings, Microsoft defended its bundled Media Player software, claiming the Commission made 'serious errors' in its decision. Wednesday and Thursday, Microsoft is arguing that Windows isn't designed to hamper rivals' products."

Wehrum Approved For EPA Assistant Administrator. CQ Today (4/27, Tollefson) reports, "A divided Senate Environment and Public Works Committee approved" William L. Wehrum's nomination as assistant EPA administrator for air and radiation "on a straight party-line vote, as moderate Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., upheld the president's prerogative to choose his administration." The nomination has been "controversial," as Democrats and environmentalists…say Wehrum played a crucial role in developing rules that they contend undercut EPA's statutory authority to cut smokestack pollution from power plants. "

SCOTUS Rules Arkansas Wrongfully Seized Home. The New York Times (4/27, Greenhouse) reports that the Supreme Court ruled on Wednesday "that Arkansas violated a homeowner's right to due process when it sold his house for nonpayment of taxes after sending him two certified letters that came back 'unclaimed.' … Writing for a 5-to-3 majority, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said that 'it is not too much to insist that the state do a bit more' before using its 'extraordinary power' to take and sell a person's house." The Times adds, "Justices Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and Anthony M. Kennedy dissented, the latter two signing a dissenting opinion by Justice Thomas. The state did all that was constitutionally required, Justice Thomas said, adding that it was the homeowner's responsibility to make sure that the authorities knew how to contact him. The court was imposing a 'burdensome' and 'impractical' requirement on the government, he said. … Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote in the case, which was argued shortly before he joined the court in January. … For anyone watching the emergence of the Roberts court, the case provided intriguing tea leaves. It was the chief justice's fourth majority opinion, and the first to provoke any dissenting votes. "

National Parks Feel Budget Pinch. The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports that while "nothing tops national parks as a popular government program," the "expenses for war in Iraq, hurricane cleanup, and other activities continue to push the federal deficit ever higher, parks around the country are facing a budget crunch." Managers at 12 national parks "told GAO officials that they do not have the financial resources to keep up with increasing costs," and parks advocates and former park service employees are "predicting reduced visitor services and increased fees."

WPost Rebukes EPA Over Anacostia River Monitoring. The Washington Post (4/27, A26, 744K) editorializes, "Barely a month ago, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit issued a stinging rebuke to the Environmental Protection Agency's efforts to rewrite federal clean air law to weaken rules concerning power companies upgrading old coal-fired equipment. This week, a cross-ideological panel of the court unanimously accused the agency, once again, of defying federal environmental law -- this time concerning efforts to clean up the Anacostia River." The "strong, derisive language should send a message to the agency to take congressional enactments seriously, as written." Still, "federal regulators shouldn't need such judicial reminders that the law means what it says."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

9th Circuit Overturns Pot Guru's Conviction. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/27, Egelko) reports, "The federal marijuana cultivation convictions of noted pot advocate Ed Rosenthal were overturned by a federal appeals court (Wednesday) because of a juror's phone call to an attorney friend, who told her to follow the judge's instructions or she could get in trouble." The Chronicle continues, "The juror's unauthorized contact on the eve of the verdict in January 2003 was an 'improper influence' that denied Rosenthal a trial before an impartial jury, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said in a 3-0 ruling granting him a new trial. … 'Jurors cannot fairly determine the outcome of a case if they believe they will face "trouble" for a conclusion they reach as jurors,' said the opinion by Judge Betty Fletcher. 'The threat of punishment works a coercive influence on the jury's independence.'"

The AP (4/27, Kravets) reports, "Rosenthal was convicted in 2003 for cultivating hundreds of marijuana plants for a city of Oakland medical marijuana program. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced him to one day in prison, saying Rosenthal reasonably believed he was immune from prosecution because he was acting on behalf of city officials. … The government sought a two-year prison term and appealed. Rosenthal cross-appealed." The AP adds, "The case drew national attention, in part, because of Rosenthal's status as a leading author and proponent of marijuana. It also underscored the federal government's position that medical marijuana is illegal, it has no medical value and the will of California voters has no effect on nationwide drug laws. … U.S. Attorney's spokesman Luke Macaulay said the office was considering whether to appeal or go ahead with a new trial."

BankAtlantic Agrees To Forfeit $10 Million In Money-Laundering Settlement. The AP (4/27, Anderson) reports, "BankAtlantic agreed Wednesday to forfeit $10 million to the U.S. government to avoid criminal charges that it permitted millions of dollars in suspected drug money to be laundered through its accounts over a nearly seven-year period." The AP continues, "Under an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department filed in federal court, prosecution against the Fort Lauderdale-based bank will be deferred for at least 12 months in return for the payment. The charges will be dismissed altogether if BankAtlantic continues taking action to remedy the situation. … The investigation, led by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and federal bank regulators, identified more than $50 million in suspicious transactions between July 1997 and April 2004, according to court documents." The AP adds, "DEA agents working undercover as operatives for supposed Colombian drug lords found that drug money was being wire transferred to a handful of BankAtlantic accounts overseen by a specific branch manager. That led to the discovery of other BankAtlantic accounts being used to launder illicit drug proceeds. … BankAtlantic admitted in the agreement that it did not identify and report the suspicious transactions as required by the Bank Secrecy Act. Court papers say there were numerous "red flags" about the transactions, such as a high volume of both incoming and outgoing wire transfers to unrelated people and corporations."

Dow Jones (4/27) reports, "In the agreement, the Justice Department and Drug Enforcement Agency alleged that BankAtlantic allowed millions of dollars to illegally flow through its accounts from 1997 through April 2004. This included 'the deposit and transfer of more than $10 million in suspected drug proceeds originating from U.S. undercover law enforcement operations.' … Court records show that undercover drug enforcement officials made deals with suspected drug traffickers to help deposit drug proceeds into U.S. banks. On multiple occasions, money couriers handed undercover agents bags or briefcases with between $150,000 and $500,000 in cash. The agents then deposited the money into a secret government account and were asked by the suspected drug traffickers to wire the money to accounts at BankAtlantic."

Federal Grand Jury Indicts 12 In South Carolina On Meth Charges. The Charlotte Observer (4/27, Lyttle) reports, "Federal officials have indicted a dozen people from Burke and McDowell counties in a methamphetamine crackdown. … All but one of the 12 suspects have been apprehended, and 10 remain in federal custody." The Observer continues, "Suellen Pierce, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Justice Department, said the indictments are the result of an investigation that involved the Drug Enforcement Administration, the N.C. State Bureau of Investigation, the McDowell County Sheriff's Office, and the Marion Police Department. … Pierce did not give additional information on how the investigation and arrests took place." The Observer adds, "Each of the 12 faces one count of conspiracy to manufacture and possess, with the intent to distribute, methamphetamine. The indictments were returned by a federal grand jury in Asheville on April 4. The charge carries a penalty of 10 years or more in prison, plus a fine of up to $4 million."

San Francisco Man Found Dead May Have Stored Meth For Hells Angels. The AP (4/26) reports police said a man "suspected of storing methamphetamine for the ringleaders of an alleged Hells Angels drug ring was found shot to death at Ocean Beach. Michael Demetrescu Sr., 46, was wanted on federal drug trafficking charges after agents raided 19 Hells Angels locations last week and found a pound of methamphetamine in the garage of Demetrescu's home in San Francisco. … Investigators believe Demetrescu was storing drugs for his neighbor, Jason Peterson, 32, a top Hells Angels official who was arrested in the raids Thursday along with the San Francisco chapter president, 35-year-old Joseph Wilson."

The San Francisco Chronicle (4/26, Van Derbeken) reports Demetrescu is believed to have committed suicide and that he had told his girlfriend he was going to turn himself in, following the raids. Demetrescu "had faced 40 years to life in prison if convicted of federal methamphetamine trafficking charges that had been lodged against him after the raids Thursday."

15 Arrested In San Francisco Crack Cocaine Sweep. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/26, Van Derbeken, Writer) reports San Francisco police "trying to gain control over crime in the Western Addition have secured warrants for at least two dozen suspected crack cocaine dealers and have arrested 15 of them. Although none of those named in the warrants is wanted on murder charges, police said they were optimistic that taking crack dealers off the streets would reduce violent crime in the Western Addition. … The sweep was conducted by the narcotics detail, with assistance from the gang task force, officers from Northern Station, and agents with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration."

Texas Gym Owner Pleads Guilty To Cocaine Charge. The Brownsville (TX) Herald (4/27) reports the owner of a Brownsville gym pleaded guilty to a federal drug trafficking charge Wednesday morning. Powerhouse Gym owner Jose Alfredo DeLeon had maintained his innocence on the conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine charge until the Wednesday morning hearing where he told U.S. District Judge Andrew S. Hanen that he had a 'cocaine habit.' The 39-year-old man, who was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents in January, told Hanen that he last used cocaine three days before his arrest."

Man Gets 3-Year Sentence Following Cocaine Deal With DEA Informant. The Journal News (4/26) in White Plains, New York reports a New Rochelle man "was sentenced to more than three years in prison for cocaine trafficking. Victor M. Frias-Valencia…pleaded guilty in November in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport to possessing and intending to distribute a kilogram of cocaine. Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration arrested Frias-Valencia in Greenwich on Sept. 29, 2004, after he struck a deal with a DEA informant to sell the cocaine, roughly 2.2 pounds, according to court documents and Frias-Valencia's plea."

Massachusetts Man Found Guilty In Cocaine Case. The AP (4/26) reports, "A jury finds a Massachusetts man guilty of conspiring to deal cocaine. Domingo Gonzales was arrested last year after agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration raided a Providence [Rhode

Massachusetts Man Gets 5-Year Sentence For Role In Oxycodone Ring. The Salem (MA) News (4/27) reports a Peabody man "will spend more than five years behind bars for his part in a ring that peddled [oxycodone] on Cape Ann. Jose Melo…was sentenced to more than five years (63 months) for distribution. During an undercover drug raid in 2004, Melo was arrested along with a dozen others, most from Gloucester. … Deputies and the DEA said they purchased 1,096 80 milligram pills between October 2003 and June 2004."

Student, Teen Charged In Michigan Gun Case. The Detroit News (4/27) reports, "A 16-year-old student at the Academy of Business and Technology (in Melvindale, MI) and a 15-year old who formerly attended the school were charged Wednesday with carrying a concealed weapon and with making a terrorist threat in separate incidents at the school." The News continues, "Melvindale police were at the school Tuesday investigating an e-mail in which someone threatened to shoot up the school when a student approached the officers and told them they saw a student with a gun, said Chief Rick Cadez. … When officers located the 16-year-old, a Detroit resident, he was carrying an unloaded .25-caliber hand gun, the chief said. Police were not able to learn where he got the gun, as his parents refused to allow police to interview him." The News adds, "The gun was given to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) which will trace its ownership. The youth was turned over to Wayne County juvenile authorities. Wayne County Prosecutor Kym L. Worthy issued a warrant charging him with carrying a concealed weapon."

South Carolina Man Given Probation For Bomb Possession. The Georgetown (SC) Times (4/27, Harper) reports, "An Andrews (SC) man arrested last year for possessing homemade bombs will not go to jail after it was determined he had no criminal intentions." The Times continues, "Norman Weaver, 30, pled guilty to multiple counts of possession of a destructive device and was sentenced to 18 months probation Tuesday. … He was arrested in October after Georgetown County deputies went to his Big Dam Swamp home to investigate another matter." The Times adds, "Deputy Solicitor Matthew Modica told Judge Edward Cottingham while the officers were at the home they found eight bombs made of PCP pipe that were packed with black powder. … He said South Carolina Law Enforcement Division and federal ATF agents were called in to assist with the investigation. He said after the inquest, it was decided the matter did not warrant federal prosecution.Modica said Weaver's name did not appear on any intelligence watch lists and the ATF agents 'did not believe he posed a threat.' … However, Modica noted, 'it is against the law in South Carolina to possess' such devices."

ATF Search In Michigan Called Politically Motivated. The Saginaw News (4/27, Bohn) reports, "Time will tell if federal agents will return with arrest warrants after carting away numerous firearms from the home of an embattled Brady Township official whose husband is a convicted felon. … Federal law says felons cannot own firearms." The News continues, "While Clerk Melissa Alcorn is at odds with the township supervisor, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on Tuesday morning focused on her husband, Douglas A. Alcorn, 41, who served a month in jail and four years of probation, the first two on electronic tether. … He pleaded no contest in 1993 to a charge of second-degree child abuse. In return, prosecutors dismissed a count of first-degree child abuse, court records show." The News adds, "Court documents show his first wife filed the charges two months into their marriage. … Arnold D. Dunchock of Corunna, an attorney for the Alcorns, said the firearms were in a gun safe in the home and Douglas Alcorn 'did not have access to them.' … Dunchock said the family is incensed that agents 'apprehended' Melissa Alcorn while she was driving home after dropping one of her four children off to school and conducted the search of their home in front of their other three children. … She has bickered for months with Brady Township Supervisor John Schoch, who faces a recall election Tuesday. … While Schoch blames Alcorn for orchestrating the recall, the timing of the raid prompted the Alcorns' attorney to complain about political motivations. … Dunchock suggested that Schoch prompted the ATF search on the couple in retaliation for the recall effort, but Schoch said he knew nothing about the raid until it happened."

IMMIGRATION:

Former Nazi Guard Seeks Review Of Citizenship Revocation. The AP (4/27, Wilson) reports, "A lawyer for a former Nazi concentration camp guard has asked a federal appeals court to review its ruling to revoke the man's U.S. citizenship." The AP continues, "Lisa Mattson, a lawyer for John Hansl, filed documents with the U.S. 8th Circuit Court of Appeals last week, seeking a review by the entire court. … A three-judge panel of the St. Louis-based court ruled March 7 that a U.S. District Court judge was correct in revoking the citizenship of Hansl, 81, who lives in Des Moines." The AP adds, "The U.S. Department of Justice filed a complaint against Hansl in July 2003, claiming he hid his service with the Waffen SS when he applied for a visa to come the United States in 1955. He was granted a visa and became a U.S. citizen in 1960. … The case revolved around a 1953 law designed to control the flow of immigrants to the U.S. after World War II. … Mattson claimed the law required a person to have 'personally assisted' in the persecution of others before they could be denied a visa. … U.S. District Court Judge Robert Pratt revoked Hansl's citizenship in April 2005, ruling that Hansl's conduct as a Nazi concentration camp guard left 'no room for factual dispute whether he personally advocated or assisted in persecution.'"

Justices Appear Reluctant To Allow Use Of RICO In Immigration Case. The Legal Times (4/27, Mauro) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared sympathetic to pleas by business advocates not to 'RICO-ize' all types of business relationships, as Justice Stephen Breyer put it, during oral arguments Wednesday." The Times continues, "The Court heard debate in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, a class action brought against Georgia carpet manufacturer Mohawk Industries under the civil portion of RICO, the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. Current and former employees of Mohawk claimed that its hiring of illegal aliens -- in concert with outside recruiting and temp agencies -- depressed wages and amounted to racketeering as defined under RICO. If the suit fits under RICO and the plaintiffs prevail, Mohawk would be exposed to treble damages and could be forced to pay plaintiffs' attorney fees. … 'These are enormous penalties that are imposed,' Mohawk's lawyer, Carter Phillips, told the justices. Congress passed RICO to target organized crime, he asserted, not ordinary dealings between businesses and their agents and contractors. 'It is not free for the government or anyone else' to broaden the law unilaterally, said Phillips, a partner in the D.C. office of Sidley Austin. … In advance billing it appeared that the Mohawk case would draw the high court into some of the immigration issues causing controversy across the nation, including the contention that the corporate hiring of illegal aliens has had the indirect effect of keeping wages low for American citizens. … Instead immigration was barely mentioned, as oral arguments devolved quickly into a dense debate over the ambiguous wording of the RICO statute and whether a corporation like Mohawk can be part of a separate 'enterprise' covered by the law."

TAX:

Negotiators Hopeful Deal On Tax Cut Package Near. CQ (4/26, Van Dongen) reports negotiators "said they hope to announce a deal Thursday on a long-delayed $70 billion tax cut package, but the top tax writers in the House and Senate continued to squabble over strategy." Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas "said that a meeting late Wednesday in the office of Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., allowed conferees to 'move forward.' The bill (HR 4297) is expected to include a two-year extension of cuts to capital gains and dividend taxes, as well as a provision to extend for 2006 an adjustment to the alternative minimum tax (AMT) to blunt its effect on middle-class taxpayers." CQ adds that despite "pressure from Bush and House and Senate GOP leaders to finish the tax package, Thomas and Senate Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley, R-Iowa, have yet to strike a final deal." Conferees still "were sparring Wednesday over the costs and content of a separate package of tax breaks expected to contain business tax breaks, including extending the research-and-development tax credit, which has bipartisan support."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Poll Shows Bush Approval At 36% Over Concerns About Gas Prices, Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Harwood, 2.11M) reports, "Rising gas prices have intensified discontent with Washington and handed Congress a frightening midterm election backdrop: a deeply pessimistic electorate, despite a robust economy." The latest "Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. Fully 77% call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data showed new-home sales and factory orders remain strong." The public is concerned about "the prolonged and unpopular Iraq war. But it also shows the impact of pump prices topping $3 a gallon in many places, passing Iraq to become the nation's highest-priority issue." The low poll numbers represent "a powerful source of frustration for Republicans, who want Mr. Bush and Congress to get more credit for the economy. Doing just that is a top priority of new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and congressional Republican leaders, who are aiming to take a first step by accelerating House-Senate negotiations on tax-cut legislation that would extend the current 15% rates on capital gains and dividends." Bush's 36% approval rating is "the lowest he has ever received in the Journal/NBC survey."

On NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 2, 2:35, 9.87M), anchor Brian Williams and Washington bureau chief Tim Russert discussed the results of the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. Williams: "For this President during our polling this is an all-time low. The approval-disapproval number – 36% approval rating for the President, 57% disapprove." Russert added, "This is an unsettled country. Look at this -- wrong track, right track -- 67% of the American people, two-thirds, now believe we're on the wrong track. Why? The economy is a huge reason. Only 19% are confident about the direction of the economy. 77%, three out of four, uneasy about the economy. And what are the top concerns that create this unease? Gas prices at $3, 45% of our respondees; Iran nuclear weapon 33%; illegal immigration, 26. Gas prices have people hopping mad."

Similarly the Washington Post (4/27, A1, Whoriskey, 744K) in a front page story says "Anger over gas prices is gaining traction in many midterm races around the nation as Democrats attack Republicans for being too close to oil companies. With many in the GOP growing uneasy, President Bush this week called for price-fixing investigations. Political analysts say the rising prices could dovetail with growing public concern over the war in Iraq to give Democrats an opening in several key races."

Bartlett Says White House Is Not Demoralized By Low Poll Numbers. White House Communications Director Dan Bartlett was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (4/26) if the White House is "demoralized" because Bush is at "33% in the polls." Bartlett said, "No," adding that President Bush "has made some very difficult decisions, decisions that he feels in his heart of hearts were the right decisions to make, but he understands it makes people anxious." Asked if he attributes the low poll numbers to press coverage, Bartlett said, "Not always. I do think the media, particularly on Iraq, are trying to do the right thing. It is a newsworthy event any time there's a loss of life but it's a complex story to cover."

Bush To Address Fuel Efficiency, Pension Concerns With US Automakers. The New York Times (4/27, Maynard, 1.19M) reports, "President Bush, who touched a nerve this year when he told Detroit carmakers to build 'relevant' vehicles, will meet with the companies' leaders" May 18th. The meeting is expected to "focus on three areas: energy and the environment; costs like pensions and health care premiums that add hundreds of dollars to the price of a Detroit car; and how currency issues affect the Japanese automakers."

Bush Administration Pushing For Revived Nuclear Industry. Under the headline "Warming Up To Nuclear Power," the Washington Post (4/27, D1, Mufson, 744K) reports that while the nuclear industry has for years "lived in the shadow of Chernobyl," now "the Bush administration is pushing for a revival of nuclear power both abroad and in the United States, saying it wants to promote a domestic unlimited energy source. The Bush-backed Energy Policy Act of 2005 included a bevy of incentives for domestic nuclear power, and the administration has laid aside nuclear-proliferation issues to urge India to build nuclear power plants." The Post adds that new DOE assistant secretary for nuclear energy, Dennis Spurgeon, considers himself the "chief salesman for nuclear energy," and noted that Spurgeon believes that getting a "new US nuclear plant built is his 'number one priority.'"

WPost Faults Bush Policies, Says He Should Focus On Changing Consumer's Behavior. The Washington Post (4/27, A26, 744K) in an editorial writes, "No doubt it makes everyone feel better when the president states his concern for Americans. … Unfortunately, the measures President Bush chose to announce this week to combat high prices are either meaningless or possibly dangerous in the long run, even if they do offer a bit of temporary relief." Accusing Bush of also failing to pursue a more rational energy policy," while in office, the Post states that if Bush "were completely honest, the president would tell Americans that the main reason fuel prices are higher in this country is because demand is growing -- and one reason for growing demand is that people drive inefficient cars. They drive inefficient cars because public policy, long shaped by the president and by Congress, has made it advantageous to do so. Until that changes, little else will."

USA Today Faults Bush Response To High Gas Prices. USA Today (4/27, 2.31M) editorializes, "Bush's plan to suspend deposits into the National Petroleum Reserve and to push for more lenient pollution standards would have little impact. Just as useless are calls for a tax on oil company profits and the partisanfinger-pointing of many in Congress." And "it is also perhaps the most visible measure of the inability of the nation's leaders to speak the truth about long-term problems -- Social Security, health care and runaway spending to name three others. Today's high oil prices are the result of a quarter-century of low prices coupled with robust worldwide growth and instability in the world's oil-producing regions. Any meaningful energy polices will take years to unfold."

Snow To Replace McClellan As White House Press Secretary. President Bush yesterday announced Fox News commentator Tony Snow will join the Administration as press secretary. Snow was portrayed in media reports as likeable, independent, open, frank, and optimistic. While observers said these qualities would serve him well in establishing a better relationship between the White House and the press corps, some noted that Snow may find it difficult to adjust to the new position.

On ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 4, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M), chief Washington correspondent George Stephanopoulos said Snow is "going to do very well. He's made his living communicating. He's a smart and very likable guy, so he should lower the temperature in the briefing room and also increase the star power. Also, by picking him, President Bush has already helped himself by going outside his circle, picking someone of independent stature. He shows he's not afraid of having big people of with independent opinions in the White House." But he added the "toughest part of the job" will be the "psychological adjustment. As you showed, he's been out there for a long time, voicing his own opinions. Now, he's going to have to squelch those private opinions and deliver the party line with conviction. That's going to take some getting used to."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, lead story, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Interestingly enough, Mr. Snow has been rather critical of the President while he's been in the commentary business. Mr. Bush actually made light of that, said that he asked Mr. Snow about that during the job interview, said you've been quite critical of me. And Tony Snow said, 'Mr. President, you should have heard what I said about the other guy.'"

NBC Nightly News (4/26, lead story, 3:00, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The President appeared to welcome those knocks today as proof he wants advisors to give him unvarnished advice." Snow is "a reliable conservative and now he is expected to aggressively defend the President. Brian, also worth noting, that he is the first TV personality to be in the job since Gerald Ford hired away Ron Nessen from NBC News back in the 70s."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer) reported that President Bush "announced today that the FOX News anchor Tony Snow has agreed to replace Scott McClellan as the press secretary." CNN (Quijano) added, "Snow actually met with President Bush last Thursday in the residence. He accepted the job we are told yesterday after talking with Dan Bartlett, the counselor to the president, also the new White House chief-of-staff, Josh Bolten. Now Republican sources had said that before this, Snow had wanted and received assurances that he would play an active role in major policy debates. Nevertheless, Mr. Bush made it clear that ultimately, any decisions are still his to make."

The Washington Times (4/27, Curl, Dinan, 90K) reports that Snow "took the job after insisting that he be not just a spokesman, but a participant in administration policy debates. Yet Mr. Bush, in introducing Mr. Snow to reporters gathered in the White House briefing room yesterday, made clear the chain of command. 'My job is to make decisions, and his job is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people,' the president said, with a smiling Mr. Snow next to him."

The AP (4/26, Loven) reported that Snow's hiring "was intended in part to help improve the White House's frayed relationship with the press corps."

Knight Ridder (4/27, Hutcheson) reports that the selection of Snow "broke Bush's pattern of filling top jobs with trusted loyalists." Knight Ridder adds, "The job will give Snow a chance to put into practice his advice that Bush should be much more aggressive in confronting his critics. His appointment pleased Republicans who share that view, but skeptics questioned Snow's ability to influence an organization known for buttoned-down discipline and devotion to the president."

A front page story in the New York Times (4/27, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports that in naming Snow to be his press secretary, Bush "completed a decade-long transformation of the role of the presidential spokesman from behind-the-scenes functionary to daily on-camera personality. Mr. Snow is something the White House briefing room has not yet had at the lectern: a star of the opinionated cable news era. But he is also something Mr. Bush has never had: a free-wheeling outsider in a very public position, and one with a history of sharing critical opinions of the president." The Times also notes, "Mr. Snow's career change also might not be what Fox News executives want in terms of their public relations defense against criticism that their network is philosophically sympathetic to Mr. Bush."

A front page story in the Washington Post (4/27, A1, VandeHei, Fletcher, 744K) reports that the decision to hire Snow "reflects a consensus among the president and his top advisers that his White House operation has been too insular and needs to be more aggressive in engaging with the news media and other Washington constituencies, according to Bush aides and outside advisers."

An analysis by the AP (4/27, Fournier) says, "Naming conservative commentator Tony Snow as White House press secretary puts a fresh face on the administration and may help mend relations with the Washington press corps. But the move underscores how far Bush has fallen in the eyes of his allies -- conservative leaders and voters who helped elect him in 2000 and re-elect him in 2004." Bush "cannot rebound politically without regaining the faith of conservative voters whose support has waned in recent months. If conservatives are too frustrated to vote on Election Day, Republicans could lose control of Congress, and the final two years of Bush's presidency could be filled with Democratic-led investigations."

A separate AP (4/27, Raum) story notes, "If his party loses control of one, or both chambers of Congress, the next two years could be a political nightmare for Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill. With poll numbers at the lowest of his presidency, Bush has had trouble enough winning support for his priorities in his second term even with a Republican-led Congress. That helped lead to a recent reshuffling of the White House staff. A Democratic House or Senate and presidential stubbornness could spell legislative gridlock."

Democrats Note Snow's Past Criticism Of Bush. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer) reported, "Today some Democrats are gleefully pointing out Tony Snow's past criticism of President Bush. And even circulating e-mail with some of his most pointed comments. Snow wrote this about Mr. Bush on a Web site called townhall.com in November of 2005: 'His wavering conservatism' -- referring to the president -- 'has become an active concern among Republicans. The newly passive George Bush has become something of an embarrassment.'"

The AP (4/26, Benac) reported that although Snow is a strong supporter of the President, he "has used his column to label the president 'something of an embarrassment,' cast his domestic policy as 'listless' and compare him to 'the boy who can't say no' when it comes to federal spending." However, Snow has also "been a strong defender of Bush on many an occasion, applauding his 'brilliant' foreign policy, his stick-to-his-guns persistence in Iraq, his 'delicious disdain for the Beltway culture,' his 'visionary' Social Security plan. 'On the seminal issues of national security and global destiny, he positively dwarfs the political opposition,' he has written of Bush."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Gold, 958K) reports that "Snow's White House appointment reinforces for some the perception that Fox News is the go-to network for the administration, media observers said."

Snow Says He Will Express Differing Opinions To Bush. Tony Snow was asked on Fox News' Special Report (4/26) how he is going to deal with your past criticism of the President. Bush said, "Pretty simple answer. There's probably a lot of people who said I wish I hadn't written or said that. Here's the key, when I give advice to the President, it will be my advice. If I have differing opinions with some people, I will press express them. The job is not to come in as a surrogate President and say what I believe matters because frankly what matters is what the Administration has decided to do and that I will express as forcefully as I possibly can."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Wallsten, Havemann, 958K) reports, "Snow said he intended to continue expressing strong views. 'Look, they want people to express their opinions,' he said. 'You're not coming here to drink the Kool Aid, you're coming here to serve the president. And at this particular juncture, I think what you want is as much honest counsel as you can get. So when I agree, I agree, and when I disagree, I disagree. But on any opinion his vote's the tie-breaker.'"

USA Today (4/27, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports, "Snow said that he has been promised sufficient access to Bush and that he'll express his views privately to the president. However, he said, Bush always has final say: 'The president is the guy who runs the place.'"

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Gerstenzang, Brownstein, 958K) reports that Snow will be "one of the few officials with unscheduled access to the president and Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten. The arrangement could be helpful as Snow, 50, attempts to build trust with a White House press corps that had an adversarial relationship with his predecessor and as he tries to help Bush recover from low public approval ratings."

Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey wrote on Newsweek's (4/26) web site, "One GOP official privy to the negotiations told NEWSWEEK that Snow had pressed administration officials for a job that extended beyond simply being Bush's guy behind the podium and had successfully argued for increased access to the president. Additionally, Snow also argued for and won the ability to make staffing decisions within the press office, including the ability to hire or fire staffers."

Officials Say White House Shake Up Is Nearing Completion. Bloomberg News (4/27) notes that Snow's hiring "is part of an effort by Bush's new Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten to reorganize the White House team amid job approval ratings for the president that are at or near record lows.

Fox News' Special Report (4/26, Cameron) reported, "Senior administration officials say the White House shakeup is nearing completion. There are still a few more changes they'd like to make. For instance, replacing the Treasury Secretary, but that will likely come after the appointment of a new domestic policy adviser to the President, a position that's currently vacant, sometime in the next week or two, by which time Tony should be at the podium and the new face and voice of the Bush White House."

Fleischer Says White House Press Briefing Has Become A TV Show. Ari Fleischer, who was President Bush's press secretary from January 2001 to July 2003, writes in the Washington Post (4/27, A27, 744K) that the daily White House press briefing has become "a TV show. Gone are the days when this daily session was a serious affair, with mostly serious questions asked and mostly serious answers given. Instead, the public is now treated to a spectacle in which the media do their best to pressure the White House, regardless of which party is in power, into admitting that much of what the president is doing is wrong, and the White House pushes back. The two sides talk past each other, and the viewing public gets to watch a good fight."

Senate Diverts Funds From Iraq Supplemental Bill To Border Security. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer) reported, "The Senate voted today to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq and the war on terror to efforts to increase US border security. The move only intensified a battle over pork that spurred President Bush to issue a veiled veto threat." CNN (Bash) added, "Republicans offered to add that money to border security, as an effort to lure conservatives on the issue of immigration." But "because Republicans are really under the gun from conservatives, very angry at them about the amount of government spending, they had to cut it somewhere. And this is an emergency spending bill primarily to fund Iraq. So, that's where it was cut in this particular bill. And Democrats went to the Senate floor and called it outrageous."

The Washington Times (4/27, A1, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Republicans "turned back an effort by Minority Leader Harry Reid to grant the same expenditures for border security but without making cuts elsewhere in the emergency spending bill, which has ballooned to a $106.5 billion proposal. The Nevada Democrat, whose amendment failed on a mostly party-line 54-44 vote, said the Republican amendment would hurt the military." The Washington Post (4/27, A16, Weisman, 744K) reports that when "some Democrats said the move would take money from needed combat funds, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), the bill's sponsor, called the criticism 'pure poppycock.'"

The Baltimore Sun/AP (4/27, Taylor) reports the Senate "voted today to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead increase patrols against illegal immigrants on the nation's borders and provide the Coast Guard with new boats and helicopters." The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Rogers, 2.11M) reports, "Most of the funds would go to buying patrol boats, aircraft and other equipment for Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection operations. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) hopes to burnish the Republican image on border issues before again tackling immigration."

The AFP (4/27) reports the Senate voted 59-39 to approve the amendment "by Republican Senator Judd Gregg that would free up 1.9 billion dollars in credits for surveillance planes and building a fence near San Diego, California, along the border with Mexico."

Bloomberg (4/27, Faler) reports Democrats "denounced the border-security plan, saying it forced lawmakers to choose between supporting American troops and protecting the country's Southwestern border." Sen. Hillary Clinton said, "Border security is an urgent need and it should and must be addressed by this Congress. But our security and our values are not served by choosing between protecting our troops and protecting our homeland."

Gregg, Clinton Spar Over War-Funding Bill. The New Hampshire Union Leader (4/27) reports, "A war of words broke out yesterday between Sens. Judd Gregg and Hillary Clinton after the Senate approved Gregg's proposal to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead bolster U.S. border security." Clinton "said Gregg's cuts would 'take money from troop pay, body armor and even joint improvised explosive device defeat fund. Now that is a false choice, and it is a wrong choice.' Gregg responded heatedly, arguing that the cuts eventually would come from other parts of the massive Pentagon budget rather than U.S. forces in Iraq. 'To come down here and allege that these funds are going to come out of the needs of the people on the front lines in Iraq or Afghanistan is pure poppycock,' he said.

Bush Position On Senate Compromise Ambiguous. CQ (4/26, Sandler, Crowley) reports supporters "of putting most of the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants on a path to earned citizenship are all but certain" that President Bush "is on board with that concept. They met with the president April 25, and though he refrained from expressing outright support for the proposal, they left feeling secure about his position." But Republicans "who have labeled the earned citizenship approach as offering 'amnesty,' however, cautioned that view may be an overzealous interpretation." Sen. John Cornyn said, "The president didn't endorse the compromise."

Anti-Immigrant Group Says Marches Have Helped Recruitment. The AP (4/27, Flaccus) reports "Minuteman organizers say this spring's marches" by advocate for undocumented immigrants in the US "have proved to be an unexpected recruitment tool for Americans who feel uneasy about the burgeoning immigration movement but may have considered the organization a pack of gun-toting vigilantes." Executive director Stephen Eichler said, "We're not trying to be more mainstream — mainstream has found us." The AP adds, "Since this spring's huge pro-immigrant rallies, 300 people nationwide have applied to start local chapters, according to Eichler. The group's goal is 500 chapters by December and a membership of 1 million within 1 1/2 years, Eichler said."

Immigrant Advocate Groups Split Over Business Boycott. The Washington Post (4/27, B1, Brulliard, Williams, 744K) reports, "Disagreement over whether immigrants should walk off the job and boycott businesses Monday appeared to deepen yesterday as one immigrant group mustered support for the protest while another group cautioned immigrants that it might put their jobs at risk." Although "groups in Dallas and Los Angeles say momentum is building for a major May 1 boycott," the Washington-area coalition "that organized the recent rally on the Mall has discouraged participation for fear it could lead to firings and create a negative climate as Congress debates immigration legislation."

The Washington Times (4/27, Summers, 90K) reports, "Local Hispanic elected officials yesterday discouraged participation in Monday's nationwide immigrant boycott of work and school and instead urged immigrants to show solidarity with American citizens." The Hispanic leaders "were responding to calls for a nationwide immigrant boycott organized by the California-based Latino Movement USA and Act Now to Stop War & End Racism (ANSWER) coalition."

US Business Group Criticizes Call For Mexican Boycott Of US Goods. The AP (4/27, Clendenning) reports US lobbyists "lashed out Wednesday at the Mexican 'Nothing Gringo' campaign timed for May 1 to coincide with the 'Day Without Immigrants' boycott in the United States." The American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico "said organizers are risking a backlash and foolishly targeting some of their best allies, since U.S. corporations have actively lobbied the U.S. Congress for immigration reform including legalization for many of the estimated 11 million undocumented migrants." Chamber president Larry Rubin said Mexicans' "refusal to 'buy American' on May 1 could further polarize the debate and make reform supporters seem anti-American at the very moment that lobbyists are trying to persuade lawmakers in Washington to pass a bill that would benefit migrants."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Tobar, Sánchez, 958K) reports, "Spreading now by word of mouth as well as through cyberspace, the campaign calls for a 24-hour boycott Monday of American businesses in Mexico and other Latin American countries. The idea is to show solidarity with immigrant rights protests scheduled in several U.S. cities that day." This week, "a growing number of business groups, trade unions and political leaders in Mexico said they planned to join the boycott, which will be on the traditional May Day holiday here." There is a "growing sense among Mexicans that proposals being debated by the U.S. Congress could hurt millions of compatriots who crossed over illegally." But for "some Mexicans, however, the talk of a boycott is worrisome. In the Mexico City neighborhood of Anzures, Carlos Torres pointed out that his McDonald's franchise was the joint investment of 'many families that are completely Mexican.'"

Anti-Immigrant Group Seeks To Limit Immigrant Rights In San Bernardino, California. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Powers, 958K) reports the "founder of an anti-illegal immigrant group is pushing for San Bernardino to outlaw day labor sites and bar the undocumented from renting property." Joseph Turner, "executive director of the group Save Our State, submitted voter petition signatures this week that would force a City Council vote or a citywide election on the measure, which would also deny city permits, contracts and grants to businesses that employ illegal immigrants, and require that city business be done in English." The "reaction to the proposal in San Bernardino has already ignited a fiery local debate."

Supreme Court Hears RICO Lawsuit Against Employer's Use Of Immigrant Labor. The Washington Times (4/27, Taylor, 90K) reports the lawyers "for employees of a Georgia-based manufacturer yesterday urged the Supreme Court to allow a lawsuit that accuses the flooring company of suppressing workers' wages by recruiting illegal aliens." The case "involves the politically explosive matter of illegal labor," but it "arrived before the justices because of a dispute over the lawsuit's use of the Racketeering Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) -- a law traditionally used to prosecute organized crime." Winning parties "in RICO cases can be awarded triple damages -- notably higher awards than winners in non-racketeering criminal cases." The group "of current and former Mohawk employees say the company violated RICO by systematically contracting outside recruiting firms to hire illegals. The lawsuit says Mohawk provided identification cards to illegal aliens, which helped them avoid detection by immigration authorities."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Gaouette, 958K) reports the case "could provide a new way to crack down on firms that hire undocumented immigrants." The justices "focused on narrow questions: Whether a firm and an outside contractor fit the definition of an 'enterprise' under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute, or RICO, and whether corporations could be sued at all under a law originally meant to chase down the mob." But with "a handful of similar cases already in the courts, a decision for the Mohawk employees could generate numerous civil suits against businesses reliant on immigrants. The decision could also affect the use of RICO in criminal cases. The Justice Department, which had a lawyer in court to support the employees' argument, uses the law to send corrupt union leaders to prison and win financial damages from pension funds."

Gingrich Blasts Current Immigration Reform Proposals. The Washington Times (4/27, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "said the government's failure to enforce immigration laws resembles its handling of Hurricane Katrina, and described current reform proposals in Congress as a 'con.'" In a speech at the American Enterprise Institute, Gingrich said "he sympathizes with illegal aliens participating in protests and placed blame for the illegal immigration problem on businesses and the federal government." Gingrich said, "I do not blame someone who leaves poverty to seek prosperity. They showed up here to work under a social contract and then [the government] tried to change the terms. We need to quit lying about who is hiring illegals -- it's Americans." The AP adds Gingrich's "own immigration reform plan, 'Ending the Dishonesty: The Way Forward on Border Control and Patriotic Immigration,' calls first for gaining control of America's borders, followed by a worker-visa program."

Most Say Immigrant's Nationality Should Not Be Factor. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) reports that with "immigration reform a hot-button issue in Washington, a strong majority of Americans say nationality shouldn't be a factor in U.S. immigration policy, according to a new Harris Interactive poll." Nearly "three-quarters of those polled said children of U.S. citizens should receive favorable treatment in order to immigrate into the U.S. and 67% said spouses should receive favorable treatment. But "about two-thirds of those polled said U.S. immigration policy shouldn't give preference to people from some countries over people from other countries, compared with 21% who said the U.S. policy should give preference."

Senate GOP Claims Votes To Sustain Veto Of Supplemental Spending Bill. The Washington Times (4/27, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Thirty-five Senate Republicans signed a letter yesterday assuring President Bush they will back his veto of the emergency-spending bill for war efforts and hurricane relief if the final version exceeds his requested budget level." Majority Leader Bill Frist said, "The Senate's willingness to support a veto reflects that we're not kidding about fiscal restraint and responsibility." The Times adds the "signatures indicate there are more than enough votes to prevent the Senate from securing the two-thirds vote needed to override a veto." But the "first few tests of senators' willingness to cut the bill didn't go well. Senators voted 49-48 to kill a proposal that would have stripped a highly contentious $700 million plan to reroute a railroad in Mississippi -- dubbed by critics as 'the railroad to nowhere.'"

But the Los Angeles Times (4/27, Simon, Reynolds, 958K) reports that despite the "veto threat, the Republican-controlled Senate on Wednesday refused to pare back an emergency spending bill sought by President Bush that lawmakers had expanded to include their own pet projects, which included items as diverse as aid for farmers and money to reroute a Mississippi railroad." The vote "was a direct rebuff of Bush by a number of GOP senators and underscored a growing party rift at a time when the president's popularity has sunk to new lows in public opinion polls." Sen. Trent Lott said, "I might be intimidated by my constituents, but not the president." The Times adds the Senate 'vote against cutting the $106.5-billion bill was a lopsided 72-26, more than enough to override a veto."

NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 4, 1:50, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "Many senators want taxpayers to pay another $700 million to tear" up the Mississippi railroad "and move it inland to make room for a highway. What's worse, critics say, is that the money has been tacked on to an emergency spending bill for the war in Iraq and victims of Katrina." Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma: "Think how much $700 million could do for the victims of Katrina, how many classrooms could be opened."

CQ (4/26, Higa, Plummer) reports the Senate's "fiscal conservatives trumpeted a promise by 35 Republican senators to back a veto if the total price tag is not much closer to the president's original $92.2 billion request for war funds and hurricane relief." But the "full Senate's repeated votes against major cuts likely mean that cutting the bill enough to avoid a veto would have to take place in a House-Senate conference on the legislation (HR 4939)."

CRS Estimates Iraq Costs To Double Before War Ends. The Washington Post (4/27, A16, Weisman, 744K) reports the Congressional Research Service estimated this week that the "cost of the war in Iraq will reach $320 billion after the expected passage next month of an emergency spending bill currently before the Senate, and that total is likely to more than double before the war ends." The analysis "provides the most official cost estimate yet of a war whose price tag will rise by nearly 17 percent this year. Just last week, independent defense analysts looking only at Defense Department costs put the total at least $7 billion below the CRS figure." Once the "war spending bill is passed, military and diplomatic costs will have reached $101.8 billion this fiscal year, up from $87.3 billion in 2005, $77.3 billion in 2004 and $51 billion in 2003, the year of the invasion, congressional analysts said." When "factoring in costs of the war in Afghanistan, the $811 billion total for both wars would have far exceeded the inflation-adjusted $549 billion cost of the Vietnam War."

Schoomaker Laments Complaints About Size Of Defense Budget. The AP (4/27, Jelinek) reports Army chief of staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker said "Americans spent as much on 'plastic Santa Clauses,' tinsel and other holiday purchases last year as they will for defense in the coming year…lamenting complaints about the military's budget requests." Schoomaker said "the defense budget the Bush administration requested for the fiscal year starting in October — nearly $440 billion — plus the costs of war in Iraq and Afghanistan, is 3.9 percent of the nation's nearly $13 trillion overall economy." The AP adds Schoomaker "was discussing his concern that it might take a fight to get enough money from Congress to rebuild the Army's equipment and supplies worn down in Iraq and Afghanistan."

House Democrats Demand Hearings On Iraq Reconstruction Waste. The AP (4/27, Schweid) reports the 23 Democrats on the House International Relations Committee "demanded congressional hearings on what they said was waste and fraud in reconstruction efforts." But panel Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., "said he had held nine hearings on Iraq, and Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said 'many committees including ours' had reviewed the Iraq situation." Tempers "flared as Democrats accused President Bush of failure and the GOP-controlled committee of shirking its responsibilities."

Coburn Praised For Effort To Cut Mississippi Railroad Reroute Funding. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) praises Sen. Tom Coburn in an editorial for forcing "an up-or-down vote on whether to strip the bill of $700 million for the proposed 'Railroad to Nowhere.' This pet project of Mississippi Republicans Trent Lott and Thad Cochran would reroute railroad tracks that CSX spent $250 million to repair after Hurricane Katrina." Is "this a good use of tax dollars? Mississippians don't think so. Last year Governor Haley Barbour's commission on recovery from Hurricane Katrina rejected the project as 'no longer seen as practical' because of the steep price tag. If Mississippians don't want to foot the bill, why should federal taxpayers?"

NYTimes Criticizes Bush For Supplemental Veto Threat. The New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "President Bush is threatening to veto this year's emergency budget supplement for the Iraq war and hurricane recovery efforts — he's suddenly shocked, shocked that his own Republican-led Senate has steadily inflated it with $14 billion in unrelated goodies. As if this sort of fiscal mayhem is not the now-familiar fallout from the administration's own signature fecklessness in adding to the record debt and deficit for future generations to handle."

Medicare Policy Offers Stability In Prescription Drug Coverage. The New York Times (4/27, Pear, 1.19M) reports the Bush Administration "issued a new policy on Wednesday that protects Medicare beneficiaries against the sudden loss of coverage for drugs they are taking under the prescription drug program." Insurers can "still change their lists of covered drugs, known as formularies. But if they drop any drugs or impose new restrictions, they must exempt beneficiaries who are now taking those drugs."

About 20% Hurt Financially By Participating In Medicare Drug Plan. USA Today (4/27, Wolf, Appleby, 2.31M) reports on those Medicare recipients "hurt, rather than helped" by the Medicare prescription drug plan. Most of the program's beneficiaries "have saved money since it began Jan. 1. But for others, perhaps about 20%, the much-heralded program has meant higher costs, and in some cases greater pain and more worry." Before Medicare, 6.4 million of them "had drug coverage through Medicaid. Others had state help or free drugs from drug companies." On Wednesday, "two advocacy groups and three patients sued the federal government in an effort to improve the plight of the 6.4 million people transferred from Medicaid to the Medicare plan."

The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Lin, 958K) reports a "class-action lawsuit filed in federal court Wednesday alleges that Medicare has failed to properly enroll millions of low-income seniors and disabled beneficiaries into its new prescription drug plan." The suit, "filed in Oakland on behalf of three women and two senior-advocacy groups, also alleges that some low-income beneficiaries eligible for a subsidy were not properly notified about it or not receiving it. As a result of the problems, many seniors and others who qualify for the program are going without critical medication, said lead attorney Jeanne Finberg of the National Senior Citizens Law Center."

USA Today (4/27, Wolf, 2.31M) reports although "most of the more than 30 million beneficiaries enrolled in the program are saving money, two recent surveys suggest a substantial minority of seniors and people with disabilities are not." A Kaiser Family Foundation poll "taken April 6-11 found 55% of 154 seniors who had enrolled said the plan would save them money, 19% said it would cost more, and another 19% said they would break even." A KRC Research poll "taken March 15-20 for the Medicare Rx Education Network, a consortium of groups working to implement the law, found 59% of 201 enrolled seniors saved money, but 23% did not."

House Panel To Investigate Title Insurance Industry. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) reports that in the "wake of recent state and federal investigations into title insurance," Washington lawmakers "are turning critical toward the industry." A subcommittee of the House Financial Services Committee "met yesterday, with an eye toward pushing for more consumer friendly competition in the title business." Officials "in Colorado, California and Washington, D.C., have investigated the industry in recent years, in some cases alleging that title companies paid what amounted to kickbacks to get business."

Mollohan Denies Impropriety In Purchase Of Farm With Contractor. The Washington Post (4/27, A6, 744K) reports Rep. Alan B. Mollohan "said this week that his purchase of farm property with a corporate chief executive has no relationship to his support for legislation providing a $2.1 million defense contract to the CEO's company. Responding to a Wall Street Journal report published Tuesday, Mollohan said he and Dale R. McBride, head of FMW Composite Systems Inc. of Bridgeport, W.Va., have been close friends for 50 years." The Post adds, "Mollohan said he supported the $2.1 million contract for FMW after asking the same questions he applies to all decisions concerning money going to his home state: 'Is it a good project, and does it mean jobs and economic development for West Virginia?'"

House Members Say Ethics Reform Has Low Priority For Constituents. The Washington Post (4/27, A6, Birnbaum, Edsall, 744K) reports the "scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has been a Washington obsession for months, but Republican lawmakers who returned from a two-week recess this week said they felt free to pass a relatively tepid ethics bill because their constituents rarely mention the issue." The House votes today "on ethics legislation to increase lobbyists' disclosures and require lawmakers to own up to the earmarks, or narrow projects, that they insert into appropriations bills. But the measure would not restrict the gifts or meals provided by lobbyists as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) had proposed in January, nor would it expand the number of enforcers of lobbying rules and laws." Lawmakers "acknowledge that the bill is more limited in its scope and impact than the provisions promised by congressional leaders immediately after Abramoff's guilty plea to federal charges of bribery, conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud nearly four months ago. But they say they do not feel compelled to push more stringent measures partly because voters do not appear to be demanding them."

Knight Ridder (4/27, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Just weeks after declaring themselves fiscal and ethical reformers,

lawmakers are adding billions of dollars in special projects to a spending bill for the Iraq war while retreating from some of the lobbying restrictions they'd once touted as the antidote to a spate of scandals." Congress' "continued appetite for unchecked spending and backpedaling on ethics illustrates how hard it is to change behavior that's ingrained in Washington's political culture."

The AP (4/27, Abrams) reports House approval the ethics overhaul "was complicated Wednesday by a Republican split over how to deal with the issue of earmarks, those narrow and often wasteful pet projects that make their way into bigger bills." With a "vote on the lobbying package scheduled for Thursday, the GOP leadership was trying to resolve concerns, coming mainly from Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee." The bill "allows lawmakers to raise points of order against appropriations, or spending bills, that do not properly identify earmarks. But Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., said it was unfair that the crackdown on earmarks was limited to spending bills, and did not apply to tax and authorization, or policy, bills."

CQ (4/26, Dennis, Poole) reports appropriators had been "holding firm in their threat to block floor action on the wide-ranging lobbying overhaul (HR 4975) unless a new earmark proposal was applied equally to authorizing legislation and tax bills, creating an uncertain environment for Thursday's scheduled floor vote." But authorizing committee chairmen "have resisted the appropriators' proposal, and conservatives who have waged a long battle to get earmark rule changes suggested appropriators were trying to affix a 'poison pill' to the lobbying measure to ensure its defeat."

Stabenow Campaign Moves To Correct "Glitch" In Campaign Finance Reports. The AP (4/27, Thomas) reports that Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow's (D) "campaign has corrected her campaign finance reports to show that some donations from 2002 and 2003 came from an Indian tribe then represented by now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, not an individual as she reported at the time. Stabenow's campaign originally reported that $4,000 in donations came from Christopher Petras, who was the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe's legislative director at the time. The donations came during a period in which Stabenow and other Michigan lawmakers sought funding for the tribe and wrote letters to federal regulators on the tribe's behalf." O

House Veterans Affairs Democrats Seek Probe Into Principi Firm's Contract. The Los Angeles Times (4/27, Roche, 958K) reports House Veterans Affairs Committee Democrats are calling for hearings into a "multimillion-dollar contract awarded to a firm now headed by former Veterans Affairs Secretary Anthony J. Principi." Principi's QTC Management "administers medical exams under contract for the VA." In a letter to committee chairman Steve Buyer, "seven Democrats asked for investigations into exam costs by the company and into possible conflicts of interest in awarding the contract." The letter requests a hearing date no later than October 6. Principi "previously told The Times that he fully complied with federal ethics laws, and that as VA secretary for four years he played no role whatsoever in the awarding or administration of the contracts."

Columnist Claims Bush Legacy One Of Ineptitude. Bob Herbert in his column in the New York Times (4/27, 1.19M) writes, "The nation seems, very belatedly, to be catching on to the tragic failures and monumental ineptitude of its president. Mr. Bush's poll numbers are abysmal. Republicans up for re-election are running from him as if he were the bogyman." For example, in the face of global warming warnings, "Bush took his cues from the honchos in the oil and gasoline industry, the very people who were setting the planet on fire. Now he talks about overcoming the nation's addiction to oil! This is amazing. Here's the president of the United States scaling the very heights of chutzpah. The Bush people and the oil people are indistinguishable. Condoleezza Rice, a former Chevron director, even had an oil tanker named after her."

WSJournal Argues Administration Must Act In Restricting Freddie Mac, Fannie Mae. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, 2.11M) editorializes, "Last week the Federal Election Commission shed some light on how Freddie Mac rewarded its friends," as "admitted to illegally raising $1.7 million for candidates from both parties between 2000 and 2003." While "Freddie agreed to fork over $3.8 million in fines," it "probably figures it also got its money's worth," as reform is stalled in Congress. "The Bush Administration has been forceful in calling for Congress to reform how Fannie and Freddie are regulated and run," but it "could itself take the opportunity to rein in Freddie and Fannie," as "An overlooked provision of the laws that founded the two companies already gives the Treasury Secretary the power to restrict the duo's mortgage portfolios that now threaten the U.S. financial system." If the Administration wants reform "to succeed, it is going to have to show Fan and Fred and their friends on the Hill that Treasury will act if Congress doesn't."

Reports On Manufacturing, Housing Indicate Economy Expanding At Healthy Pace. The Washington Times/AP (4/27) reports, "A jump in demand for commercial aircraft pushed orders for big-ticket manufactured goods higher last month while sales of new homes shot up at the fastest pace in 13 years, reflecting a rebound from bad weather in February." The AP notes, "The Fed's 12 regional banks used words such as 'solid' and 'steady' to describe the economy's performance last month and early this month. The Fed did note that 'higher energy prices were at the forefront of most districts' mention of cost pressures,' and that was before crude oil soared to a record $75.17 per barrel Friday."

Bloomberg (4/27, Torres) adds, "Labor markets are 'tightening"and companies are struggling with higher energy prices because they're finding it difficult to pass those costs on to their customers, the central bank said today in its regional survey of the economy." The US economy "probably expanded at a 4.9 percent pace in the first quarter, the fastest since the third quarter of 2003, according to economists surveyed by Bloomberg."

The Financial Times (4/27, Swann) says "The figures suggest that US industry remains in extremely strong shape and increase the chances that the Federal Reserve may need to continue raising interest rates beyond 5 per cent."

But questioning the future of the US economy, the Wall Street Journal (4/27, Conkey, Ip, 2.11M) reports, "The latest readings suggest the nation's economy is carrying significant momentum into the second quarter, raising new questions about when a slowdown might come after a torrid start to the year." After an expected growth of roughly 5% in the first quarter, "over the rest of the year, Federal Reserve officials expect growth to moderate to a long-term rate of 3% to 3.5%, slow enough to keep inflation at bay but fast enough to keep unemployment from rising. That would permit the Fed to stop the campaign of interest-rate increases it began in June 2004." Yet recently "the economy has been sending signals that it might not be ready to settle down. The housing market, though softer, is holding up better than many skeptics predicted and consumer confidence remains surprisingly strong, despite soaring gasoline prices, and concerns about President Bush's handling of the economy. Meanwhile, solid job creation and wage gains are providing a cushion for consumer spending, and orders for capital equipment are picking up."

Similarly, the New York Times (4/27, Bajaj, 1.19M) reports that "economists cautioned that higher energy costs and interest rates might sap some of that vitality."

Stock Market Sends Mixed Signals On Strong Economic Data. The Wall Street Journal (4/27, Patterson, 2.11M) reports, "Wall Street can't seem to make up its mind about interest rates. New signs that the economy is on solid footing have caused investors to rethink expectations about the future course of interest rates in recent days -- and what higher rates mean for stocks." Recently, "the Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to a six-year high amid hopes the Federal Reserve would stop raising its target rate after one more quarter-point increase to 5% at their May meeting. Now, after several reports indicating the economy is stronger than previously thought, more investors think the Fed is likely to increase rates to 5.25% or more."

Bloomberg (4/27, Lawrence) adds, "The Dow average rose 71.24, or 0.6 percent, to 11,354.49, its highest since Jan. 19, 2000. The Dow, which first reached a six-year high last week, got an added lift from General Motors Corp. after Merrill Lynch & Co. said the carmaker has enough cash to pay workers who accept buyout offers. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 3.67, or 0.3 percent, to 1305.41, while the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 3.33, or 0.1 percent, to 2333.63. It was the first time all three indexes rose this week." The Financial Times (4/27John O', Doherty) also reports on the stock market.

Bernanke Not Expected To Reveal Plans On Interest Rates. The Washington Post (4/27, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke is going to disappoint a lot of listeners when he addresses Congress today and provides no guidance on when the central bank will stop raising interest rates to keep inflation under control." Observers "have longed for such a signal and thought they saw it last week when a summary of Fed officials' last policymaking meeting in March suggested they might be done after lifting their benchmark short-term rate once more in May." Yet, "that expectation has wilted as several new government reports have shown the economy is growing briskly and inflation may be moving higher. Fed policymakers almost certainly will raise their benchmark rate again at their May 10 meeting but will be unable to indicate then whether they are done or see more increases in store."

Democrats' Generic Ballot Advantage Shrinks By Seven Points To 45%-39%. On NBC Nightly News (4/26, story 2, 2:35, 9.87M), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert discussed the results of the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. Russert said, "65% of the American people disapprove the job Congress is doing. Only 22% approve. That disapproval rate is up 12 points." But "when asked who do you want to control Congress, 39% say Republicans, 45% say Democrats, a six point plus fro the Dems. But a month ago, look at this, Brian, it was 13 points.

So the people seem to be saying we're mad at both parties. We prefer the Democrats a little bit but we prefer to hear some viable alternatives coming from them."

Professor Says Discontent With War May Cost GOP Control Of Congress. Rutgers University professor Ross Baker in an op-ed in USA Today (4/27, 2.31M) writes, "A pattern emerges from all elections of the past century conducted in wartime: The contest turns into an expression of discontent with war." And "a war of uncertain duration, even one in which the trend lines are promising, might be too great a surge for members of the president's party to withstand. Combat fatigue is not a condition found only on the battlefield; it is also an affliction that has often been diagnosed in the voting booth."

Poll Says Only 12% Of Democrats Believe Clinton Can Win White House. AFP (4/26) reported that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "is the favorite among Democratic voters to be the party's candidate in the 2008 presidential election, according to a poll. But only 12 percent of Democrat electors believe" she "can overcome the hostility of US Republicans to take the White House, according to the Financial Dynamics poll for The Hotline political newsletter." Clinton "had support from 38 percent of Democrats, a 24 percentage point lead over nearest rival," Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D). On the GOP side, Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "was the leading Republican candidate among Democrats. Fifty-five percent of the 603 people questioned had a favorable view of" McCain, "a higher rating than many Democratic party chiefs received. The poll, carried out April 19-23, had a margin of error of four percentage points."

Study Finds Increasing Proportion Of Uninsured Americans. ABC World News Tonight (4/26, story 6, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A new study out today shows a sharp increase in the number of middle income workers who lack health insurance. Last year 41% of this group was uninsured for at least part of the year, up from 28% in 2001. There were also more likely to skip health screenings such as mammograms."

The AP (4/27, Agovino) reports that a report by the Commonwealth Fund, a New York-based private, health care policy foundation "paints a bleak health care picture for the uninsured." It found that "the percentage of working-age Americans with moderate to middle incomes who lacked health insurance for at least part of the year rose to 41 percent in 2005, a dramatic increase from the 28 percent in 2001." Also, "more than half of the uninsured adults said they were having problems paying their medical bills or had incurred debt to cover their expenses."

Electricity Consumers Face Massive Rate Hikes In Fifteen States. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 4, 2:25, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "Fifteen states, all of them states that deregulated electricity years ago, are facing major electrical price shocks, including a 100% hike in parts of Delaware. Here's what happened: Under deregulation, utilities like Baltimore Gas and Electric, BG&E, would sell off their power plants, buy power wholesale and let the market determine the true price of electricity. But in return, consumers were supposed to be allowed to buy their electricity from different suppliers who would compete to lower the prices. That part has not happened. Ratepayers, in other words, were supposed to have a choice, not a 'take it or leave it' electric bill." At BG&E, "officials point out that electric rates have been capped for seven years, years in which fuel costs for natural gas, for oil, and even for coal have shot skyward. Welcome, they are saying, to the real price of energy."

Khamenei Threatens Retaliation If Attacked. Iran's leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned that his country would attack U.S. targets world wide if Iran is attacked for continuing its nuclear program. In a front page story, the Washington Post (4/27, A1, Moore, Ricks, 744K) reports that the Ayatollah is "escalating the threats between Washington and Tehran" and is part of "a campaign of defiance by senior Iranian officials." Besides this threat, "in a spate of statements this week, Iranian officials have also threatened to cut oil production, export nuclear technology, bar international nuclear monitors, make their nuclear program entirely secret and withdraw from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty." The AP (4/27, Karimi) quotes Khamenei: "Iran will respond twofold to any attack."

The Christian Science Monitor (4/27, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "With neither side blinking, Iran and the international community are preparing to take the next step in their showdown over Tehran's nuclear ambitions." The dispute "returns Friday to the United Nations Security Council, where the Iranian regime is hoping a divide-and-conquer strategy will prevent the UN body from taking any coercive action to limit its nuclear program. It may be a bold gambit: Just a month ago, the Council acted - unanimously - to give Iran 30 days to show it had ceased uranium enrichment." Yet, "the Security Council, in fact, is split over the need for action against a defiant Tehran."

House Passes Bill To Toughen Sanctions On Iran. The Washington Times (4/27, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "The House yesterday overwhelmingly passed a bipartisan bill" by a vote of 397-21 "that toughens sanctions against Iran until the country dismantles its nuclear programs, with supporters saying the move is a "key component of our war on terror." It "sends the message 'the United States expects Iran to be a responsible member of the international community,' said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican."

The AP (4/27, Abrams) adds, "Supporters emphasized that the legislation does not authorize the use of force in Iran and was a proper response to the Tehran government's nuclear ambitions. A nuclear Iran, said Rep. Christopher Smith (news, bio, voting record), R-N.J. 'will be a devastating blow to peace and security, not only in the Middle East, but in the entire world.'"

Chinese Leader Not Expected To Support Sanctions. The Washington Times (4/27, Gertz, 90K) reports, "President Bush directly appealed to Chinese President Hu Jintao last week to support economic sanctions on Iran for not abiding by international controls on its nuclear program, but Mr. Hu refused to do so now, Bush administration officials said." One source said, "They left open the possibility that they could support sanctions in the future."

Azerbaijan Will Not Host US Strikes Against Iran. The start of Azeri President Ilham Aliev's US visit was sparsely covered. However, the AP (4/26, Schweid) reported Aliev "opened a three-day visit to the United States on Wednesday by saying he would not allow his country to be used by the U.S. for any operations against neighboring Iran. Aliev, scheduled to meet with President Bush on Friday, cited a 'very clear' agreement with Iran that the two countries would not permit their territory to be used for operations against the other." Aliev "said he would remain at arms' length from" any military action against Tehran. "Azerbaijan wants to remain an 'island of stability' in the region, Aliev said." On a key regional issue, Aliev "said Azerbaijan's recovery of the" Nagorno-Karabakh enclave, currently controlled by Armenia, "was not subject to negotiations."

Poll Shows Rice Is The Most Popular Of Top Administration Officials. CNN's The Situation Room (4/26, Blitzer)) reported, "Our new CNN poll conducted by Opinion Research Corporation shows, Rice is the most popular of the top Bush administration officials. She's rated favorably by more than 57 percent of respondents. President Bush is next at 40 percent, although 57 percent viewed him unfavorably. Thirty-five percent view Vice President Cheney favorably, while Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld finds favor with just 33 percent."

Rice To Attend ASEAN Regional Forum. AFP (4/26) reported Secretary Rice "has confirmed she will attend Southeast Asia's annual security meeting here in [Kuala Lumpur], Malaysian Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar said." Hamid noted Bangladesh will attend for the first time as an observer, and "discussions will focus on issues including global terrorism and energy prices." AFP adds, "Rice shunned the ARF meeting in Laos last year, instead sending her deputy in what was seen as an attempt to pressure ASEAN into pushing its recalcitrant member Myanmar to introduce democratic reforms."

Latin American Leaders Unhappy With US Trade Deals. The AP (4/27, Goodman) reports, "Since 2003, when attempts to secure a hemispheric-wide free trade zone broke down, U.S. negotiators have signed bilateral, free trade agreements with nine Latin American nations. Two more, with Ecuador and Panama, are in the pipeline." The deals "have been an unqualified success for American exporters. For example, U.S. exports to Chile have almost doubled, to $5.2 billion last year, in the two years since the two countries signed a deal, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative said." Yet "among Latin Americans, the dollar diplomacy has left a bitter taste."

US Targets UN Peacekeeping Operations. The Washington Times (4/27, Pisik, 90K) reports, "The United Nations confirmed yesterday the U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating suspected wrongdoing in the office that handles procurement for U.N. peacekeeping operations." And a GAO report "to be delivered to Congress today describes the procurement office as understaffed, poorly trained and badly lacking the oversight that would uncover corruption, fraud and waste."

Suicide Bombers Target Peacekeepers In Egypt. Two days after the Egyptian resort bombings, suicide bombers targeted a multinational peacekeeping force, but killed only themselves. The New York Times (4/27, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that the bombers' timing "and the location in one of the Egypt's highest security zones raised concerns that the country might again be faced with the kind of sustained terrorist threat it struggled to suppress a decade ago," and the government "appeared stumped over to how to safeguard its tourist industry in the Sinai, one of the pillars of the nation's economy." Coming after Monday's attacks, these "added to a general sense of anxiety, both inside and outside the government, over challenges facing" Egypt. The Washington Post (4/27, A14, Williams, 744K) adds that the bombings "displayed the Egyptian government's continuing difficulty in pacifying the rugged Sinai region."

The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 6, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "There was another bomb attack today in Egypt's Sinai Desert. Two suicide bombers struck international peacekeepers near the Gaza border, but only blew themselves up."

Egypt Blames Resort Bombings On Bedouin Tribesmen. The CBS Evening News (4/26, story 7, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Also today, Egypt said its investigation of Monday's bombings in the Sinai tourist town of Dahab has turned up a link to Bedouin tribesmen who are blamed for earlier attacks on resorts in the same area."

Putin Warns Europe Russian Oil Could Go East. The New York Times (4/27, Kramer, 1.19M) reports that "President Vladimir V. Putin said Wednesday that Russia should direct future oil and natural gas exports to Asia because 'unprincipled competition' had blocked its energy companies from expanding elsewhere." The comments "seemed to reflect, in part, unhappiness at Gazprom," as, "outside of Germany, Gazprom's business is not progressing smoothly." Putin's "swagger…suggests his government believes it now has a strong negotiating hand with Europe on energy issues." However, "energy analysts say it is unlikely that Russia could intentionally curtail exports to Europe because of the high cost of unused export capacity."

The Wall Street Journal (4/27, A6, Chazan, 2.11M) runs a headline calling the warning a "power play" and agrees that "many analysts say that for the time being, Gazprom's threat to sell its gas elsewhere is empty rhetoric." It says that the comments are "ratcheting up the tension in an escalating row over Russia's international energy ambitions."

Putin Reverses Pipeline Decision. The New York Times (4/27, Myers, 1.19M) reports that, in a decision that "underscored Mr. Putin's highly centralized power and his penchant for dramatic gestures," he "reversed a controversial government decision" and ordered "that an oil pipeline being built across Siberia be rerouted away from the northern shore of Lake Baikal." The "unexpected reversal" that "appeared choreographed for state television networks," followed "rare public protests."

Sudan's Bashir Rejects UN Peacekeepers In Darfur. The Washington Post (4/27, A21, Lynch, 744K) reports Sudanese President Omar Bashir "rejected a U.N. appeal to allow its peacekeepers into the Darfur region to help stem" the "tide of violence" there. It "represented a setback for a U.S.-backed proposal to send more than 15,000 U.N. and NATO peacekeepers to Darfur to replace an underequipped African Union force of more than 6,000 troops." Continued denial of access to the UN assessment team will, UN officials have said, prevent UN planning for the mission takeover to proceed. The Post says "the Bush administration accused Khartoum of stalling. 'This is just delaying and delaying and delaying, and it's consistent with the pattern that the Sudanese government has followed for years in this,' said" US Ambassador John Bolton.

In a dim assessment of diplomatic options to resolve the Darfur conflict, the New York Times (4/27, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports, "As the violence…grows ever more deadly, Bush administration officials now acknowledge that they have few if any promising policy options for containing the carnage. If there is no agreement by Sunday on a way to resolve the crisis, the long-running peace talks are to be disbanded. But hopes for an agreement are low. … For the administration, the greatest hope centers on the peace talks in Abuja, Nigeria, which have limped along for almost two years." Deputy Secretary Zoellick "said in an interview on Wednesday, 'There's a fighting chance' to reach agreement by Sunday. … 'If there is no peace accord, then it becomes a different mission.'"

Maoists Declare Truce In Nepal, Show Signs Of Inner Conflict. The Financial Times (4/27, Bhattarai) reports, "Maoist rebels in Nepal declared a unilateral three-month truce on Thursday ahead of the country's first parliamentary meeting" and "lifted their blockades on highways following assurances by the leaders of the seven parties that they would hold a constituent assembly election." Maoist party chairman Prachanda said it is "an attempt to 'encourage' the seven parties to declare an 'unconditional' constituent assembly election to re-write the constitution for a 'democratic republic.'"

The Washington Post (4/27, A19, Lancaster, 744K) adds that the Maoists have a dilemma in they want "to retain a voice in above-ground politics but not at the price of abandoning its weapons or dreams of communist utopia." Their "struggle to reconcile its hard-line ideology with popular will was evident in its muddled response to Gyanendra's announcement" he would reinstate politics. However, "some analysts…say they believe that the tumult of recent weeks could open the way for an end to the insurgency, by creating a new political framework in which the Maoists can work peacefully."

Series Of Challenges Said To Tax Blair's Survival Skills. In highly pessimistic tones, the AP (4/26, Gardiner) reports, "In a single disastrous day, one of Prime Minister Tony Blair's closest allies came under fire over a prisoner release scandal, his deputy admitted an extramarital fling, and his health secretary endured jeers from nurses. The headaches are piling up for Blair and his Labour Party ahead of local elections that could reduce the British leader's chances of hanging on to power if they go badly." Although Blair's Labor government routinely faces criticism, the AP notes, "crime and immigration are key political issues, so the disclosures have the potential to do real damage to Blair. Clarke is a crucial ally in Blair's power struggle with Treasury chief Gordon Brown, who is eager for the prime minister to step aside so he can take over."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Jury Ends 3rd Day, No Verdict (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-Jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui case completed a third day of deliberations Wednesday without deciding whether the Sept. 11 conspirator should be executed or imprisoned for life.

After 6 1/4 hours of work on Wednesday, the nine men and three women had deliberated for 16 hours over three days. They were to return Thursday morning.

Jurors have asked only one question - a request on Tuesday for a dictionary. U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema denied the request, saying that giving them a dictionary would be like placing extraneous evidence in the jury room. She said jurors could submit a written question if they needed specific definitions.

The jury has only two choices: death or life in prison without possibility of release. If jurors cannot reach a unanimous decision, Brinkema automatically will sentence him to life.

The 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent is the only person in this country charged in al-Qaida's Sept. 11, 2001, suicide-hijacking attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Earlier this month, this jury found Moussaoui eligible for execution. Although Moussaoui was in jail on immigration charges on Sept. 11, the jury ruled that lies he told federal agents in the month before Sept. 11 kept them from identifying and stopping some of the hijackers.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April 2005 to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly jetliners into U.S. buildings. But he denied, as he had for four years, having any role in the Sept. 11 attacks. At his guilty plea, he said he was to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House at some later date if the U.S. refused to release a radical Egyptian sheik imprisoned for other terrorist crimes.

During the trial, Moussaoui stunned the courtroom by testifying for the first time that he was to have hijacked a fifth plane on Sept. 11 and flown it into the White House.

Judge Nixes Moussaoui Juror Interviews (AP)

By Stepehen Ohlemacher, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The judge in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial turned down a request from reporters from 14 news organizations Wednesday to ask jurors to discuss their verdict once the trial ends.

"I do not believe it is appropriate for the court to serve as an intermediary between the media and the jurors," U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in a letter to the news organizations. "Accordingly, I will not communicate your request to the jurors."

The reporters, backed by a half-dozen other news organizations, delivered a letter to the judge early Wednesday asking her to tell jurors - whose identities have remained secret - of the public's interest in knowing how the jury reached its verdict. They requested that the message be delivered as the jurors prepare to leave the courthouse at the end of the trial.

The reporters' letter offered willing jurors a place away from the courthouse for interviews and, for those concerned about their safety, the possibility of doing it off-camera.

The letter was signed by reporters from The Associated Press, Agence France Presse, Bloomberg News, CNN, Hearst Newspapers, the Los Angeles Times, the Minneapolis Star Tribune/McClatchy Newspapers, National Public Radio, Newsday, the New York Times, Radio France, Reuters, the Richmond Times-Dispatch and the Washington Post.

The jury ended its third day of deliberations Wednesday without reaching a decision on whether Moussaoui should be executed or spend life in prison for his role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Brinkema has kept a tight lid on the jury, warning journalists against interviewing or photographing jurors while the trial is in progress. She assured jurors that their names will never be made public by the court.

On Monday, as she finished giving the jury instructions for deliberations, Brinkema warned jurors that reporters might try to contact them once the trial is over.

"Under the First Amendment of the Constitution, we cannot prevent the media from trying to interview you, except they don't know who you are," Brinkema told the jurors. "You are not required to speak. But I am not gagging you because I can't. You have got a First Amendment right to speak as well."

Hundreds Of Detainees Abused, Report Finds (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Three human rights groups said Wednesday that they had found credible evidence that U.S. troops and government civilians in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had abused, tortured or killed at least 460 detainees.

The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved. The findings are in a report by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch.

At least 600 U.S. service members or civilians have been implicated in the cases of abuse. About 400 of them have been investigated, and only one-third of those who have been investigated have faced punishment of any kind, researchers said.

Also Wednesday, Army officials confirmed that criminal charges were being considered against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan for his role in the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Col. Joe Curtin, an Army spokesman, said no decision had been made.

Jordan is the former head of the interrogation center at Abu Ghraib. If he's charged, he would be the highest-ranking officer charged in a case of detainee abuse.

The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers.

It shows that detainee abuse has been more widespread that government officials have admitted and the American military and other government agencies have made only limited attempts to investigate and punish those responsible, the rights groups charged.

"Our findings show that the abuses and torture revealed in the Abu Ghraib photos were not the isolated acts of individual soldiers," said Meg Satterwhite, the faculty director of the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice.

The Pentagon wouldn't address specific findings in the report. A spokesman said the Defense Department had investigated more than 600 allegations of abuse and had held more than 250 service members responsible.

Of the 12 major reviews of U.S. military detention operations that have been conducted, "none of them found that the department directed, sanctioned, encouraged or condoned abuse," said Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman.

"When there have been allegations of wrongdoing, they are taken seriously, investigated thoroughly and individuals are held accountable when appropriate," he said.

Tom Malinowski, the Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, said recent interviews with troops suggested that detainee abuse was less widespread than it was two years ago. But he and other researchers said civilian and military leaders needed to send a strong message that abuse wouldn't be tolerated and would be punished.

The 27-page report was based primarily on government documents, interviews with witnesses and victims, military investigation reports, court documents, detainee accounts provided by attorneys, official military statements and news accounts.

It said the alleged abuses included assault, humiliation, sexual assault or abuse, and stress techniques.

According to the report:

-Fifty-four military service members have been convicted by courts-martial in prisoner abuse cases. Of these, 40 were sentenced to prison time. The average sentence was four months. Ten of those sentenced received terms of more than a year.

More important, according to the researchers, only three officers have been convicted by courts-martial for detainee abuse. The highest-ranking was a major. No officers have been held accountable for any criminal acts committed by troops under their command.

-Of the 20 civilians referred to the Justice Department for criminal prosecution in cases of abuse, only one - a contractor - has been indicted.

-Most of the punishments meted out have been administrative, such as reduction of rank, fines or temporary confinement to base.

The researchers charged that their findings illustrated a lack of accountability over detainee abuse throughout the military and the civilian chain of command.

Judge Allows Detainee's Transfer To Harsher Prison (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026606

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL STATION, Cuba — A war crimes tribunal judge decided Wednesday against second-guessing detention camp authorities in their decision to confine to maximum security and solitary confinement the 10 terrorism suspects who have been charged.

Navy Capt. Daniel O'Toole rejected a request by the Army defense lawyer for accused bomb maker Sufyian Barhoumi that his handicapped client be returned to the communal detention camp where he had been living until four weeks ago in recognition of his good behavior.

The defense lawyer, Capt. Wade Faulkner, had argued that the unexplained move of the 32-year-old Algerian to the harshest of the seven prison camps here had so upset Barhoumi that it undermined their lawyer-client relationship and had prevented them from preparing for trial.

Barhoumi's case offered the first witness testimony in the 4-year-old tribunal.

Barhoumi lost most of his left hand to a mine explosion in Afghanistan in 1999, and because of that has had trouble using the sink and toilet in his Camp 5 cell. He had previously been in Camp 4, along with other cooperative inmates. There are 490 detainees scattered across the archipelago of prisons at Guantanamo Bay.

"There is a huge difference between Camp 4 and Camp 5," Barhoumi told the tribunal, holding up his mangled left hand to show the scarred, blistered stump with only one finger.

He said the strong air-conditioning and limited time outdoors in Camp 5 had adversely affected his physical and psychological condition and had worsened the pain in his hand.

An official of the military joint task force that administers the prisons was the tribunal's first witness. Court rules prohibit him from being identified by anything other than "Colonel B." He said he was following Geneva Convention and Army regulations on the treatment of pretrial prisoners by holding them in closed, concrete cells at the maximum security Camp 5.

He conceded that Barhoumi and two other defendants moved at the same time might lament their lost freedom of movement and recreation time. But he said his first priority was to ensure that a detainee wasn't exposed to harm by himself or by other prisoners.

"The real baseline for my whole motivation in everything is running a peaceful, safe and secure camp," the colonel said. "I have to ensure his safety."

The Navy lieutenant prosecuting Barhoumi agreed it would be risky to leave pretrial detainees in the medium security camp where they might be vulnerable to prisoners who feared they would provide testimony detrimental to their own interests.

"You don't know that there's a threat to the detainees in Camp 4 until he's lying in a pool of blood," warned the prosecutor, who also cannot be identified.

Colonel B said that since he had taken command of the detention group he had expanded the time a compliant Camp 5 inmate was allowed outdoors to exercise from 30 minutes to two hours. The 175 detainees housed at Camp 4 can play sports and commune with others for as much as 14 hours a day.

Barhoumi said he interpreted the move as punitive and an effort to discourage his cooperation.

"Camp 5 is known for being a punishment place. Everybody knows that," said the tall, bearded defendant, who wore a wrinkled plaid shirt and blue pants.

"Don't you see why he might be upset and perceive it as punishment?" Faulkner asked Colonel B, who saw it as a possibility with some prisoners and not with others.

The prison official said moving Barhoumi and two others also previously at Camp 4 was part of his plan for consolidating Guantanamo Bay prisoners into three main camps. The wire-mesh pens used as cells at Camps 2 and 3 are gradually being emptied. Two other sparsely populated camps, Echo and Iguana, are used for visits between lawyers and their clients and to house detainees pending their release.

One of the 10 charged detainees remains at a disciplinary unit at Camp 1.

Barhoumi showed no reaction to O'Toole's ruling, which found no evidence that the transfer was punitive or damaging to his relationship with his lawyer. U.S. courts traditionally accord "wide-ranging deference" to corrections authorities in determining how best to detain prisoners ahead of trial, O'Toole said.

The chief defense lawyer, Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan, criticized what he said was another example of the tribunal officers' "legal cherry-picking."

Sullivan, other defense lawyers and human rights watchdogs have said the court set up by the Bush administration to prosecute suspected Al Qaeda figures refuses to consistently accord detainees rights assured by any recognized legal system, such as the Geneva Convention, the U.S. Constitution or the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Barhoumi was arrested with two Saudi detainees also appearing before the tribunal this week — as well as with senior Al Qaeda figure Abu Zubaydah — in a March 28, 2002, raid in Faisalabad, Pakistan.

Barhoumi, Jabran Said bin al Qahtani and Ghassan Abdullah al Sharbi have been charged with conspiracy to commit terrorism by plotting to build remote-controlled bombs to attack U.S. forces that had invaded Afghanistan in October 2001.

Qahtani boycotted his initial hearing Tuesday after a brief appearance before O'Toole to condemn the United States as "the enemy of God" and to say he would rather be killed than cooperate.

Sharbi's first court hearing is set for today, but he is reportedly refusing to cooperate with his military attorney.

Wilting Dreams At Gitmo (WP)

By P. Sabin Willett

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

I brought flowers to the isolation cell when I visited Saddiq this month. He likes to draw roses and often asks for gardening magazines.

Saddiq is one of the many mistakes at Guantanamo Bay. In 2005 our military admitted that he was not an enemy combatant, but the government hasn't been able to repatriate him. (By a curious irony, Saddiq's opposition to Osama bin Laden makes him too hot to handle in his native Saudi Arabia.) So he lives behind razor wire in Camp Iguana, with eight other men whom the military cleared long ago but who are nevertheless forbidden newspapers, visits from loved ones, English-language dictionaries -- and flowers.

For some time we lawyers have been asking the military for a garden. Gardens are commonplace in prisoner-of-war camps, and these men aren't even enemies. They live in a pen, but it has a small patch of ground. Why not? The military refused.

I was trying to explain this to Saddiq, along with other inexplicable things (such as how it is that innocent men can be held for years in an American prison), when he said, "We planted a garden. We have some small plants -- watermelon, peppers, garlic, cantaloupe. No fruit yet. There's a lemon tree about two inches tall, though it's not doing well."

"The guards gave you tools?"

He shook his head.

"Then -- how do you dig?" I was struggling to grasp this.

"Spoons," he said. "And a mop handle."

The soil in Camp Iguana is dry and brittle as flint. And I've seen the spoons they give our clients.

"But the spoons are plastic -- aren't they?"

Saddiq nodded. "At night we poured water on the ground. In the morning, we pounded it with the mop handle and scratched it with the spoons. You can loosen about this much." He held his thumb and forefinger about a half-inch apart. "The next day, we did it again. And so on until we had a bed for planting." He shrugged. "We have lots of time, here."

"But the seeds?" I asked. "Did they give you seeds?"

After four years at Guantanamo, Saddiq rarely smiles, but his face seemed to brighten then. "Sometimes, with the meal, they give us a bit of watermelon or cantaloupe to eat. We save the seeds."

One day the sordid history of Guantanamo will be written. There will be chapters on torture, chapters on the how the courts turned a blind eye, chapters on cruelties large and petty, on the massive stupidity and uselessness of the place. Many pages will illustrate the great lie of Guantanamo -- that it is a "terrorist detention facility" -- with accounts of goatherds and chicken farmers and stray foreigners sold by Pakistani grifters to the United States for bounties. Saddiq may have one of the oddest chapters of all: jailed first by the Taliban as an enemy of its regime, then by us.

For all that, as the poet Gerard Manley Hopkins wrote, "There lives the dearest freshness deep down things." Maybe the History of Guantanamo will have a few uplifting footnotes. America denied them seeds and trowels and they created life anyway. We tried to withhold beauty, but from the grim earth of Guantanamo they scratched a few square meters of garden -- with spoons. Guantanamo is ugly, but man's instinct for beauty lives deep down things.

When our meeting was over, the flowers had wilted. Saddiq picked up the little nosegay. "May I take these back to Camp Iguana?"

But flowers are contraband. He wasn't allowed to keep them.

The writer, a Boston lawyer with Bingham McCutchen, represents Saddiq Ahmad Turkistani, who is about to begin his fifth year of imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay.

Jailed Islamists Get 'Counseling' (WT)

By Anton La Guardia, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- British security chiefs are studying a novel Saudi approach to combating terror -- using clerics to debate "jihad" with imprisoned militants and convert them to more moderate beliefs.

The Saudi authorities said about 400 of 700 extremists had been re-educated and released from prison.

The Islamic "counseling" program is part of what British experts regard as Saudi Arabia's "model counterterrorism campaign."

Senior British officials, including Eliza Manningham-Buller, the chief of MI5 intelligence agency, have visited the kingdom to devise a similar "counter-radicalization" strategy for Britain.

Saudi Arabia is one of the few countries where the fight against terrorism has yielded real success with a softer approach.

Al Qaeda's campaign in Saudi Arabia, Osama bin Laden's birthplace, started spectacularly with suicide bombings against Western compounds in Riyadh three years ago, but has abated.

Saudi security forces say they have killed or captured 25 of 26 persons on their original 2003 list of "most wanted" terrorists, including local leaders of al Qaeda.

Only four persons on a follow-up list of 36 militants are thought to be still at large in the kingdom. The rest have been killed or captured or have fled, mostly to Iraq.

"Every day, their numbers, capability and resources are less and less," said Gen. Mansour al-Turki, spokesman for the Saudi Ministry of Interior. "Terrorism in Saudi Arabia has been degraded."

The government has fired about 1,000 hard-line clerics, prevented Saudis from going to fight in Iraq and invested heavily in technology, such as a new control room for security forces in Riyadh.

Now more than 100 Muslim clerics, psychiatrists and psychologists help counsel inmates across the country.

The counseling is offered only to militants who have not been directly involved in terrorist acts, but are thought to sympathize with or provide support to extremists.

After a psychological assessment, they have one-on-one sessions with clerics to debate radical ideology, including the meaning of jihad, or holy war, and the doctrine of "takfir," which declares Muslims who disagree with them to be infidels.

Prisoners in the program are given more access to their family, who sometimes have transportation and lodging paid for by the government. If deemed suitable for release, they are then offered more help, for instance, in finding work.

"These people are very isolated in their cells. They are encouraged not to deal with anybody outside the cells. That is how their minds are controlled," Gen. al-Turki said.

"When they are arrested, we give them a chance to think for themselves, and most of them realize they chose the wrong path."

Money Laundering And Terrorist Financing Transcend Borders (VOA)

By Lisa Ferdinando

Voice of America, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026609

Money laundering and terrorist financing are global problems that transcend borders. Terrorist supporters funnel money through charities and international criminal gangs constantly adapt their techniques, while law enforcement agencies try to stay one step ahead.

Osama bin Laden. Terrorists use smuggled money to finance their operations.Terror groups are often fed by a rhetoric of hatred. But like many organizations, they rely on money to keep their operations going. Terrorists are financed by smuggled funds, criminal activities or any other number of ways -- even by governments themselves, according to U.S. officials.

Targeting that support is a key action for law enforcement, as top U.S. Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser explains: "By taking the steps that we're taking by disrupting, dismantling these financial networks that are supporting these activities, we are degrading the ability of these organizations to get to the stage where they only have a few more dollars to spend to complete a terrorist attack."

But it's impossible to say how much money goes into terrorism each year. And stopping that flow is extremely challenging, according to David Caruso, founder of the Virginia-based Dominion Advisory Group, an anti-money laundering consulting firm.

According to Caruso, "Governments and the private sector have really not been able to determine how much funds are used to finance terror. For example, the 9/11 [i.e., September 11, 2001] tragedy did not take relatively a lot of money. So it's very difficult for governments and financial institutions to detect."

New Methods of Financing

And terrorists are constantly looking for new methods to avoid detection and secure funding, says Jeffrey Breinholt, deputy counterterrorism chief at the U.S. Department of Justice.

"It's important to view terrorists as being organized criminals," says Breinholt. "Terrorists are nothing if not adaptable and opportunistic. And so if we accept that as a notion, that large terrorist groups that we are targeting -- al-Qaida, Hezbollah, Hamas -- they will be ones that will pay very much attention to things that arise that are new opportunistic crimes."

Financial support for terrorism can also come from charities, front companies or couriers who smuggle money across international borders. Other avenues include diverted aid money or exploiting informal, cash-based money exchanging venues, which are popular in the Middle East and South Asia.

Treasury Under-Secretary Stuart Levey recently told a U.S. Senate committee that individual donors in Saudi Arabia are funding terrorists outside of that country. In an exchange with committee Chairman Richard Shelby, Levey said, "Is money leaving Saudi Arabia to fund terrorism abroad? Yes." Senator Shelby asked, "Some of that money going to Iraq?" Levey replied, "Undoubtedly, some of that money is going to Iraq. And it's going to Southeast Asia and it's going to any other place where there are terrorists."

Vincent Cannistraro, a former CIA counterterrorism officer explains the appeal to individuals. "The kinds of operations that are conducted mostly by al-Qaida but by similar groups, whether in Morocco, Algeria, whether they do it through affiliates in Europe, they are not terribly expensive operations to conduct. Where do they get the money? Contributions from people who believe in them. There is certainly a tendency for some wealthy Islamic businessmen to write checks," says Cannistraro.

Tracking Money

But while many governments are working hard to fight terrorism and stop terror

The illegal flow of money buys terrorists arms.financing, Under-Secretary Levey says some are doing just the opposite. He says, "State sponsors of terrorism, like Iran and Syria, present a difficult problem because they provide not only money and safe haven to terrorists, but also a financial infrastructure through which terrorists can move, store and launder their funds."

Treasury official Daniel Glaser says Iraq is one country where the United States is working to build a transparent system that is safe from exploitation. He says, "When you have a modern payment system, it decreases the reliance on cash. And cash, for obvious reasons, facilitates anonymous transactions."

Money laundering expert Caruso describes the enormous challenges in tracking the illicit flow of money. "Simply the size and complexity of the global financial system, just what occurs on a daily basis, legitimately, it's 24 hours a day, when you look at Asia, Europe, Latin America, the U.S. And to track all that, it's an impossibility," says Caruso.

Patrick O'Sullivan, a money laundering advisor at the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime in Vienna, says money launderers have used new technologies to their benefit and have evolved their techniques. He says, "Over the last 10, 15 years, really, a lot has been done worldwide to put systems in place to prevent and detect money laundering. So that has made it more difficult to launder money in traditional ways. So methods have tended to become more sophisticated."

Though stopping those bent on terrorism and wrongdoing poses a huge challenge, Justice Department official Breinholt says law enforcement must evolve with the changes. "The trick is not necessarily having laws in place to eliminate all of that, but being flexible enough to enact new laws in response to what we see from our experience," says Breinholt.

He also notes that as progress is made and officials close one channel, terrorists and other criminals open new ones in every corner of the globe. And success in closing those avenues depends on how quickly authorities adapt to the new challenges.

In our next report on terrorism, we'll examine how terrorists use the Internet to spread their beliefs and coordinate their operations.

Boss: FBI Adapting To Fight Terrorists With No Central Command (NSDY/AP)

By Pat Milton, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- Since the Sept. 11 attacks law enforcement has witnessed the emergence of a new threat, homegrown terrorist cells, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Wednesday.

The self-generating terrorist is not trained in the camps of Afghanistan, doesn't receive orders from a central hub and is not financed by sympathizing terrorist nations, Mueller said.

"What we see is a new threat that is decentralized," Mueller said. "We have seen homegrown terrorist cells not answerable to a particular leader but to an ideology."

Mueller was speaking to a group at the luncheon of the annual James M. Fox memorial lecture series.

Fox, a veteran agent known as a spy-catcher, was head of the New York FBI office during the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. He left the FBI in 1993, a year and a half after nailing mob boss John Gotti on racketeering and murder charges. He died May 16, 1997, at age 59.

Mueller told those at the lecture luncheon that the United States' success in driving terrorists from Afghanistan, cutting off their funding and disrupting their operations has forced them to change. He said homegrown terrorists are recruiting friends, financing through street crime and self-executing.

The shift has forced law enforcement to adapt its traditional strategy of pursuing terrorists: identifying the leaders, tracking them and eventually uncovering a plot's operators.

Now investigators must rely more than ever on community outreach, intelligence and cooperation with local police departments, Mueller said.

"I cannot emphasize enough the importance of local law enforcement; from Los Angeles to New York it remains a key factor," he said, noting that the New York Police Department has 1,000 people assigned to terrorism investigations.

A terrorist's goal today is more likely a soft target such as a bus or shopping mall rather than a well-protected government building, Mueller said.

But Mueller said he believes the disruption of al-Qaida, the terrorist organization led by Osama bin Laden, intelligence sharing and law enforcement cooperation has the United States safer from an attack.

Still, as law enforcers adapt to the homegrown terrorists, they have not written off al-Qaida or any other terrorist organization.

"We cannot forget," he said, "that people overseas are plotting against the United States and would want nothing more than to replicate September 11th."

Lodi Terror Probe Continues After Verdict, Mistrial, Prosecutor Says (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, April 27, 2006

LODI, Calif. - Residents in this Central Valley town had hoped to set aside the suspicions that divided them in the 11 months since federal agents arrested a young man, his father and two Muslim religious leaders amid terrorism allegations.

But the government's chief prosecutor said Wednesday that the investigation is continuing - a day after a federal jury convicted 23-year-old Hamid Hayat of providing material support to terrorists by attending a training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and lying about it to the FBI.

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott is considering seeking a new trial for Hayat's father, Umer, 48, after a separate jury deadlocked Tuesday on whether he lied to FBI agents to protect his son.

The investigation has also resulted in two clerics and another man being deported to Pakistan for immigration violations.

But that might not be the last of the charges facing Lodi residents, Scott said after Hamid Hayat's conviction and Umer Hayat's mistrial were announced.

"Certainly there are people of interest to us," Scott said, declining to elaborate in a telephone interview Wednesday. He referred questions to FBI agents, who also said the probe was continuing but refused to give more details.

"There are aspects of this (case) which remain under investigation," said Drew Parenti, the agent in charge of the Sacramento office.

Lodi Mayor Susan Hitchcock and police Capt. Gary Benincasa said the FBI has not shared any additional suspicions with them, and neither has seen indications of terror-related activity.

Scott's comment about a continuing investigation "reopens an old wound," aggravating suspicions of and within the Muslim community that had just begun to heal, said Hitchcock.

"This is going to cause everyone unease," she said. "I hope they're speaking from real knowledge, not just hearsay or something like that, because the city of Lodi is ready to move on. This is not something we want to be known for. We want to be known for our fine wines."

The FBI began looking at Lodi Muslims because of the activities of two clerics at the local mosque.

"The original, the first thing that drew our interest was the two religious leaders in Lodi," Scott said. One had given anti-American speeches after 9-11, the other's father led a suspicious religious school in Pakistan.

"Now, whether there was some plan afoot directly linked to them, I don't know that we'll ever know that," Scott said. "But I do know that they were there, they had extremist views, (and) we now have a jury that has found beyond a reasonable doubt that a member of that mosque went to Pakistan and took training and came back to this country with the intent to kill Americans."

The Hayats were secondary targets of the investigation, developed after the FBI recruited an informant to infiltrate the 2,500-member Pakistani community in Lodi, 35 miles south of Sacramento.

Both U.S. citizens, Umer Hayat sold ice cream from a battered van while his son held a seasonal job packing cherries.

"We just want them both to come home. His (Hamid's) mom has cried too much," Sahana Khatab, Umer Hayat's sister-in-law, said at the family's home in a converted garage. "We're just sad. The whole family's sad. We're just sitting down and praying for them."

Some Lodi residents said they were relieved by the verdicts but disconcerted that there might be other terrorism-related activity in their quiet agricultural community.

"I strongly believe that there are (terrorist) ties here. But I think there are ties all over - they just got caught here," said Holli Eddy outside a local supermarket.

Grocery stores, along with banks and hospitals, were among places Hamid Hayat said he might target as he gave an hours-long videotaped statement to the FBI in June.

Mac Garcia, who retired as a Lodi policeman and San Joaquin County investigator, said he doesn't believe there is a terrorist cell, but he can't help but be suspicious of his neighbors nonetheless.

"You see a Muslim person and just think twice because of this. It's going to linger for a long time," Garcia said.

While investigators need to be thorough, "I'm kind of concerned it might make it look like there's a lot of them (terrorists) here, and I just don't believe that. There might be some sympathizers, but I don't believe there's that kind of activity."

Malik Mukhtiar Ahmad, a member of the mosque's board, welcomed a continuing investigation because he said there is nothing to hide.

"That's their job, that's what they're paid for," he said, referring to FBI agents. "If they want to dig deeper, that's their right."

DOJ_NMG_0026612

Basim Elkarra, executive director of the Sacramento office of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said if there were terrorist activity in Lodi, the FBI's 4 1/2-year probe would have found it.

He is concerned that the continuing investigation could include covert surveillance of innocent Muslims, sending another informant to infiltrate the community or the sort of interrogation he believes entrapped Hamid Hayat into making incriminating admissions while seeking to please FBI agents.

"Given the current fear and hysteria, it's not surprising that someone was convicted without any material proof," Elkarra said. "You've got someone who was naive and gullible.... The informant took him down a path and there was no turning back."

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi said she will seek a new trial before Hayat's July 14 sentencing, when he faces at least 30 years in prison if prosecutors prevail on legal issues that will determine his sentence.

"Hamid Hayat never attended a terrorist training camp. This fight is not over," Mojaddidi said.

Federal Victory In Terror Case May Prove Brief, Experts Say (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES, April 26 — Despite predictions that their victory might not hold up on appeal, federal prosecutors on Wednesday savored their victory in a Sacramento courtroom, where a jury a day earlier convicted an American born in Pakistan of providing support to a terrorist group and lying to investigators.

McGregor W. Scott, the United States attorney who oversaw the prosecution, said in a telephone interview Wednesday that the conviction of the man, Hamid Hayat, 23, showed that the government was capable of winning a jury trial on terrorism charges after a number of high-profile failures elsewhere.

"In this post-9/11 context, those of us in law enforcement have been tasked with preventing new acts of terrorism, trying to stop something from happening, rather than after the fact trying to establish what happened," Mr. Scott said. "This is a difficult task and a new mission. We have shown in this case and this trial and conviction that we can succeed in that mission."

But legal experts said the prosecution's celebration might be short-lived because a federal appeals court had twice ruled unconstitutional some aspects of the law on which Mr. Hayat was convicted. They also said Mr. Hayat's reported confessions to F.B.I. agents could be challenged on the ground they were coerced from a frightened suspect with a limited command of English.

Mr. Hayat's lawyer, Wazhma Mojaddidi, told reporters after the verdict on Tuesday that she would appeal, citing unspecified "outside influences" that affected the jury. She did not return telephone calls on Wednesday seeking comment.

Eric M. Freedman, a constitutional law expert at Hofstra University who has consulted with defense lawyers in terrorism cases, said the government's record of prosecuting terror cases since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, had been mixed, in part because several cases hinged on confessions rather than hard evidence.

"This conviction bears all the hallmarks of one that is eventually overturned as being unsupported," Professor Freedman said.

A potentially greater threat to the conviction lies in the statute on which Mr. Hayat was charged, which makes it a crime to provide "material support" for a terrorist group.

The government charged that Mr. Hayat attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003 or 2004, returning to the United States in the spring of 2005 with the intent of waging religious war. Upon his return, he was arrested and questioned. The government said he lied repeatedly to the F.B.I. about his training and intentions before confessing to plotting against the United States.

The government never presented evidence that Mr. Hayat had participated in or planned any terrorist act. His crime, apart from lying to investigators, was providing support to violent extremist groups by attending their training camp.

That law has helped win convictions in the so-called Lackawanna Six terrorism case and the prosecution of John Walker Lindh, the American who fought alongside the Taliban in Afghanistan. But prosecutions based on the law collapsed in Tampa, Fla., where a jury last year acquitted a former professor charged with supporting extremist Palestinian groups, and in Idaho, where a college student was acquitted two years ago after being accused of aiding terrorists in Chechnya and Israel.

David Cole, a Georgetown University law professor and critic of the administration's application of antiterrorism laws, said that charging people under the material-support provision of a federal law was a "thin reed" on which to base prosecution.

"It's a conviction," Professor Cole said of the Hayat case, "and to that extent it's a victory for the government. But has this made the United States one iota safer? I don't see any evidence of it. This is very likely to be overturned on appeal."

Professor Cole said the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, which sits in San Francisco and covers the Sacramento federal court district, had twice ruled the material-support law unconstitutionally vague because it did not require proof of any overt act.

The government also charged Mr. Hayat's father, Umer Hayat, 48, an ice-cream truck driver in Lodi, Calif., of lying to investigators to conceal his son's activities. A separate jury deadlocked on two charges against the father, and the judge declared a mistrial. Mr. Scott said he had not decided on a new trial.

Lodi Terrorism Conviction Was A Rout, Jury Says (LAT)

By Rone Tempest And Eric Bailey, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

SACRAMENTO — The scorecard read like an NBA blowout.

By the time the jury finished voting on each piece of evidence, the score was 135-40 for the prosecution.

Hamid Hayat, the 23-year-old Lodi man charged with attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan and lying about it, was convicted on all four counts.

The systematic way the jurors moved through the charges during nine days of deliberation was detailed Wednesday by jury foreman Joe Cote, a 64-year-old retired medical equipment salesman from Folsom.

"We scored the entire evidence and testimony," Cote said the day after the conviction, "and it was overwhelmingly in favor of guilt."

Key to the jury's decision, Cote said, were Hayat's own words on an FBI videotape that he had attended a camp, his comments secretly recorded by an undercover informant that indicated Hayat's "willingness" to go for training and a handwritten warrior's prayer in Arabic found in his wallet.

"He got himself in pretty deep. He buried himself," said juror Starr Scaccia, 53, an administrative assistant from Roseville, in describing the five-hour videotaped interrogation.

Scaccia said she was also swayed by an Urdu language scrapbook that Hayat kept with news about militant Pakistani political parties, many of them strongly anti-American.

Despite the unanimous verdict, Cote and other jurors interviewed Wednesday said that outcome was far from certain when they began deliberations April 12.

What tipped the balance, Cote said, was when the jury had a second opportunity to review the videotaped interrogation.

The videotape was first shown early in the nine-week trial. Cote and others said that at the time they had some concerns about the leading questions and pressure tactics used by the FBI interrogators.

By the second viewing last week, he said, the jurors had been able to digest all of the other evidence. They had also received an instruction from U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell stating that "the government may utilize a broad range of schemes and ploys to ferret out criminal activity."

Going into the end of deliberations Friday, there was still one juror holding out for acquittal on the most important charge: that Hamid Hayat provided material support for terrorism by attending a terrorism training camp in Pakistan in late 2003.

Shortly after 4 p.m. Friday, Cote sent Burrell a note about the dissenting juror.

"There is impasse with a juror who does not seem to fully comprehend the deliberation process. I'm available to discuss this with you and counsel at any time," Cote wrote.

After consulting with attorneys from both sides, Burrell ordered the note sealed and instructed the jury to continue deliberations.

Cote would not identify the balky juror but said that the note was a mistake on his part, born out of fatigue. "I think I may have chosen the wrong language," Cote said. "That was the end of the day, end of the week. My God, my brain was fried."

DOJ_NMG_0026614

On Monday, the holdout juror joined the others for conviction. By Tuesday, they reached a unanimous verdict, guilty on all four counts.

That the panel went from a possible deadlock to a unanimous verdict so quickly caused Hayat's lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi to cry foul, suggesting undue pressure. "It is suspect that after only two days of deliberation," she said, "that this juror suddenly decided to convict. Especially since the only response was to continue deliberations."

But Cote and others denied any ganging up. No one put any pressure on the juror, Cote said. She came to her guilty verdict simply by "thinking about it over the weekend."

Scaccia agreed, saying the reluctant juror "was trying to do it her own way. She was working it through. She was still processing it. You've got to live with what you end up deciding. She had to take her time."

In the end, said juror Lori Macias, 46, a Fairfield real estate agent, the panel tallied up their scorecard and sided overwhelmingly with the government.

But there were times, Macias said, when watching the videotaped interrogation that jurors wondered why Hayat, instead of subjecting himself to hours of exhaustive questioning, didn't ask for a lawyer. "What person in their right mind does all that and doesn't ask for a lawyer?" Macias said. "I mean, we wouldn't have been there if he had."

Cote said the jury reached its verdict with "a heavy heart."

"There was no happiness in it," Cote said. "We all felt bad about it. But we had to do it. It's like a life wasted."

The tall, broad-shouldered foreman acknowledged he didn't believe, judging by Hayat's mild demeanor in court and his recent marriage, that the young Lodi resident posed much of a danger. But then he thought of the faces of the terrorists caught on video before last summer's London bombings. He thought they looked just as nonthreatening.

Scaccia said she hoped the jury verdict would be a deterrent in the war on terrorism. "I hope it gets the message out: Don't mess with the United States," she said. "It's not worth it."

CIA Warns Ex-agents Over Talking To Media (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

The Central Intelligence Agency has warned former employees not to have unapproved contacts with reporters, as part of a mounting campaign by the administration to crack down on officials who leak information on national security issues.

A former official said the CIA recently warned several retired employees who have consulting contracts with the agency that they could lose their pensions by talking to reporters without permission. He added that while the threats might be legally "hollow," they were having a chilling effect on former employees.

The CIA called the allegations "rubbish". Jennifer Millerwise Dyke, spokeswoman for CIA director Porter Goss, said former employees with consulting deals could lose their contracts for violating the CIA secrecy agreement by having unauthorised conversations with reporters. But she stressed that under current law, "termination of a contract does not affect pensions".

The clampdown represents the latest move in what observers describe as the most aggressive government campaign against leaks in years. The Justice Department is investigating the disclosure to the media of secret overseas CIA prisons and a highly classified National Security Agency domestic spying programme authorised by President George W. Bush. Last week, the CIA fired Mary McCarthy, an intelligence officer, for allegedly leaking classified information and having undisclosed contacts with reporters.

Mr Goss has increased the number of "single issue" polygraphs – lie detector tests aimed at ferreting out leaking employees. A second former official said Mr Goss was trying to "scare everybody" by using polygraphs aggressively.

Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, former CIA general counsel, said Mr Goss was "obviously taking a much more forward-leaning stance than any of us have seen for years". But another former intelligence official said the agency was simply returning to a "more conservative regimen" to remind employees that they work for a secret organisation.

The House intelligence committee has asked John Negroponte, the director for national intelligence who oversees the 16 intelligence agencies, to study whether retirees could lose their pensions for disclosing classified information even when not prosecuted.

The attempt to silence former employees extends beyond those who still have consulting contracts. Larry Johnson, a former CIA official who blogs at www.TPMCafe.com, said he recently received a "threatening" letter reminding him about his confidentiality agreements.

Mr Johnson – who has criticised the White House for not aggressively investigating the outing of Valerie Plame, a former covert operative, said it was the first such letter he had received despite regularly commenting in the media on intelligence matters since his retirement in 1989. He said other former employees also received letters.

He said the CIA was also "very forceful" in intimidating a retired official who maintains ties to the agency after he signed a letter criticising the administration over the Plame leak.

Mr Gimigliano said CIA staff officers and contractors must sign a secrecy agreement which compelled them to seek prepublication permission for anything they wrote involving the CIA, intelligence matters, and classified material.

Mr Gimigliano added: "When a former officer or contractor fails to honour the legally binding agreement … our Publications Review Board may send the individual a written reminder. That reminder includes the statement that 'permission to publish will not be denied solely because information may be embarrassing to or critical of the agency' ... Obviously, such letters contain no threats."

But Mr Johnson and other critics say the campaign is also intended to crack down on politically embarrassing comments from former officials.

"They are trying to intimidate the press and trying to intimidate employees," said Mr Johnson. "Anybody who has been critical of the Bush administration is getting letters."

Another former CIA employee who maintains links to the agency said it did not need to be blatant about threats because contractors and retirees who had relationships with agency officials understood that talking to reporters could have repercussions for future work.

"People at the agency are bright enough to see that is going on, they don't need to be reminded," the former official said.

Stanley Sporkin, former CIA general counsel during the Reagan administration and a retired judge, said it was "ridiculous" that the agency was trying to limit contacts with the media.

He said the only restriction should be that they do not reveal classified information. Something has got to be done to address this. These days it is almost like a witch hunt," said Mr Sporkin.

Tension Over Press Leaks (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Two events in the past week have thrown the spotlight on the troubled relationship between the Bush administration and the news media, raising questions that are worrisome on both sides of the divide.

The resignation of Scott McClellan as the White House press secretary was followed within days by the announcement that a senior Central Intelligence Agency employee, later identified as Mary McCarthy, had been fired for improper contacts with reporters.

Neither incident is entirely clear in its origins. McClellan said he asked to be relieved, but his stepping down was part of a continuing reshuffle ordered by the new White House chief of staff, Josh Bolten, who had made it clear he regarded press relations as a trouble area.

The firing of McCarthy, a veteran intelligence officer who had held sensitive administrative posts, came after CIA Director Porter Goss and his White House superiors had ordered an intensive crackdown on leaks to the press.

McCarthy had already initiated steps toward retirement and was apparently only days away from ending her career when she and others were asked to take lie detector tests -- and then she was dismissed.

For the first few days after the action was announced, the agency and the White House let stand the impression that McCarthy had been a source for the stories about secret U.S. detention centers in Europe that won a Pulitzer Prize for The Post's Dana Priest on April 17. But when McCarthy's lawyer said she had no part in that transaction, CIA officials confirmed that was the case -- leaving it unclear exactly what she had done to bring down the punishment.

Priest, of course, has said nothing about her sources beyond the generic description that the information came from current and former intelligence officials.

This is a troubling case for those of us in journalism. Our view is that it's the government's responsibility to keep its secrets secret and that it's our responsibility to ferret out information so the public is aware of the actions being taken in its name.

We recognize there are sometimes legitimate national security considerations for withholding information. In the case of Priest's stories, The Post agreed to the government's request not to identify the countries where the secret prisons were located.

But we also know that administrations of both parties tend to restrict information -- and that the only way for the public to learn of questionable policies or actions is for conscientious individuals to break that official code of silence.

Government has a legitimate claim to enforce the promise of confidentiality that officials sign when they go to work for an agency such as the CIA. The tool of enforcement can be humiliating and distasteful -- and a lie detector test is both. But its use is not unprecedented. When there was talk of polygraphs for top officials in the Reagan administration, the secretary of state, George Shultz, said he was prepared to resign -- and the prospect disappeared.

The tension between the legitimate claims of secrecy and the need for public accountability remains, however, and in many respects has grown worse. The main reason is the reluctance of this president and his administration to accept a broad and continuing responsibility to keep the public and the press informed on the reasons for the policies they have adopted.

President Bush's approach has been one of announcing a policy after it has been completed in his relatively closed circle of decision makers and then simply reiterating that policy in any number of prearranged settings. His news conferences and interviews are infrequent, and they rarely offer insights into the reasoning behind his conclusions.

That is why McClellan suffered both burnout and a loss of credibility in his job. Under tight orders from the top, he could do little to satisfy the curiosity -- or assuage the doubts -- of the reporters who sit frustrated in the briefing room, knowing full well that the real decision making in the White House is shielded from their view.

Unless the president comes to understand that it is in his interest -- as well as the country's -- to conduct a more open governing process, the new press secretary, Tony Snow, will find himself inevitably as much of a punching bag as McClellan became. Only George Bush can signal to the White House staff and administration that he wants a government ready and eager to explain itself to the people it is trying to lead.

When he has given that signal, there may be fewer Mary McCarthys contemplating the costs -- and burdens -- of leaking to the press.

European Inquiry Says C.I.A. Flew 1,000 Flights In Secret (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

BRUSSELS, April 26 — Investigators for the European Parliament said Wednesday that data gathered from air safety regulators and others found that the Central Intelligence Agency had flown 1,000 undeclared flights over European territory since 2001.

Sometimes the planes stopped to pick up terrorism suspects who had been kidnapped to take them to countries that use torture, the investigators added.

The operation used the same American agents and the same planes over and over, they said, though they could not say how many flights involved the transport of suspects.

The investigation, by a committee looking into C.I.A. counterterrorism activities in Europe, also concluded that European countries, including Italy, Sweden and Bosnia and Herzegovina, were aware of the abductions or transfers and therefore might have been complicit.

"The European Parliament deplores the fact that the C.I.A. has on several occasions clearly been responsible for kidnapping and illegally detaining alleged terrorists on the territory of member states, as well for extraordinary renditions" to third countries, wrote Giovanni Fava of Italy, a Socialist member of the European Parliament who led the committee.

The report, the first of several planned by the Parliament, grew out of three months of hearings, including testimony by human rights advocates and individuals who said they had been kidnapped by United States agents and flown to other countries, including Egypt and Afghanistan, where they were tortured.

As for the question of secret C.I.A. detention centers in Europe, the new report offered no hard evidence.

Its estimate of 1,000 undeclared flights exceeds the numbers previously discussed, including those in an analysis by The New York Times late last year that said the agency operated about 300 flights in Europe between November 2001 and the summer of 2005.

The report's conclusions are likely to heighten trans-Atlantic tensions at a time when Europe and the United States are already at odds over how to balance civil liberties with the fight against terrorists.

The inquiry was opened in January after The Washington Post reported that the C.I.A. had hidden and interrogated suspected members of Al Qaeda at secret prisons in Eastern Europe.

Mr. Fava said the committee hoped to send a fact-finding mission to Poland and Romania in September. Both countries have been cited as possible locations for prisons.

Mr. Fava said the investigation showed that agency planes had made hundreds of flights and several secret stopovers in Europe, violating a treaty that requires airlines to declare routes for police missions.

The C.I.A. declined to comment on the specifics, but an agency spokesman defended the practice of taking suspects to third countries, a process known as rendition.

"Renditions are an antiterror tool that the United States has used for years, consistent with its laws and treaty obligations," said the spokesman, Paul Gimigliano. "The C.I.A does not condone or tolerate torture, transport individuals to other countries for the purpose of torture or knowingly receive intelligence obtained by torture."

Mr. Fava emphasized that it was most likely that some authorities in Europe had been aware that suspects were being detained on their territories. He pointed to testimony by a senior prosecutor in Milan, Italy, Armando Spataro, that a C.I.A. team had abducted a suspect, Abu Omar, in February 2003 in broad daylight before he was flown to Egypt.

Mr. Fava also criticized Sweden for handing over two Egyptian suspects, Muhammad al-Zary and Ahmed Agiza, to American agents who flew them to Egypt in December 2001. Their case was brought to light by Swedish television in 2004.

"Sweden has been criticized for this on numerous occasions, and we have taken a number of steps in order for it not to happen again," Barbro Holmberg, the minister for migration and asylum policy, said.

Mr. Fava said the Parliament found that Bosnian authorities had handed over six suspects of Algerian origin to C.I.A. agents without assurances that they would not be tortured, and in defiance of a ruling by the human rights court in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

EU Lawmakers Allege Numerous CIA Flights (AP-Y2)

By Jan Sliva

AP2, April 26, 2006

The CIA has conducted more than 1,000 clandestine flights in Europe since 2001, and some of them secretly took away terror suspects to countries where they could face torture, European Union lawmakers said Wednesday.

Legislators selected to look into allegations of questionable CIA activities in Europe said flight data showed a pattern of hidden operations by American agents, and they accused some European governments of knowing about it but remaining silent.

Cases of terror suspects being secretly handed over to U.S. agents did not appear to be isolated, the lawmakers said in a preliminary report on their inquiry. European human rights treaties prohibit sending suspects to states known to torture prisoners.

"The committee deplores the fact that, as established during the committee's investigation, the CIA has used aircraft registered under fictitious company names or with private companies to secretly transfer terror suspects to other countries including Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Afghanistan," according to a copy of the report obtained by The Associated Press.

The CIA declined to comment, as did European Union officials, who have said previously that there was no irrefutable proof of such hand-overs, which are known as "extraordinary renditions."

The investigation began in January after news reports that U.S. agents had interrogated al-Qaida suspects at secret prisons in eastern Europe. But the focus shifted after people gave detailed accounts of being abducted by U.S. agents in Europe and whisked away to jails in the Middle East, Asia and North Africa.

Few of those who testified at the committee hearings touched on the alleged secret prisons in eastern Europe first reported by The Washington Post in November. Italian lawmaker Giovanni Fava, who wrote the report, said the committee would look into those allegations later.

The lawmakers based their initial report on data provided by Eurocontrol, the EU's air safety agency, and more than 50 hours of testimony by EU officials, rights groups and individuals who said they were kidnapped and tortured by U.S. agents.

Eurocontrol said the number of clandestine CIA flights over Europe was likely to be higher than 1,000 because the agency checked only flight plans for fewer than 50 aircraft used by the CIA.

"We were requested by EU Parliament to make an analysis of the flight routes for these planes. There may be others," said Jean-Jacques Sauvage, a senior official of the Brussels-based agency. He said Eurocontrol did not keep track of who was on the planes.

The report said that on a number of occasions the CIA was clearly responsible for detaining terror suspects on European territory and transferring them to countries where they could face torture.

Fava told the AP it was unclear how many people were transferred by the CIA on undeclared flights. He also said there was no evidence proving complicity by European officials, but called it unlikely that some governments, such as in Italy, Bosnia and Sweden, knew nothing about the CIA operations.

He accused the CIA of breaching the Chicago Convention, an international treaty governing air traffic. It requires aircraft used in military, customs and police operations to seek special authorization to land in signatory states.

U.S. officials previously said that as of late December, some 100 to 150 people had been seized in "rendition" operations involving detaining terror suspects in one country and flying them to their home country or another where they were wanted for a crime or questioning.

The officials, who agreed to discuss the operations only if not quoted by name, said the action was reserved for people considered by the CIA to be the most serious terror suspects. But they conceded mistakes had been made and were being investigated by the CIA's inspector general.

Fava cited as one example of "extraordinary rendition" the case of an Egyptian cleric, Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, who allegedly was abducted by U.S. agents on a street in Milan, Italy, in 2003 and returned to his homeland, where he says he was tortured.

Another case involved German citizen Khalid al-Masri. Documents provided by Eurocontrol indicated he was taken to Afghanistan in 2004 by a plane that originated in Algeria and flew via Palma de Mallorca, Spain; Skopje, Macedonia; and Baghdad, Iraq.

Al-Masri, who was born in Kuwait, told the committee that he was arrested by U.S. agents on the Macedonian border while on vacation. He said he was kept at a hotel in Skopje for several weeks before being flown to Afghanistan and jailed for five months. He said he was flown back to Europe in May 2004 and released in Albania.

Fava said the bulk of the clandestine CIA flights passed through Germany and Spain, where the United States has several air bases. Neither government had any comment.

The European Union also declined to address the committee's preliminary report.

"We have no comment. We will wait for the investigation to finish," said Friso Roscam Abbing, spokesman for EU Justice Commissioner Franco Frattini.

Probe Of Detainee Transfers Finds Many CIA Flights (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

DOJ_NMG_0026619

BERLIN, April 26 -- European Parliament investigators said Wednesday they had uncovered evidence that the CIA has organized more than 1,000 flights through European airspace since 2001 as part of a secret program to transfer and detain terrorism suspects.

A parliamentary committee investigating CIA counterterrorism tactics in Europe reported that it had obtained records of the flights from Eurocontrol, the continent's primary air traffic management agency. The flights were by U.S.-registered aircraft that investigators believe were chartered by the CIA or owned by front companies working for the agency.

Investigators acknowledged that they had no idea how many of the flights were actually used to transport terrorism suspects. But they accused the CIA of violating human rights conventions and European law by concealing the purpose of the flights and not reporting passenger manifests to local authorities.

"The routes for some of these flights seem to be quite suspect," Italian lawmaker Giovanni Claudio Fava, head of the Parliament committee, told reporters in Brussels. "They are rather strange routes for flights to take. It is hard to imagine those stopovers were simply for providing fuel."

The preliminary report also criticized several European countries -- including Sweden, Italy and Macedonia -- saying they had allowed CIA officers to apprehend or detain terrorism suspects on their soil and then covered up their presence.

"No one among the national security authorities -- save for a few exceptions -- has ever cared to verify what was the real aim of those flights, who were in their crew and passengers, or rather prisoners," Fava said.

The European Parliament has been investigating the CIA flights as well as reports that the CIA detained suspected high-ranking al-Qaeda members in secret prisons in Eastern Europe.

The Washington Post reported in November that the CIA had been interrogating some of its most important al-Qaeda captives at a Soviet-era compound in Eastern Europe as part of a covert prison system that at various times has included sites in several democracies in Eastern Europe. The Post did not identify the Eastern European countries at the request of senior U.S. officials, who said the disclosure could disrupt counterterrorism efforts in those countries and elsewhere and could make them targets of possible terrorist retaliation.

The Parliament has few powers to compel testimony or obtain documents, but is scheduled to hold hearings throughout Europe during the rest of the year. On Thursday, the committee is scheduled to question authorities in Macedonia about the case of a German citizen, Khaled al-Masri, who has said he was kidnapped by security officials in Macedonia in early 2004, handed over to the CIA and taken to Afghanistan.

The committee is also scheduled to hold a hearing in Washington next month and has invited former CIA officials to testify.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Terror Case Hears Talk Of Bombing Subway Stop (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

A fuller picture emerged yesterday of an alleged plot to bomb the Herald Square subway station and of the Pakistani immigrant charged as its prime author, as prosecutors again played secretly recorded conversations between the man and a police informer.

The conversations, played for a jury in federal District Court in Brooklyn, captured the immigrant, Shahawar Matin Siraj, 23, telling the informer he expected that the blast in the subway station would bring down the Manhattan Mall on the street above.

But in another conversation, he seems to suggest to the informer that the bomb could be as small as a bottle of soda, tossed into a garbage can on the subway station's platform. He said he wanted to bomb the station in the early morning hours to cause only economic damage and kill as few people as possible, but he was willing to let the explosion kill the homeless people who spend the night there.

These contradictions were among several that emerged from Mr. Siraj's sometimes rambling, disjointed and often angry statements, which also suggested that he has a grandiose view of his own talents as a terrorist plotter. In fact, he offered a critical assessment of al Qaeda, saying its members carry out suicide attacks because they are poor planners.

"That is what I don't like about them," he said on Aug. 18, 2004, just nine days before he and a co-conspirator, James Elshafay, were arrested and charged in the plot. Mr. Elshafay, 21, has pleaded guilty and is expected to testify.

Yesterday, jurors listened attentively to the recorded conversations between Mr. Siraj and the police informer, Osama Eldawoody, 50. It was the second day that prosecutors have played selections from more than 30 hours of digital recordings from the summer of 2004.

Using government transcripts, the jurors seemed to follow the heavily accented conversations carefully, and then one of the prosecutors, Todd Harrison, would question Mr. Eldawoody about the recorded discussions.

The government has sought to portray Mr. Siraj as a dangerous man bent on carrying out a devastating attack. His lawyers, however, contend that the young man, who came to New York from Karachi, Pakistan, in 1999 to join his parents, was duped.

They have said that when a fuller picture is presented, it will be clear that Mr. Siraj was manipulated by the police informer, who they contend orchestrated the plot for money, nearly $100,000 that the Police Department paid him over two years and nine months, much of it while he was working on this case.

One of Mr. Siraj's lawyers, Martin R. Stolar, has called him "not the brightest bulb on the chandelier."

On the tapes played yesterday, Mr. Siraj seemed to alternate between shrewd, bumbling and bizarre. In one conversation, he told Mr. Eldawoody that he had masqueraded as a homeless man to examine the security in the subway station. He looked for surveillance cameras and, though he saw none, he told Mr. Eldawoody that he could not believe there was not a tighter security cordon.

"I cannot find no security over there, it's impossible," he said. "If there is no security, it means there is a high security over there. No security means high security. That's a trap."

He also said he would shave his beard and wear New York Yankee apparel to disguise himself for a later surveillance mission.

At another point in the conversation, he seemed convinced that some sort of plot had been set in motion against a mosque at East 96th Street and Third Avenue in Manhattan.

Final Arguments In Trial Of Man Who Knew Two 9/11 Hijackers (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore And Carla Baranauckas

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

A tangled four-and-half-year legal battle drew toward an end yesterday as prosecutors and defense lawyers made closing arguments in the case of a Jordanian college student accused of lying to a federal grand jury about his relationship with two Sept. 11 hijackers.

Prosecutors say the student, Osama Awadallah, on trial in Manhattan federal court, lied when he testified under oath at an October 2001 grand jury hearing that he did not know one of the hijackers, Khalid al-Midhar, and denied having written his name in a school notebook before conceding during a later hearing that he had met Mr. Midhar.

"Mr. Awadallah lied repeatedly and deliberately," said Karl Metzner, an assistant United States attorney.

Mr. Midhar and Nawaf al-Hazmi, another hijacker, had been living in San Diego until about a year before they boarded American Airlines Flight 77, the plane that crashed into the Pentagon. Mr. Awadallah was arrested on Sept. 21, 2001, after F.B.I. agents found a scrap of paper with the name "Osama" and Mr. Awadallah's old phone number in a car that Mr. Hazmi had left at Dulles International Airport, near Washington.

Mr. Awadallah's lawyer, Jesse Berman, painted a very different picture, that of a young immigrant, 21 at the time of the attacks, with limited English, disoriented after nearly three weeks of solitary confinement and with no reason to mislead the grand jury.

"We're not saying this gave him license to lie," Mr. Berman said. The defendant, he said, was "exhausted and confused."

The two sides met yesterday in a courtroom less than half a mile from ground zero, imagery that the prosecutors invoked repeatedly as they argued that Mr. Awadallah had lied, presenting transcripts of his testimony and a detailed chronology of how his account had changed during several hearings and interviews with law enforcement.

"He didn't just lie deliberately. He lied before the federal grand jury investigating the worst terrorist attack in this country's history," Mr. Metzner said.

Mr. Awadallah has never been charged with conspiring in the 9/11 attacks or knowing about them in advance, and the outcome of his trial may rest on whether the jury remains focused on the relatively narrow perjury charge against him.

In his first grand jury appearance, Mr. Awadallah repeatedly denied knowing anyone named Khalid. But prosecutors showed him an examination booklet they discovered at his college, in which was written: "One of the quietest people I have met is Nawaf. Another one, his name is Khalid."

Mr. Awadallah at first said that some of the handwriting was not his. When he returned to the grand jury on Oct. 15, 2001, he said that he recognized it as his writing and that on several occasions he had met a friend of Mr. Hazmi's named Khalid.

Mr. Berman argued that the first photocopy of the examination booklet that Mr. Awadallah was shown was smudged, and that reading it was all the more difficult because his client had not had his eyeglasses while in custody or on the stand.

"He gave a ridiculous answer," Mr. Berman added, "but not intentionally. He had nothing to gain by lying to prosecutors."

The prosecutor, Mr. Metzner, dismissed the defense's contention that Mr. Awadallah was confused after being physically mistreated while in detention.

"You can still tell the truth if your arms hurt," he said.

If convicted, Mr. Awadallah, now 25, faces a maximum sentence of five years on each of two counts of perjury, as well as deportation. He has waited — free on bail for much of the time — as his fiercely contested case made its way through the courts.

In recent years, Mr. Awadallah has been a student at San Diego State University, where he is scheduled to graduate next month.

Terrorists In State, Candidate Says (MJS)

By Stacy Forster Sforster@journalsentinel.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, April 27, 2006

Opponents call his remarks irresponsible

Madison - There are terrorists training and raising money in Wisconsin, Republican attorney general candidate J.B. Van Hollen said Wednesday in a Capitol news conference.

But Van Hollen declined to provide any specifics about what kind of terrorist activity law enforcement was tracking in Wisconsin. He cited confidentiality, adding that his knowledge of such activity dates back to January 2005, when he resigned as U.S. attorney for the Western District of Wisconsin.

A spokesman for incumbent Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager and Van Hollen's opponent in the Republican primary, Waukesha County District Attorney Paul Bucher, both called Van Hollen's comments "irresponsible."

Mike Bauer, legal services administrator for the state Department of Justice, and Mike Johnson, a supervisory special agent for the Milwaukee FBI office, declined to comment on the status of any investigations in Wisconsin. The U.S. Department of Homeland Security did not return a call for comment.

Van Hollen and Bucher will face off in the September Republican primary. The winner will go up against the Democratic victor, either Lautenschlager or Dane County Executive Kathleen Falk, in the November general election.

Van Hollen has pledged to make fighting terrorism a top priority if elected; he proposes teams of law enforcement officials from all levels to train and share information.

While arguing that the state Department of Justice could be doing more to guard against terrorist threats, Van Hollen added that Wisconsin residents should know about terrorist activity taking place here so they can be vigilant about reporting suspicious activity.

"We have in Wisconsin terrorists who are training and raising funds," Van Hollen said. "We don't need to be paranoid, but we need to be vigilant."

After the news conference, Van Hollen said he didn't think his comments would raise fear among Wisconsin residents.

"If people believe that we do not have terrorists in Wisconsin, and they believe we're not at risk for terrorist attacks in Wisconsin, they're uninformed," Van Hollen said. "Do we need to be paranoid about it? I don't think so."

Van Hollen said that based on information he had access to as U.S. attorney, he was aware that the FBI and other law enforcement officials were monitoring potential threats, but that there wasn't enough activity or information to act.

The FBI's Johnson said Van Hollen's comment about the FBI was "completely inappropriate" because Van Hollen doesn't speak for the agency.

Bauer of the Justice Department said Van Hollen's criticism of Lautenschlager's track record on fighting terrorism was wrong. Under Lautenschlager, Justice Department officials have been involved in several state and federal task forces with officials from across jurisdictions, Bauer said.

"It's a joint role with the federal government," Bauer said of the department's place in fighting terrorism.

The department's Division of Criminal Investigation also developed a statewide intelligence center for law enforcement, emergency services and disaster response experts to share information, the department said.

Bucher said he was "shocked" that Van Hollen had chosen to provide such information without backing it up.

"Why would you say to the citizens of the state that, 'There are terrorists training in this state, but I can't say anything about it or do anything about it?' " Bucher said.

Bucher added that he would soon introduce a plan for dealing with terrorism that is likely to include steps to foster cooperation with federal prosecutors and investigators. But Bucher said the state attorney general's role in fighting terrorism is limited because the department doesn't have primary enforcement authority for terrorism.

"The attorney general does have a responsibility to work in a cooperative atmosphere with the agencies that have the lead on this issue," he said.

Falk campaign spokeswoman Melissa Mulliken said in an e-mail that Van Hollen should provide credible information to back up his comments - "otherwise it is a political scare tactic."

Van Hollen Claims Terrorists Are In Wisconsin (DULNT)

By Todd Richmond

The Duluth News Tribune, April 27, 2006

MADISON, Wis. - Terrorists are operating in Wisconsin, state attorney general candidate J.B. Van Hollen claimed Wednesday.

Van Hollen accused Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager during a Capitol news conference of not doing enough to fight terrorism, and he followed up with a comment that, "We have in Wisconsin terrorists who are training and raising funds."

He said he learned the information while he was U.S. attorney for the Western District of Wisconsin - a post he resigned in 2005 to run for attorney general - but the terrorists weren't doing anything he could act upon.

He declined to elaborate, saying divulging any information would make him guilty of a felony. But he added Wisconsin has targets such as power plants.

Mike Johnson, a spokesman for the FBI's Milwaukee office, declined to comment. Messages The Associated Press left at the U.S. Department of Justice and at the office of Stephen Sinnot, who now serves as U.S. attorney for western Wisconsin, weren't immediately returned.

"He can't talk about specifics that he dealt with ... as U.S. attorney," said Van Hollen campaign spokesman Brian Fraley. "He can't breach the confidentiality of that office. (But) it would be naive to think there aren't terrorists in Wisconsin."

Van Hollen's opponents immediately demanded that he give up what he knows. Van Hollen and Waukesha County District Attorney Paul Bucher face each other in a Republican primary in September. The winner will face either Lautenschlager or Dane County Executive Kathleen Falk, who will square off in the Democratic primary, in November.

"If Mr. Van Hollen has indicated he has knowledge of terrorist training in this state, he better ... get a good lawyer to help him get that information to the authorities," Bucher said. "I hope he's done that. That's what I would do."

Lautenschlager campaign spokesman Dan Bachhuber accused Van Hollen of grandstanding.

"If J.B. has some information he should provide it," Bachhuber said. "I just don't know where he might be getting his information."

Falk campaign spokeswoman Melissa Mulliken issued a statement calling on Van Hollen to reveal what he knows.

"It is irresponsible for a candidate for AG to make claims he won't substantiate regarding our national security. If he has credible information he should provide it; otherwise it is a political scare tactic," the statement said.

Fraley insisted Van Hollen can't reveal any information that might hinder a federal investigation or reveal information about investigations that began when he ran the U.S. attorney's office.

State Department of Justice spokesman Mike Bauer declined to comment on terrorist activities in Wisconsin or whether the agency is probing them.

He said the head of the department's criminal investigation unit, Jim Warren, sits on the governor's Homeland Security Council, Justice agents work full time on joint terrorism task forces headed by the FBI and the agency has highly trained investigators ready to help with domestic security issues.

House Panel OKs Tougher Port Rules (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

A measure to secure U.S. ports from a nuclear attack and to increase the number of random cargo inspections won full committee approval in the House yesterday.

The $2.4 billion bill to track and protect cargo containers shipped from foreign ports passed the House Homeland Security Committee unanimously, and requires that 98 percent of all containers be screened for nuclear materials.

A Democratic proposal that would require in five years that all containers be screened for nuclear devices was rejected by a 18-16 vote.

Republicans say the timetable should be more flexible to allow radiation portal monitor technology to improve. Some critics of the technology question whether it can effectively identify nuclear materials if they are is protected by lead shielding.

"We must do everything in our power to prevent another terrorist attack on U.S. soil," said Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"That means continuing to strengthen our domestic and international security efforts through measures like the SAFE Port Act. As long as our ports remain vulnerable, so do the American people," Mr. King said. "Passing a comprehensive, bipartisan port security bill is one of the most important things we'll do this year."

The Security and Accountability For Every Port Act requires Homeland Security Department officials to collect data from importers before cargo is loaded at foreign ports.

The legislation also calls for a Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, which the Bush administration put into motion Tuesday.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff says background checks, including an immigration status check, will be required for all U.S. ports.

Nearly a half-million current port workers and longshoremen will be screened initially and cleared to access secure areas.

Security gaps were highlighted last month after a deal to turn over terminal operations at six major U.S. ports to a Dubai-owned company fell apart amid a congressional firestorm.

Although Democrats say the nuclear screening requirement is weak, the legislation has bipartisan support. It is sponsored by Rep. Dan Lungren, California Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat.

"Though the vulnerability of our seaports has become an important issue in recent months, the reality is that this legislation is long overdue," Mr. Lungren said.

In the Senate, a measure adding $1.9 billion for border and port security was attached to an emergency spending bill. The amendment sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican and chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, passed 59-39.

Mr. Gregg said the Senate measure would "basically give the people who are defending us on our borders ... the tools they need to do their job right."

Lawmakers Spar Over Cargo Radiation Tests (AP-Y2)

By Devlin Barrett

AP2, April 26, 2006

An effort to shore up the nation's port security cleared a House committee Wednesday after Republicans beat back a Democratic attempt to screen all cargo for radioactive material.

Lawmakers once united in opposition to a proposed U.S. ports deal with Dubai sparred at the hearing over Democrats' demands for 100 percent radiation screening of shipping containers.

The bill, headed for a vote on the House floor next week, would require the Homeland Security Department to give a timetable for placing radiation portal monitors at U.S. seaports that don't already have them, and assess the security implications of screening programs for foreign ports.

Reps. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., and Jane Harman, D-Calif., sponsored the broad port security measure last month as Congress was in an uproar over now-abandoned plans by DP World to manage terminals at ports in New Jersey, New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia.

The panel rejected along party lines an amendment offered by Rep. Edward Markey (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., which would require within five years radiation screening for every container coming into the U.S.

Republicans said the deadline was unrealistic and the scanner technology is still too faulty to deploy through a mammoth port system that handles 20,000 cargo containers every day.

At that, some Democrats erupted.

Rep. Peter DeFazio (news, bio, voting record), D-Ore., slammed his fist as he called current port security programs "a joke."

"We have a faith-based honor system. People could ship a nuclear bomb here today," he said, accusing GOP leaders of buckling to pressure from business groups that oppose greater regulation.

Republicans denied any influence from lobbyists.

"Somebody said we're lackeys for the industry. I'm not a lackey for anybody," said Lungren.

Committee chairman Peter King urged both sides to cut back partisan accusations.

"Any implication that anyone on either side of the aisle is not concerned about homeland security, is not concerned about the loss of human life, it demeans and cheapens the debate," said King, R-N.Y.

Trade Group's Role In Security Program Is Challenged (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Eric Lipton

WASHINGTON, April 26 — When Representative Harold Rogers of Kentucky decided to try to get a new transportation security project off the ground, he turned to a familiar name: the American Association of Airport Executives.

In a little-noticed provision added to a spending measure last year, Mr. Rogers, a Republican who doles out money for national security projects, designated an arm of the trade group with which he has longstanding ties as the central operator of a new federal program to perform background checks on 750,000 maritime workers.

"There is absolutely no reason to waste more time and money reinventing the wheel," Mr. Rogers, chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Homeland Security, said Wednesday in explaining his decision. He said the trade organization's Transportation Security Clearinghouse had already performed 2 million background checks on airport workers.

But the Bush administration and others are now trying to undo Mr. Rogers's handiwork, which is coming to light as Congress puts new scrutiny on the special-interest provisions, known as earmarks, that are sometimes added to measures with little debate.

They say that the earmark is threatening to further delay a program to issue new tamper-proof identification cards to the nation's port workers, a program that could eventually cover millions of transportation workers nationwide. The cards for the port workers were supposed to be available by August 2004.

Industry officials said the provision devised by Mr. Rogers leaves unclear what work would be done by the American Association of Airport Executives and what work could be bid on by contractors with expertise in issuing high-tech biometric cards.

"It is clearly an earmark, and it is very broadly defined," said Walter Hamilton, chairman of the International Biometric Industry Association. He said his group believes that other companies in the industry should be allowed to compete for the entire ID card project, estimated to be worth hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Rogers has a record of close association with the aviation trade group, receiving thousands of dollars in contributions for his election campaigns over the years as. He has also accepted trips to the group's annual meetings in Hawaii, California and Ireland, which are popular with many lawmakers and aides.

But an aide to Mr. Rogers said the political relationship had no bearing on his support for the provision, which the lawmaker said was intended to jump-start the stalled identification program.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Tuesday that in an effort to enhance port security, he intends to start the new program by the end of this year. But the administration, in proposing the 2007 federal budget, made clear that it opposed the requirement by Mr. Rogers, asking Congress to strike it.

"This provision is proposed for deletion in order to provide sufficient flexibility in implementing this program," a memorandum submitted to Congress by the administration said. "Restrictions on such critical programs serve only to limit their effectiveness and efficiency."

The administration effort could find some support on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers who oversee national security are beginning to raise questions about it as well.

"It may be that this association could do a competent job, but it seems to me it would be preferable to have that determination made through a full and open competition rather than a directive from the Appropriations Committee," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who heads the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Since 2002, the aviation association, under a contract with the federal government, has been involved in background checks for airport employees nationwide, an arrangement that has been credited with accelerating the hiring process.

Under the current system, before hiring new employees, the airlines or airports send fingerprints to the association's clearinghouse unit, which then forwards them electronically at a rate of about 1,100 a week to federal authorities. They compile a terrorist watch list and check criminal history, looking for offenses like forgery and unlawful possession of a weapon or explosive material. Job applicants pay a $29 fee for the background check, $7 of which goes to the clearinghouse.

Carter Morris, senior vice president for transportation security policy at the association, said it was still unclear what role his organization might play in the issuance of the new cards for port workers.

Mr. Morris said it was up to the federal Transportation Security Administration to decide what role the association would play concerning the Transportation Worker Identification Credential, as the worker identity card is known.

Todd Hauptli, the airport group's senior executive vice president and its chief lobbyist, decline to comment.

Former government officials and industry executives, despite satisfaction with the trade group's performance on the aviation background checks, said that officials at the Homeland Security Department tried to stop members of Congress in 2005 from mandating that the arrangement be extended to the much larger transportation credential program.

The concern, the former officials said, is that the sole-source contract could complicate the process of competitively hiring companies to handle other necessary tasks.

Mr. Rogers and his staff had been trying for about two years to expand the work assigned to the trade association, trying to persuade the T.S.A. to use the association to process background checks on drivers of trucks carrying hazardous materials.

Lawmakers Reject Real ID (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) -- New Hampshire suddenly has become a battleground in the fight over privacy rights versus homeland security, with state legislators voting against strict new federal standards for issuing driver's licenses.

DOJ_NMG_0026626

At issue is the federal Real ID Act, which is intended to keep terrorists from obtaining fake IDs. It requires states by 2008 to verify documents such as birth certificates, Social Security cards and passports when people apply for driver's licenses. State databases with driver information and photos also will be linked.

Last month, the Republican-controlled New Hampshire House voted overwhelmingly to bar the state from participating in the program. A vote in the Republican-dominated Senate is expected in two weeks after a committee endorsement yesterday. Gov. John Lynch, a Democrat, remains undecided.

The legislation has won backing from the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) as well as conservative privacy advocates and Christian fundamentalists.

"I think New Hampshire will set the dominoes falling in the states," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the Technology and Liberty Program of the ACLU, who testified against Real ID at a recent state Senate hearing alongside a member of the conservative Cato Institute.

Legislation in other states would condemn Real ID, but New Hampshire's bill is the toughest measure making real progress anywhere, Mr. Steinhardt said.

Republican state Rep. Neal Kurk, author of the bill against Real ID, gave a stirring speech during the debate.

"We care more for our liberties than to meekly hand over to the federal government the potential to enumerate, track, identify and eventually control," Mr. Kurk told the House.

A weekend rally featuring Real ID opponents in Nazi uniforms attracted lawmakers from both parties, and worried members of Congress dispatched a staff member from the House Judiciary Committee to meet one-on-one with state senators in advance of the committee vote yesterday.

Supporters of Real ID say blocking it will isolate New Hampshire, requiring residents to obtain a passport if they want to board an airplane or enter a federal building. The state also would lose a $3 million federal grant to update driver's license computers.

Jeff Lungren, spokesman for the U.S. House Judiciary Committee, said Real ID closes loopholes that allowed a September 11 terrorist with a six-month tourist visa to obtain driver's licenses in multiple states good for five years or longer.

He said it sprang from a finding of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States that "for terrorists, travel documents are as important as weapons."

Many governors and some state motor vehicle directors oppose Real ID. Most state legislatures are waiting to see regulations for implementing the law from the federal Department of Homeland Security before acting.

"It's not going to promote national security. It's not going to help us prevent illegal immigration. It's just going to help the government keep tabs on ordinary citizens," Mr. Kurk said. "Remember, the 9/11 terrorists were in this country legally and had legally obtained documents."

Fewer Fined By Airport Security In '05 (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Thomas Frank

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The number of passengers fined for security violations at airports fell dramatically last year as the federal government focused on more serious threats, according to records and government officials.

The Transportation Security Administration issued 4,459 fines against passengers in 2005, a 54% decrease from 2004. The vast majority of fines are doled out to people trying to bring weapons and other dangerous items on planes.

“The public has been getting better about what not to bring to the checkpoints,” said Salomon Gomez, the Transportation Security Administration's assistant chief council for civil enforcement. “TSA has also gotten better. We've focused more on what will really take down a plane.”

In 2004, the TSA adopted a zero-tolerance policy for passengers caught with prohibited items at airport screening checkpoints. The number of fines against passengers soared from 3,426 in 2003 to 9,741 in 2004. The policy prompted complaints from Congress about unequal enforcement and heavy-handedness.

Early last year, TSA altered its policy in an attempt to refocus on what the agency believes are greater threats to planes, such as explosives that can bring down a flight. Previously, most people who brought a small knife in a suitcase received a fine.

Those people now receive warning letters unless they have attempted to conceal the knife or exhibited threatening behavior, TSA spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said.

Fines range from $250 for minor infractions to $10,000 for passengers with explosives.

Three screeners told USA TODAY that fewer passengers are trying to carry items such as knives and tools on planes.

"The flying public is just realizing they shouldn't be carrying this stuff," said Cris Soulia, a screener at San Diego International Airport.

The TSA bans 68 items, including flammables, martial-arts weapons, tools such as hammers and drills, and sporting equipment such as hockey and lacrosse sticks and pool cues. Most of those items can be packed in checked luggage.

The TSA is also seizing fewer of the items considered most threatening at checkpoints. For example, TSA security officers in 2004 seized nearly 700,000 incendiary items, such as ammunition or dangerous flammable materials. Last year, the total fell to about 372,000 such items. The number of seized knives, other cutting devices and clubs (baseball bats, nightsticks, etc.) also fell.

The overall number of seized items rose last year because the TSA began barring lighters.

Some security analysts say that the TSA still goes too far in what it bans on flights. Charles Slepian, a New York aviation security expert and founder of the Foreseeable Risk Analysis Center, said the TSA allows passengers to carry things such as knitting needles and canes that can do just as much harm as banned items such as sharp knives and bats.

Rep. Peter DeFazio, D-Ore., a longtime critic of the TSA's fines, applauded the decrease. "I'm not hearing complaints from consumers as we were hearing a few years ago."

Neighborhood Watch Pentagon Steps Up Intelligence Efforts Inside U.S. Borders (WSJ)

By Robert Block And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

AKRON, Ohio -- On March 19, 2005, about 200 mainly middle-aged peace marchers made their way through the streets of this city, stopping outside a Marine Corps recruiting center and a Federal Bureau of Investigation office to listen to speeches against the Iraq war. Close behind, police in unmarked cars followed them -- acting on a tip from the Pentagon.

For weeks prior to the demonstration, analysts at the Army's 902nd Military Intelligence Group in Fort Meade, Md., were downloading information from activist Web sites, intercepting emails and cross-referencing this with information in police databases.

The Army's conclusion, contained in an alert to Akron police: "Even though these demonstrations are advertised as 'peaceful,' they are assessed to present a potential force protection threat."

The Akron protest and seven others monitored by the Army that month turned out to be nonviolent. Pentagon officials later issued an apology, admitting that some of the information in military databases shouldn't have been there. But they called that a minor slip in a critical program to protect Americans.

The government's monitoring of the protests is one example of how the 9/11 terror attacks have sparked a broad effort by the Pentagon to gather intelligence within U.S. borders. Its goals are both to protect military facilities and keep an eye out for any threat on American soil.

After 9/11, the Bush administration declared the continental U.S. a theater of military operations for the first time since the Civil War, creating a demand to better research potential threats to American forces at home. Now several parts of the vast Pentagon bureaucracy are building large databases of information from sources including local police, military personnel and the Internet. In doing so, the military is edging toward a sensitive area that has been off-limits to it since the 1970s: domestic surveillance and law enforcement.

One widely reported part of the new information battle is the National Security Agency's wiretapping of calls without a warrant between people in the U.S. and suspected terrorists overseas. The agency is part of the Defense Department. That practice is just one piece of a larger, less-discussed effort.

The military justifies the gathering of domestic intelligence in part by relying on a key distinction between "receiving" information and "collecting" it. Military regulations over the past few decades have generally barred using soldiers to gather information on American citizens. Officials have interpreted the rules to mean that receiving information from the police or federal agencies is acceptable.

"We are receiving information lawfully gathered by other agencies and then following up on it to make an assessment," says Cmdr. Greg Hicks, a Pentagon spokesman.

Further, the military says it doesn't order civilian law-enforcement officials such as the police or the FBI to do anything. Military officials say they may point out items of concern such as the Akron march but it's up to police whether to listen.

The broad Pentagon effort comes amid a surge of popular support after the 9/11 attacks for more vigilant efforts to prevent terrorism. Polls continue to show backing for aggressive moves. In a March Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1, 52% of those surveyed said they supported the NSA wiretaps without a warrant, while 46% said they were opposed.

The military moves nonetheless face both political and practical objections. Civil libertarians fear a return to the Vietnam era, when military personnel collected information on more than 100,000 Americans, infiltrated church youth groups and posed as reporters to interview activists, according to a 1975 Senate investigation. Critics say the receiving-versus-collecting distinction makes little sense if the Pentagon is taking in huge amounts of data, organizing it, analyzing it and using it to influence law enforcement.

"Today military spies can compile more information about antiwar protesters by 'receiving' it off the Web than its gumshoes used to collect by watching demonstrations," says Christopher Pyle, a former Army intelligence officer who disclosed the military's surveillance of civilian politics in the 1960s to Congress and worked to end it. Mr. Pyle is now a professor of politics at Mt. Holyoke College in Massachusetts.

Because of the secrecy surrounding the programs, the results of the Pentagon's efforts -- including any possible successes in preventing terrorism -- are unknown. President Bush and other officials have said that Americans often don't see such successes because revealing them would help terrorists. Mr. Bush's critics, aside from their civil-liberties concerns, say monitoring antiwar activities may turn out to be a waste of resources by diverting attention from known terrorists.

According to documents seen by The Wall Street Journal, the Pentagon has monitored more than 20 antiwar groups' activities around the country over the past three years. It has reviewed photographs and records of vehicles and protesters at marches to see if different activities were being organized by the same instigators. Cmdr. Hicks says the point of this monitoring is to keep military personnel away from places where they might provoke demonstrators, not to interfere with anyone's right to protest.

The peace activists don't like being watched. About 300 activists gathered at Akron's public library this February to complain to elected representatives at a public hearing. They had watched an NBC News report in December that said the Pentagon included peace group activities in a database of potential terrorist threats. Documents viewed by The Wall Street Journal show that, as the activists suspected, their Quaker-organized rally in March 2005 was on the Pentagon's watch list. Those documents show a broader effort to gather information for databases and analyze it.

'Eerie Feeling'

Pat Carano, a veteran of Ohio peace marches since the Vietnam War, told the meeting of the "eerie feeling" of being watched when he saw the unmarked police cars. "It's ridiculous," said Donna Schapps, a grandmother of four from Stow, Ohio. "Quakers are not terrorists. We believe in peace."

Strict limits on soldiers doing the work of police date back to the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878, enacted in response to a public backlash against troops maintaining civil order in the South during Reconstruction. The act generally prohibits the military from domestic law-enforcement activities.

The military's secret monitoring of dissidents during the Vietnam War led to a slew of laws, regulations and executive orders that pushed the military out of domestic spying and created walls between domestic and foreign intelligence.

After Sept. 11, 2001, those walls came in for criticism from a broad range of experts. The bipartisan 9/11 Commission concluded that U.S. intelligence agencies needed to do a better job of coordinating and connecting leads. The Pentagon itself believed it might have prevented the attacks if its ability to operate within the U.S. were less circumscribed, and decided to take a fresh look at the post-Vietnam rules.

On Nov. 5, 2001, Lt. Gen. Robert W. Noonan Jr., then the Army's deputy chief of staff for intelligence, sent a memo to Army commanders titled, "Collecting Information on U.S. Persons3."

"Contrary to popular belief, there is no absolute ban on intelligence components collecting U.S. person information," it said. Gen. Noonan noted that while the military was normally barred from using its own assets to collect information about people living in the U.S., military intelligence "may receive information from anyone, anytime...if only to determine its intelligence value.

"Remember," the memo stressed, "merely receiving information does not constitute 'collection' " under Army regulations.

Michael Varhola, an official in the Army inspector general's office, repeated the message in a January 2002 article in the quarterly Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin. Even though many types of information gathering were perfectly legal, Mr. Varhola wrote, "unfortunately some individuals find it easier or safer to avoid the issue altogether by simply not collecting the data on citizens they may need to do their complete jobs."

As such views spread, several parts of the Pentagon empire soon swung into action to formalize information-gathering efforts, though they weren't all necessarily acting in concert. In February 2002, Paul Wolfowitz, then the deputy defense secretary, formed a unit at Pentagon headquarters to manage all military counterintelligence programs. Its name was Counter Intelligence Field Activity. CIFA, whose exact size and budget remain secret, has grown to include nine directorates. Its main focus is on protecting defense facilities and personnel from terrorist attacks.

Some of the raw data feeding into CIFA headquarters comes from a reporting process called Talon (short for "Threat and Local Observation Notice"). Talon started out as an Air Force reporting form that airmen could fill out and hand in if they noticed anything unusual around the base. In May 2003, the Pentagon made Talon the standard method for service members in all the armed forces to report "nonvalidated" information about possible terrorist activity. Talon reports can now be filled out online.

Connecting the Dots

Pentagon officials compare the process to a neighborhood-watch program. Cmdr. Hicks says Talon is the place where the Department of Defense "initially stores the 'dots' of information, which, if validated, might later be connected before an attack occurs."

To connect the dots, the Pentagon has turned to data mining, the science of extracting patterns from large volumes of raw information. In theory, reports of unusual incidents such as those collected by Talon could be added to electronic records of business transactions, Internet usage and police activity to deduce where terrorists are gearing up for an attack.

A December 2002 report issued by Sen. Richard Shelby, then vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said CIFA was working with the Justice Department to develop "deep access data-mining techniques" to discover potential threats to the U.S. from terrorists.

As Mr. Wolfowitz was starting up CIFA, researchers at a separate Pentagon unit, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, began work on a massive data-capturing program known as Total Information Awareness. This program, too, envisioned mining government databases and personal records of individuals for patterns that would predict a terrorist attack. A huge public outcry over the project led Congress to cancel it in October 2003 -- but Congress created a specific exemption for tools that might aid "counterterrorism foreign intelligence."

Many computer programs and techniques developed during the Total Information Awareness project quietly survived. Some were taken up by the Army's 902nd Military Intelligence Group. The 902nd, established during World War II and known as the "Deuce," is part of the Army command structure and separate from CIFA at Pentagon headquarters. Nonetheless, the 902nd plays an important military-wide role because it is the military's largest counterintelligence unit and has hundreds of soldiers stationed around the country.

Charles Harlan, who heads the 902nd's analysis center, published an article in the Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin in January 2005 describing how his unit processed information to help the Pentagon predict attacks against the military in the U.S. He described three data-mining and artificial-intelligence programs as key to the effort -- all three of which were components of the defunct Total Information Awareness project.

The 902nd has access to Talon, but it also makes extensive use of another information system created after 9/11. This system, called the Joint Regional Information Exchange System, gathers information collected by civilian law enforcement agencies around the country. The Pentagon and local authorities including the New York Police Department and California's justice department set it up in December 2002. The idea was to give military personnel access to terror-related information on U.S. residents without violating any prohibitions on the military collecting domestic intelligence.

The Pentagon's regional information-exchange system got a boost when the Department of Homeland Security took it over and expanded it to include information from all 50 states and major urban areas.

The system doesn't just serve military personnel. A police department in one place can put a query out to other cities or states seeking information on, say, license plates or phone numbers of terrorist suspects. Many police departments purchase commercially available information about individuals, such as credit data and online viewing habits, as part of investigations. They can post this information on the exchange system.

Military members can also issue a query seeking information on any topic they like, but they can't command any civilian participant to do anything. In theory they could ask for personal data on individuals via the exchange system, but it isn't clear whether they do so and if so under what circumstances.

All of these strands came together to prompt the police's shadowing of peace protesters in the spring of 2005. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told the Senate last month that the Department of Homeland Security was the source of information in Pentagon databases about at least three antiwar protests at military recruiting centers -- two in Vermont and one in Washington, D.C.

A number of leads also came from the Talon reports. The two-page alert from the 902nd Military Intelligence Group that prompted the Akron police to follow the Quaker-organized rally attaches a nine-digit Army Talon number to that protest. It also gives separate numbers for each of seven other protests organized for the second anniversary of the Iraq war. The memo says officials at the 902nd had used some of their data-analysis techniques to look for signs of hidden coordination between the protests.

Analysts at the 902nd's headquarters in Ft. Meade also scrutinized antiwar Web sites looking for threats, including the possibility that protesters might attack military personnel.

The alert memo, signed by Army official Claude G. Benner Jr., portrayed the imminent demonstrations as "threats." It gave a detailed description of activists' Web sites, noting that some featured a "help desk" where would-be protesters could get tips on organizing a demonstration. The memo also raised the possibility that military supporters might assault the protesters. Mr. Benner warned that "the potential for a spontaneous, unprovoked attack against either the demonstrators or pro-US Military persons is assessed as HIGH."

In the end the Akron march was peaceful. A report compiled by the Army and presented last May to the U.S. Northern Command, which is in charge of joint military operations in the continental United States, threw cold water on the idea that hidden provocateurs might be organizing multiple protests around the country. "We have not noted a significant connection between incidents (i.e. reoccurring instigators at protests, vehicle descriptions)," said the report.

Cmdr. Hicks at the Pentagon says the assessment that the Akron protest posed a threat "was based on the best information available at the time, which was lawfully received from another federal agency." He declines to name the agency. Cmdr. Hicks adds: "The fact that the marches proceeded peacefully is irrelevant to leveling criticisms against the Army in this instance. Hindsight is always 20/20."

Security At Military Bases: A Job For Private Firms? (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK - Since 9/11, private security companies have been guarding some of America's most sensitive military installations, such as Fort Bragg in North Carolina, the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico, and the Picatinny Arsenal in New Jersey.

Now, concerns about accountability and the caliber of the private guards are leading some critics, both inside and outside government, to ask whether this is a job too vital for the military to outsource to civilians.

Concern has escalated since the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported this month that some private contractors had hired felons, had missing and incomplete records, and in one case, had falsified records on weapons and training. At two military bases, the GAO report found, a total of 89 private guards with criminal records were working.

The GAO's conclusion: The Army's screening procedures for the private guards are "inadequate and put the Army at risk," despite previous agency warnings about such problems during the past three years.

The Army, for its part, has pledged to improve management and oversight of private guards.

Those who see merit in contracting out military-base security say the problems are solvable and that, overall, private security guards are as professional and competent as the Army's own personnel. Private guards, they note, are supervised by the Army and trained according to Department of Defense specifications. With Army and National Guard personnel stretched thin by deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, the private companies provide an invaluable service, say supporters of the current system.

Critics, though, doubt the Army's beefed-up oversight will be sufficient, because some of the contract guards work for American subsidiaries of foreign-owned companies. In this age of terrorism and after the Dubai ports flap, they say, American military personnel should provide security at US military bases.

Some homeland security experts see a more fundamental problem. The need to outsource and the subsequent management problems, they say, are indications of the overall stresses the nation's military, security, and law-enforcement agencies face daily as they adapt to the increased demands of the post-9/11 world.

"Security resources are thin in the country right now. They're in demand, and those with advanced skill sets are drawn to the money, and they're going overseas where they can make 100 to 140 percent more," says Edward Clark, founder of Executive Interface, a homeland security risk-management company in Garden City, Mo. "The system is fairly stressed."

Beginning in the 1970s, the US government began to outsource some of its functions - from designing computer systems to selling food in federal buildings - to private contractors. The intent is to save taxpayers' money and make the government more efficient.

But Congress drew the line at military security. In 1982, it prohibited the Defense Department from hiring private security firms at military bases in the United States. Lawmakers were concerned about the "uncertain quality and reliability of private security guard services, base commanders' potential lack of control over contractor personnel, and the right of contractor personnel to strike," according to the GAO.

That changed in the wake of 9/11. Commanders ordered that entrances to all domestic bases, many of which were open to the public, had to be secured. At the same time, military engagement in Afghanistan and then Iraq strained military personnel resources.

In 2003, Congress temporarily lifted its restriction against private security guards. To hire new guards as quickly as possible, especially for the Army, the Defense Department did not put the contracts out to competitive bid, as is usually required to ensure that the government gets the lowest price.

Currently, 57 Army installations use private guards, and 46 of these hired the guards under such sole-source contracts. The GAO concluded these contracts cost 25 percent more than contracts later put out to bid.

Army officials defend sole-source contracts as the fastest way to meet a crucial need, but say that all future contracts will be put out to bid. They also suggest that the GAO report exaggerated the seriousness of the problems it found with screening and training.

"Their overall record has been outstanding," says Ned Christensen, a spokesman for the US Army Installation Management Agency.

Wackenhut Services Inc., a company working under a no-bid contract, insists that most problems the GAO cited were with firms that won the competitive bids, not those who received the sole-source contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0026632

"The comments that are in that report - all of the misrepresentation, all of the failure to properly train - pertain almost specifically and uniquely to the competitively bid piece," says Wackenhut CEO James Long. "My guess is they hopelessly underbid it, couldn't run it without losing their tail, and had to start cutting corners."

But the GAO said it found problems with each company's work.

"The problems were across the board," says Michele Mackin of the GAO. "We found a lack of oversight. The Army really relied on what the contractors said they were doing and provided very little monitoring."

House Weighs Boost In Spy Chief's Budget (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP2, April 26, 2006

The House passed an intelligence bill Wednesday that would dramatically boost the money available to the new spy chief and require the Bush administration to consider blocking the pensions of government leakers.

Democrats made an unsuccessful, last-minute push to block the bill to protest that Republicans wouldn't allow adequate debate on the legality of the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program.

The legislation was nevertheless approved 327-96. It provides budgeting guidelines for 16 U.S. spy agencies and the office of National Intelligence Director John Negroponte.

The bill's total cost is classified, but intelligence agencies' spending is believed to top $40 billion a year. Under the legislation, Negroponte's office would get nearly $1 billion.

Democrats expressed outrage that Republicans would not allow any of their five proposed amendments to be considered by the full House, including measures to expand congressional oversight of the NSA program and the intelligence on Iran.

California Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record), the intelligence committee's top Democrat, supported the bill during the panel's deliberations. Yet she ultimately voted against it, saying intelligence officers aren't served by a bill "that does not protect the Constitution they are fighting to defend."

Republicans insisted on the legality of Bush's surveillance program. House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., said allegations that the operations are abusive or unconstitutional are "absolutely outrageous."

He said he is committed to active oversight on both the NSA and Iran. Hoekstra also said the bill sends a signal that the vision of the intelligence overhaul law in late 2004 "was about building qualitative, better intelligence establishment — and not building a bureaucracy."

One of the Democratic amendments would have required Negroponte to submit to Congress information about Americans who have been the subject of surveillance by the National Security Agency. A second stated that all such surveillance would comply with the Constitution.

A third would have required Negroponte's office to provide the intelligence committees with classified updates on Iran's nuclear program every three months.

The bill provides more than $990 million in the primary account that funds Negroponte's office, which was created to organize the spy agencies under one leader. It is possible other dollars for his office are elsewhere in the bill. Last year, the House approved $446 million for his office, but the bill never became law.

The legislation would limit growth of Negroponte's staff until he explains new personnel needs to Congress. He requested 1,539 people for 2007.

In a bleak assessment, Harman said, "Our intelligence reorganization is in a slow startup, and the CIA is in a free fall," adding that employees with a combined 300 years of experience have left or been pushed out.

The bill would require Negroponte to study administrative punishments for government employees who leak classified information, including the revocation of their pensions.

The administration is trying to crack down on leaks, as seen by last week's firing of CIA officer Mary McCarthy for unauthorized contact with the media. The fate of her pension, after two decades in government, is not clear.

Rep. Rick Renzi (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., offered a resolution that condemns media organizations that profit from disclosures and calls on the president to use his constitutional powers to act against leakers of classified information. The makes made no substantive or practical changes to current law.

Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said, "I think it is obnoxious, but I don't think it will have much of an impact."

The bill also would:

• Expand funding and makes recommendations for intelligence analysis, billion-dollar satellite programs, counterterrorism and training for traditional spycraft. The details were classified.

• Allow the security officers protecting CIA and NSA officials to make arrests when they believe a felony has been committed. The Washington-based Project on Government Oversight raised concerns about potential abuses in domestic law enforcement.

Harman said such powers are comparable to those given to Secret Service and other organizations that protect government officials. Still, Harman said, she hoped more safeguards would be added to prevent possible abuses.

• Require Negroponte's office to provide the intelligence committees with an inventory of all the government's most sensitive operations, such as the NSA's warrantless surveillance program.

The provision, which the House also passed last year but was never made law, comes after Republicans and Democrats complained they were not briefed on the existence or details of the NSA program.

Question Time (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, April 27, 2006

It's not exactly the full-scale congressional inquiry Bush critics have long demanded. But some time fairly soon, members of the Senate Intelligence Committee are going to have an opportunity to grill a senior Central Intelligence Agency official in public and private about the agency's controversial procedures for handling high-level terrorist suspects—and about the CIA's efforts to thwart media leaks.

Congressional staffers are already preparing for hearings the committee is expected to hold on whether the Senate should confirm John Rizzo, a veteran CIA attorney, as the agency's general counsel. President Bush nominated Rizzo to the CIA's top legal post in mid-March. Currently the CIA's senior deputy general counsel, Rizzo has been acting as the agency's top legal adviser after the previous chief lawyer left the agency in August 2004.

Congressional aides said a date for Rizzo's confirmation hearings has not yet been set. However, officials on Capitol Hill and inside the intelligence community said that everyone involved in the confirmation process is aware that the hearings are likely to become a forum in which administration critics, particularly Senate Democrats, can question a senior agency official in detail about contentious CIA procedures for detaining and interrogating prisoners, as well as the agency's practice of "rendition," in which terror suspects are transported by undercover agency operatives to foreign countries. (Domestic and foreign critics say the Bush administration's rendition policies have amounted to the "outsourcing" of torture.)

Senate critics are also likely to ask Rizzo about CIA investigations into alleged media leaks, including the probe that led to the recent firing of veteran CIA analyst Mary McCarthy for alleged unauthorized contacts and discussions of classified information with Washington Post reporter Dana Priest and at least one other journalist. Rizzo could also be asked about whether Congress should take action to plug perceived loopholes in the law currently governing unauthorized disclosures of classified information.

In his current position as CIA senior deputy general counsel, and in his previous job as deputy general counsel for the agency's Operations Division, which conducts clandestine and covert espionage activities, Rizzo was privy to key decisions and legal opinions rendered by CIA and other government lawyers regarding potentially contentious counterterror operations involving the agency, particularly following the 9/11 attacks. Aside from rendition, these operations include the CIA's own use of aggressive, or "enhanced" interrogation techniques—including some alleged techniques that human-rights activists describe as torture—and the agency's operation of what amounts to a secret network of detention centers where it is believed to be holding two to three dozen high-level Al Qaeda detainees, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks.

More than a year ago, Jay Rockefeller, the top Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, demanded that the panel conduct a thorough investigation into the administration's detention, interrogation and rendition policies. However, Senate Republicans, including committee chairman Pat Roberts, have used their majority voting power to block an inquiry.

Republicans now expect Democrats will use the anticipated hearings not only as a forum to question Rizzo about agency practices but also to pressure the administration to make broader disclosures of key legal documents relating to terrorist-prisoner handling procedures. At present, according to one official familiar with the issue, the documents have been sent to the Senate Intelligence Committee on condition that only top committee leaders—Sens. Roberts and Rockefeller—are allowed access to them. Some GOP sources predict Democrats may try to hold up the hearings, or a subsequent vote on Rizzo's confirmation, until more senators are given access to the documentation.

Both Republican and Democratic congressional sources said that despite the top-secret nature of most CIA antiterror operations, at least some of the Rizzo confirmation process is likely to include public hearings at which Rizzo is expected to be questioned on the agency's handling of terror suspects. Although the CIA has never publicly admitted that it engages in rendition, that it has any terror suspects in its custody or that it has been operating secret airlines and detention facilities to hold them, these alleged agency practices have been the subject of extensive news coverage in both U.S. and foreign media.

Alleged CIA leaks are another issue that could produce heated discussions during Rizzo's confirmation proceedings, though much of any questioning on leaks—as well as discussion of the fine detail of agency antiterror operations—is likely to be held by the committee in closed session. One main reason why the committee would deal with the leak question behind closed doors is that while the CIA publicly confirmed the firing of a senior official for alleged unauthorized media contacts and disclosures, the agency has not publicly identified the official for legal reasons. Even though the fired official's lawyer and friends now have confirmed that she is former senior CIA analyst Mary McCarthy, privacy legislation prohibits officials from publicly confirming her identity, and congressional sources said Senate investigators are likely to respect this convention.

One issue related to the administrations antileak campaign that Rizzo may also be questioned about is whether loopholes in current law make it difficult for the government to prosecute officials who leak information about CIA covert actions. According to several official and private legal experts, existing espionage and disclosure laws explicitly provide for the prosecution of people involved in unauthorized disclosure of classified information related to nuclear weapons, communications eavesdropping or the identity of undercover CIA operatives.

Federal espionage law also broadly bans the unauthorized disclosure of classified information relating to "national defense," particularly when there is evidence a foreign power might benefit. But some legal experts say that there is a serious legal question mark over whether details of undercover CIA operations constitute "national defense" information.

In an effort to plug this perceived loophole, both houses of Congress approved an intelligence-bill provision during the final months of the Clinton administration tightening the law to make it clear that prosecutors should be able to go after people involved in the leak of any "properly classified" information. After media organizations protested that approving such legislation would amount to the institution of an American version of Britain's notorious Official Secrets Act—which has allowed authorities to prosecute both government officials who leak and journalists who receive leaks—Clinton vetoed the measure.

Some House Intelligence Committee members have talked recently about reviving the antileak legislation, though congressional sources say that senators—including majority Republicans—are less enthusiastic about moving on this issue. It remains unclear whether the McCarthy firing will add more or less momentum to demands for tighter antileak legislation. Official sources familiar with the McCarthy case say, however, that the vagueness of current espionage law is one reason why they believe prosecutors may have serious problems producing any kind of criminal leak case against McCarthy; it is unclear whether she is even facing a serious criminal investigation.

Even some human-rights advocates acknowledge the current law regarding protection of CIA operations may be too vague. "If they wanted [a new law] on covert operations, they're probably entitled to one," said Morton Halperin, a long-time civil-liberties campaigner and former Clinton White House official.

Deal Reached To End WTC Project Impasse (AP-Y2)

By Amy Westfeldt

AP2, April 26, 2006

Breaking an impasse that threatened to hold up the rebuilding at ground zero, state officials and developer Larry Silverstein reached an agreement Wednesday under which Silverstein gave up control over the planned, 1,776-foot Freedom Tower.

The deal came after months of sometimes-bitter negotiations over the future of the World Trade Center site.

Officials with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the property, had been pressing Silverstein, who holds the 99-year lease on the site, to give up some control over the project. City and state officials had argued that Silverstein lacked the money to build it all and was running the risk of an embarrassing failure.

"With today's agreement, we can now move forward with rebuilding the World Trade Center," Silverstein said. He said the construction trucks will start rolling on Thursday.

Silverstein agreed to give control of the $2.1 billion Freedom Tower and another planned skyscraper to the Port Authority. He will still build three other towers at the site.

Officials said the deal ensures all five planned towers will be built by 2012.

"We have an agreed-upon framework and we can move forward," Gov. George Pataki said. "This is the last stumbling block to putting shovels in the ground" on the Freedom Tower, the skyscraper that will rise on the site of the twin towers.

Pataki said the plan "will make certain that the rebuilt World Trade Center will anchor the financial capital of the world and make our nation proud."

A Change Of Course At Ground Zero (NYT)

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

On Tuesday, New York City heard some of the best news it's had about Lower Manhattan in the past four years. Larry Silverstein, the developer who held the lease on the World Trade Center when it was attacked, announced that he would accept a deal that would reduce his role at ground zero and clear the way for the Port Authority to build some version of the Freedom Tower.

The devil, as always, is in the details, but the Port Authority affirmed yesterday that it, too, was ready to sign the agreement, in which Mr. Silverstein cedes control over a third of the site but retains the right to build on three of the most valuable parcels.

The widespread relief over this agreement is a perfect testament to how badly blocked the redevelopment effort in Lower Manhattan has been in the last two years. There have been many obstructions, including Mr. Silverstein himself. After months of negotiations, the mayor and the governors of New York and New Jersey lined up solidly against the developer last week and offered him two good options and one solid deadline. Mr. Silverstein did the right thing by accepting one of these options, which should turn out to be a profitable deal, not only for his own company but also for the public.

And now for the Freedom Tower. In a sense, this agreement brings us full circle — not to Sept. 11, 2001, but to the early 1960's, when the Port Authority was preparing to build the World Trade Center. Nothing seems to come easily at ground zero, yet it's possible now to hope that the public's interests and the interests of the developer of the Freedom Tower — whatever form that building finally takes — are likely to be roughly synonymous. The Port Authority's new role will also help clarify and perhaps speed up the financing for the 9/11 memorial, which should be the top priority for us all.

A Plan To Rebuild By 2012, And Doubts On The Big Rush (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The new plan for ground zero calls for the accelerated construction of a sprawling commercial complex: 8.8 million square feet of office space in four towers 58 to 70 stories high. All would open within a year of each other, by 2012.

Gov. George E. Pataki and others say the conceptual plan, officially approved yesterday by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey after months of gridlock, will rejuvenate Lower Manhattan and ensure that it remains the financial capital of the world.

But some construction and real estate industry executives, and some urban planners, hear echoes of the hoopla surrounding the original World Trade Center project more than 30 years ago. They are questioning whether the rapid building of so much speculative office space would have the same destabilizing consequences for the downtown market as the twin towers had in the 1970's.

Some experts are even wondering whether there will be enough steel, concrete and curtain wall to build the four towers by 2012 at the same time that two baseball stadiums, the $2 billion Goldman Sachs headquarters, the $1.7 billion expansion of the Jacob K. Javits Convention Center, Moynihan Station, 10,000 apartments and various subway projects are under construction.

Yesterday, the influential Regional Plan Association and the Fiscal Policy Institute welcomed the plan, but they, like many developers, continued to question the wisdom of building the tallest of the skyscrapers, the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower, intended to be a symbol of the city's resilience.

They said the tower would stand too far from public transportation and was unlikely to attract corporate tenants, who view it as a potential terrorist target. Some government officials suggested that the site be brought up to street level and then put into mothballs next year.

"The Freedom Tower is a disastrous idea that should be scratched," said Susan S. Fainstein, a professor of urban planning at Columbia University.

Kathryn S. Wylde, president of the Partnership for New York City, was far more upbeat. "This agreement will provide a significant boost to the economy of Lower Manhattan by eliminating much of the uncertainty regarding the area's economic future," she said, adding that businesses would be lured by the neighborhood's comparatively low business costs.

But one thing is certain: the cost of the buildings, now estimated at $6.3 billion, is going to jump. Jones Lang LaSalle, the real estate company advising the Port Authority, has built inflation into the numbers. Construction costs are continuing to escalate, at the rate of 1 percent a month.

"I don't know how long it'll continue," said Frank J. Sciame, the former chairman of the New York Building Congress, "but that's the case for the next year or two."

The World Trade Center, a 10 million-square-foot office complex built by the Port Authority, opened in late 1970 during one of the worst real estate markets since the Depression. To provide anchor tenants for the 110-story towers, state agencies moved into two million square feet of space in one tower, and the Port Authority took 900,000 square feet in the second.

The trade center also offered subsidized rents to lure tenants out of surrounding buildings, angering local landlords.

It was not until the mid-1980's that the state began relocating to other buildings. And a breakthrough came in 1985, when Dean Witter Financial Services leased 24 floors in Tower 2, opening the way for other financial firms. Still, occupancy fluctuated wildly until 1998, when companies fleeing high rents in Midtown pushed the occupancy rate to 98 percent.

In late 2002, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg outlined his vision for downtown and drew on some of the lessons of the trade center. He said that it made no sense to rush ahead to rebuild the 10 million square feet of lost office space.

"If we are honest with ourselves," he said, "we will recognize that the impact on our city was not all positive. The twin towers' voracious appetite for tenants weakened the entire downtown market."

But last fall, Mr. Bloomberg started calling for the ground zero project to accelerate. And the plan approved yesterday moves the completion date for the four office towers to 2012, from 2015.

Government agencies — city, state, federal and the Port Authority — are expected to account for 25 percent of the 8.8 million square feet, only slightly less space than they took up in the twin towers in 1972.

"The need to relocate government offices to the World Trade Center in the 1970's was a sign of the economic failure of that project," said David Dyssegaard Kallick, a senior fellow at the Fiscal Policy Institute. "It would make more sense to ensure that we fully fund the public spaces, like the memorial and the performing arts center. Then, allow for the gradual development of the office space with market demand."

One downtown landlord, who expects to lose his government tenant to the new trade center complex, said, "They're about to make the same mistake they did in the 1970's."

The executive, who was granted anonymity because he did not want to damage his relationship with his largest tenant, a government agency, predicted: "They'll pull all the city, state and federal agencies out of other buildings and put them in there. It'll take a long time for other owners to relet their buildings."

Barry M. Gosin, chief executive of Newmark Knight Frank, a real estate firm, also said the timetable was too short. "They'll be competing with themselves," he said. "They should leave a few sites zoned and ready to go when demand dictates."

But Bill Rudin, a third-generation developer and a major downtown landlord, said that his family was one of the few in real estate who supported the trade center in 1970, and that he supported the new ground zero plan. He said that while a few downtown companies would move to the new towers, most would come from outside the area.

"There is a need for this type of space," he said. "In the last year or so, we've seen Midtown tighten and companies being priced out. Where are they going to but downtown?"

Mayor Bloomberg said yesterday that he was still concerned about building all four towers simultaneously, which "may very well lead to too much office space coming on the market at one time." But, he added, the empty holes at the trade center site have become a "great disincentive to rent downtown."

"On balance," the mayor said, "I'd just as soon get everything going."

Still, it may be physically impossible to build all four towers by 2012, as well as the memorial, the museum, the $2 billion PATH terminal and other nearby projects. Even before the accelerated schedule, Charles J. Maikish, executive director of the Lower Manhattan Construction Command Center, estimated that there would be 10,000 to 15,000 construction workers a day on ground zero projects over the next three to five years.

The trade center site will be competing for materials and labor with a dozen other major projects, including the extension of the No. 7 subway line on the West Side and the construction of the Second Avenue Subway on the East Side.

United 93 (WSJ)

By David Beamer

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

The calendar says it's April 25, 2006. At noon, my wife, Peggy, and I are walking around Battery Park -- near the Tribeca area -- in New York. It is our first time. The flowers are blooming; kids are fishing; people boarding the ferry to Ellis Island and the Statue of Liberty. Kids are laughing and noisy. The sun is shining. The vendors are hawking T-shirts, pretzels and some "designer" wares. And just up the street there is a hole in the skyline and in the ground.

In the park, there is a memorial with walls standing tall. Walls filled with so many names of those who gave their all in the Atlantic in World War II. How fitting that the names are here to honor those who gave their lives to enable this fun, this laughter -- on this sunny day. The sights and sounds of freedom continue.

Fast forward -- it is 10:30 p.m., April 25. We have just seen a movie premiere at the fifth annual Tribeca Film Festival. A film festival that has done so much to energize and revitalize the city, its people and especially the area that has that hole in the skyline and in the ground. This year the movie that had its worldwide premiere at the festival is titled "United 93." It is about the day when the hole in the skyline of New York was made -- the day when a hole was made in the side of the Pentagon near Washington, D.C. -- the day when a hole was made in a quiet mountain meadow in Pennsylvania. The day that our nation was attacked; the day when the war came home -- Sept. 11, 2001. The day our son Todd boarded United 93.

Paul Greengrass and Universal set out to tell the story of United Flight 93 on that terrible day in our nation's history. They set about the task of telling this story with a genuine intent to get it right -- the actions of those on board and honor their memory. Their extensive research included reaching out to all the families who had lost loved ones on United Flight 93 as the first casualties of this war. And Paul and his team got it right.

There are those who question the timing of this project and the painful memories it evokes. Clearly, the film portrays the reality of the attack on our homeland and its terrible consequences. Often we attend movies to escape reality and fantasize a bit. In this case and at this time, it is appropriate to get a dose of reality about this war and the real enemy we face. It is not too soon for this story to be told, seen and heard. But it is too soon for us to become complacent. It is too soon for us to think of this war in only national terms. We need to be mindful that this enemy, who made those holes in our landscape and caused the deaths of some 3,000 of our fellow free people, has a vision to personally kill or convert each and every one of us. This film reminds us that this war is personal. This enemy is on a fanatical mission to take away our lives and liberty -- the liberty that has been secured for us by those whose names are on those walls in Battery Park and so many other walls and stones throughout this nation. This enemy seeks to take away the free will that our Creator has endowed in us. Patrick Henry got it right some 231 years ago. Living without liberty is not living at all.

The passengers and crew of United 93 had the blessed opportunity to understand the nature of the attack and to launch a counterattack against the enemy. This was our first successful counterattack in our homeland in this new global war -- World War III.

This film further reminds us of the nature of the enemy we face. An enemy who will stop at nothing to achieve world domination and force a life devoid of freedom upon all. Their methods are inhumane and their targets are the innocent and unsuspecting. We call this conflict the "War on Terror." This film is a wake-up call. And although we abhor terrorism as a tactic, we are at war with a real enemy and it is personal.

There are those who would hope to escape the pain of war. Can't we just live and let live and pretend everything is OK? Let's discuss, negotiate, reason together. The film accurately shows an enemy who will stop at nothing in a quest for control. This enemy does not seek our resources, our land or our materials, but rather to alter our very way of life.

I encourage my fellow Americans and free people everywhere to see "United 93."

Be reminded of our very real enemy. Be inspired by a true story of heroic actions taken by ordinary people with victorious consequences. Be thankful for each precious day of life with a loved one and make the most of it. Resolve to take the right action in the situations of life, whatever they may be. Resolve to give thanks and support to those men, women, leaders and commanders who to this day (1,687 days since Sept. 11, 2001) continue the counterattacks on our enemy and in so doing keep us safe and our freedoms intact.

May the taste of freedom for people of the Middle East hasten victory. The enemy we face does not have the word "surrender" in their dictionary. We must not have the word "retreat" in ours. We surely want our troops home as soon as possible. That said, they cannot come home in retreat. They must come home victoriously. Pray for them.

Mr. Beamer is the father of Todd Beamer, a passenger on United Airlines Flight 93.

Senate Report Urges Dismantling Of FEMA (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Hurricane Katrina exposed flaws in the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Department of Homeland Security that are "too substantial to mend," and FEMA should be dismantled and rebuilt inside the troubled department, according to the final report by Senate investigators.

The report, to be released to key senators today and to the public next week, makes 86 recommendations that would undo major changes made when President Bush and Congress launched the department in 2003, and would reverse parts of a reorganization ordered by Secretary Michael Chertoff last summer. It stops short of restoring FEMA to independent, Cabinet-level status, as many in Congress and former agency directors want, but would promote its chief to confer directly with the president in a crisis, according to a summary released to news organizations.

The 800-plus-page report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," incorporates many findings by earlier House and White House investigations but goes further in recommending structural changes in how all levels of government -- especially the Homeland Security Department -- respond to catastrophes.

It would replace FEMA with a new National Preparedness and Response Authority whose head would report to the secretary but serve as the president's top adviser for national emergency management, akin to the military role served by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It would reunify disaster preparedness and response activities that Chertoff decoupled, and restore grant-making authority taken away by Congress in redefining a stronger national preparedness system with regional coordinators, a larger role for the National Guard and the Defense Department and more money for training, planning and exercises.

"We have concluded that FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair, and that it should be abolished," Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) said in a written statement released by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which held 22 hearings, interviewed more than 320 people and reviewed more than 838,000 pages of documents.

The report by the 16-member panel formally kicks off a frenzied effort by Congress to make fixes before the June 1 start of hurricane season. By framing the debate around FEMA's fate, the report defers to President Bush's request to not carve it out of the Homeland Security Department even as it faults his administration, among 24 findings, for failing to fund and coordinate disaster readiness efforts after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and for emphasizing terrorism at the expense of natural disaster preparedness. The administration was also faulted for bungling the storm response by neglecting warnings, failing to grasp Katrina's destructiveness, doing too little or taking the wrong steps before the Aug. 29 landfall. The report also found design flaws in New Orleans levees and failures by city and state leaders.

The Senate report said making FEMA independent would "do nothing to solve the key problems that Katrina has revealed, including a lack of resources and weak and ineffective leadership," and could lead to wasteful duplication.

The Senate report is the only bipartisan national inquiry into the storm, which killed 1,330 people, displaced 1 million families, swamped 80 percent of New Orleans and led to a $100 billion federal response. House Democrats boycotted their chamber's effort, fearing a partisan whitewash, and called for an independent panel styled after the one that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. Afterward, several Democrats said its findings were complete, but should have called for Chertoff's removal.

Yesterday, the ranking Democrat on Collins's committee, Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) added a written statement excoriating Bush and his aides for being "surprisingly detached" before and just after the storm and for not cooperating with Senate investigators, who he said should have subpoenaed the White House.

"The President failed to provide critical leadership when it was most needed, and that contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response to Hurricane Katrina," Lieberman said.

As Bush headed to the Gulf Coast today, White House spokesman Scott McClellan reiterated the administration's stance to keep FEMA "where it is."

Rep. David G. Reichert (R-Wash.), who chairs a House Homeland Security subcommittee, has proposed reuniting disaster preparedness and response functions within FEMA, which Chertoff split up in a reorganization of the Homeland Security Department. A bipartisan group of committee leaders warned April 12 that "removing FEMA from DHS would only exacerbate the agency's problems" with hurricane season starting June 1.

But Rep. William Shuster (R-Pa.), chairman of a House Transportation and Infrastructure subcommittee, would make FEMA independent, as would Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), head of the Government Reform Committee.

Panel Urges Ending FEMA (BRA)

By Gerard Shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — After what is considered an exhaustive investigation into the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, a Senate committee is recommending abolishing the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Over the past seven months, the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee has examined 830,000 documents, interviewed 320 witnesses and held 22 hearings involving the testimony of 85 people.

In a copy of a report to be released today and obtained by The Advocate, the committee makes 86 recommendations, including the establishment of a new federal disaster agency.

"We have concluded that FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair and that it should be abolished," Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, says in a statement.

FEMA officials dismissed the recommendation.

"It's time to stop playing with (organizational) charts," FEMA spokesman Russ Knocke said. "We're intensely focused on the coming storm season."

The ranking Democrat on the committee, U.S. Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., accused President Bush of failing to provide critical leadership in the days after the hurricane and of being "surprisingly detached" from the disaster.

Lieberman, in a statement, also criticizes the Bush administration for failing to cooperate with the committee probe, saying that the White House should have been subpoenaed.

White House spokesman Blair C. Jones disagreed, noting that administration officials such as Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff appeared before the committee.

"The president said he was not satisfied with the federal response to Hurricane Katrina," Jones said. "He demanded that we learn from the lessons of the response and take every action to make sure America is better prepared."

The White House will consider the committee's recommendations, Jones said.

The new agency called for by the committee would be named the National Preparedness and Response Authority and would be an independent entity within the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, similar to the U.S. Coast Guard or U.S. Secret Service.

The committee resisted taking FEMA out of DHS and restoring it to a Cabinet position as some former FEMA directors have called for.

"Katrina has made it clear that we need more integration in federal preparedness and response, not less," the report says.

The agency director would serve as a deputy secretary but with a direct line of communication to the president during catastrophes. The director and three deputies should also have emergency-management backgrounds, the report recommends. Former FEMA Director Michael Brown was criticized for lacking emergency-management experience.

The agency would have 10 regional offices responsible for creating regional strike forces to handle natural disasters. "Most of the essential work of emergency management does not happen in Washington, D.C.," the report says.

The report calls on the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to coordinate responsibility for maintaining the levee system surrounding New Orleans. The levees breached after Hurricane Katrina struck on Aug. 29, causing widespread flooding and the deaths of an estimated 1,300 people.

Citing poor information relayed to the Homeland Security Operations Center, particularly when the New Orleans levees broke, the report recommends a consolidation of the center with the National Response Coordination Center and the Interagency Incident Management Group into a National Operations Center.

The report also recommends:

Establishing local advisory councils to the new national agency.

Encouraging the federal government to tap into private-sector resources. "After Katrina struck, private companies and their employees provided important and even life-saving relief to citizens across the Gulf Coast region."

Better coordination between the Department of Defense and DHS, including their inventories of assets. "Such assets may include, for example, utility and heavy-lift helicopters, medium-lift helicopters capable of performing search and rescue."

Having DHS establish data-sharing agreements with other federal agencies to ensure that disaster victims registering for assistance use a valid Social Security number.

Establishing pre-arranged contracts to procure goods such as food, ice and water.

Having the new agency implement regional interoperable communications networks to enable crippled radios to operate off towers that have survived a disaster.

Having the federal Department of Transportation play a larger role in evacuations when state and local capabilities are hampered.

Having the Department of Defense establish an officer in the new agency. Although criticizing federal agencies, the report notes that state and local communities remain the front lines of disaster response.

"The pattern over the last three years of steadily declining funds for homeland security and local preparedness needs to be reversed," the report says. It also recommends:

Having state emergency preparedness officials complete an audit once a year, reporting to the governor, and develop estimates of populations that will require short-term shelter, particularly for special-needs residents.

Having state agencies responsible for licensing hospitals and nursing homes ensure that the facilities have evacuation plans, and audit them annually.

Having state responders invest in satellite phones that can operate in disasters.

Senate Inquiry Concludes FEMA Should Be Abolished (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's disaster response agency should be abolished and rebuilt from scratch to avoid a repeat of multiple government failures exposed by Hurricane Katrina, a Senate inquiry has concluded.

Crippled by years of poor leadership and inadequate funding, the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot be fixed, a bipartisan investigation says in recommendations to be released Thursday.

Though short on specifics, such as funding levels, the 86 proposed reforms suggest the U.S. is still woefully unprepared for a disaster of Katrina's magnitude.

The recommendations, obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press, are the product of a seven-month investigation to be detailed in a Senate report to released next week. It follows similar inquiries by the House and White House and comes in an election year in which Democrats have seized on Katrina to attack the Bush administration.

President Bush will visit Louisiana and Mississippi -- which bore the brunt of Katrina's wrath -- on Thursday.

"The United States was, and is, ill-prepared to respond to a catastrophic event of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina," the recommendations warned. "Catastrophic events are, by their nature, difficult to imagine and to adequately plan for, and the existing plans and training proved inadequate in Katrina."

The inquiry urges yet another overhaul of the beleaguered Homeland Security Department -- FEMA's parent agency -- which was created three years ago and already has undergone major restructuring of duties and responsibilities.

It proposes creating a new agency, called the National Preparedness and Response Authority, that would plan and carry out relief missions for domestic disasters. Unlike now, the authority would have a direct line of communication with the president during major crises, and any dramatic cuts to its budget or staffing levels would have to be approved by Congress.

It would also oversee efforts to protect critical infrastructure such as buildings, roads and power systems, as well as Homeland Security's medical officer. But the inquiry calls for keeping the agency within Homeland Security, waning that making it an independent office would cut it off from resources the larger department could provide.

Senate Panel Recommends Abolishing FEMA (AP)

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's beleaguered disaster response agency should be abolished and rebuilt from scratch to avoid a repeat of multiple government failures exposed by Hurricane Katrina, a Senate inquiry has concluded.

Crippled by years of poor leadership and inadequate funding, the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot be fixed, a bipartisan investigation says in recommendations to be released Thursday.

Taken together, the 86 proposed reforms charge the United States is still woefully unprepared for a disaster such as Katrina with the start of the hurricane season a little more than month away.

"The United States was, and is, ill-prepared to respond to a catastrophic event of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina," the recommendations warn. "Catastrophic events are, by their nature, difficult to imagine and to adequately plan for, and the existing plans and training proved inadequate in Katrina."

The recommendations, obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press, are the product of a seven-month investigation detailed in a Senate report to be released next week. It follows similar inquiries by the House and White House and comes in an election year in which Democrats have seized on Katrina to attack the Bush administration.

President Bush will visit Louisiana and Mississippi _ which bore the brunt of Katrina's wrath _ on Thursday.

Katrina, which hit last Aug. 29, was one of the worst natural disasters in U.S. history. The storm and its aftershocks killed more than 1,300 people in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, left hundreds of thousands of people homeless and caused tens of billions of dollars in damage.

The Senate report urges yet another overhaul of the embattled Homeland Security Department _ FEMA's parent agency _ which was created three years ago and already has undergone major restructuring of duties.

It chiefly calls for a new agency, called the National Preparedness and Response Authority, to plan and carry out relief missions for domestic disasters. Unlike now, the authority would communicate directly with the president during major crises, and any dramatic cuts to budget or staffing levels would have to be approved by Congress. But it would remain within Homeland Security to continue receiving resources provided by the larger department.

The proposal drew disdain from Homeland Security and its critics, both sides questioning the need for another bureaucratic shuffling that they said wouldn't accomplish much.

"It's time to stop playing around with the organizational charts and to start focusing on government, at all levels, that are preparing for this storm season," said Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke.

Former FEMA director Michael Brown said the new agency would basically have the same mission FEMA had a year ago, before its disaster planning responsibilities were taken away to focus solely on responding to calls for help.

"It sounds like they're just re-creating the wheel and making it look like they're calling for change," Brown said. "If indeed that's all they're doing, they owe more than that to the American public."

But Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, who led the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee inquiry, said the new agency would be "better equipped with the tools to prepare for and respond to a disaster."

Describing FEMA as a "shambles and beyond repair," she said the reforms "will help ensure that we do not have a repeat of the failures following Hurricane Katrina."

Written in matter-of-fact terms, the recommendations do not place blame on any official or government agency. But a spokeswoman for Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the Senate panel, said he will file "additional views" to the report accusing Bush of failing "to provide critical leadership when it was most needed."

"That contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response to Hurricane Katrina," Lieberman said in a statement.

The House report, issued in February, similarly criticized Bush, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and FEMA's Brown for moving too slowly to trigger federal relief. The White House report, which came a week later, took a softer tone and singled out the Homeland Security Department for most of the breakdowns.

Many of the rest of the Senate recommendations were far less dramatic, ranging from creating a Homeland Security Academy to encouraging plans to evacuate and shelter pets during a disaster.

Without specifying where the money would come from or how much was needed, the recommendations call for more funding for disaster planning and response at all levels of government. They also urge clarifying levee maintenance responsibilities _ a concern because of structural weaknesses of the New Orleans' flood walls that spawned deadly floods after Katrina hit_ and suggested better contracting procedures to avoid waste or fraud in the rush to get aid to disaster victims.

The Senate plans were issued as Congress' investigative arm predicted FEMA is destined to repeat million-dollar mistakes of disaster aid waste and fraud unless it quickly can establish controls for verifying names and addresses.

Gregory Kutz, managing director of special investigations for the Government Accountability Office, said he has little confidence that FEMA will be ready by June 1 start of the hurricane season to safeguard taxpayer dollars should a disaster like Katrina strike again.

A FEMA spokesman said agency officials are working hard to improve and tighten controls in its disaster aid program.

'Abolish' FEMA, Says Bipartisan Senate Panel (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Senate report coming out today says the Federal Emergency Management Agency is a failure and should be replaced with a more powerful disaster-response agency.

"FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair," Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the homeland security committee, said in a statement. "It should be abolished."

DOJ_NMG_0026643

That's the top recommendation of Collins' committee, which held 22 hearings and reviewed 838,000 pages of documents in a seven-month probe of the government's response to Hurricane Katrina. USA TODAY received a copy of the report's recommendations, to be made public today.

The committee is proposing that a new National Preparedness and Response Authority (NPRA) be created in the Homeland Security Department with a leader who answers directly to the department secretary.

The NPRA would be "a powerful new organization that can confront the challenges of manmade or natural catastrophes," the Senate report says.

Homeland Security said a new agency is not needed.

"It is time to stop playing around with organizational charts and start focusing on how governments at all levels are preparing for the fast-approaching storm season," spokesman Russ Knocke said.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the committee, said the investigation revealed broad leadership lapses.

"The president failed to provide critical leadership when it was most needed," he said. "And that contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response to Hurricane Katrina."

The Senate report follows others from the House and the White House. Those reports criticized FEMA but did not suggest abolishing the agency.

Among the Senate report's 86 recommendations:

• Create regional "strike teams" to respond to disasters.

• Build a governmentwide operations center to coordinate disaster response.

• Develop more full-time staff and contracts with companies to provide goods and services when storms hit.

Dismantle FEMA, Senate Investigators Conclude (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Emergency Management Agency botched the response to Hurricane Katrina so badly that it should be dismantled, Senate investigators have determined after a seven-month inquiry.

"We have concluded that FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair and that it should be abolished," Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee said Wednesday night in a written statement.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's ranking Democrat, also faulted President Bush for his lack of action during the crisis and for not cooperating with the committee's investigation.

"For Hurricane Katrina, the president failed to provide critical leadership when it was most needed, and that contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response," he said in a statement.

The committee's report, scheduled for release to senators Thursday and to the public next week, recommends replacing FEMA with a new National Preparedness and Response Authority, which would remain in the Department of Homeland Security. Its director would have direct access to the president during disasters, much as the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff provides information and advice during times of military crisis.

FEMA had been an independent -- and highly regarded -- agency until March 2003, when the Department of Homeland Security was created in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. Designed to get all domestic security programs under one department, it combined 22 disparate agencies with more than 170,000 employees.

Although the Senate inquiry calls for a restructuring of disaster operations, it concludes that keeping such an relief agency within Homeland Security is necessary because it "allows the new organization to take full advantage of the substantial range of resources DHS has at its disposal," including the Coast Guard and national communications systems.

Restoring FEMA to its independent role -- as many critics of the Katrina response have advocated -- "would do nothing to solve the key problems that Katrina has revealed, including a lack of resources and weak and ineffective leadership," the committee found.

Several House members -- including Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., chairman of the House Government Reform Committee -- have called for FEMA to stand alone. Asked about their proposal, White House press secretary Scott McClellan told reporters Wednesday that "we support (FEMA) being where it is."

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke also rejected the idea of separation. "It's time to stop playing around with the organizational charts and to start focusing on government, at all levels, that are preparing for this storm season," he said Wednesday night.

The Senate committee is the only bipartisan panel to investigate the failure of the government response to Hurricane Katrina, which killed more than 1,300 people along the Gulf Coast, left hundreds of thousands homeless and caused tens of billions of dollars in damages in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. The committee conducted 22 hearings, interviewed more than 300 people involved in the response to the storm and reviewed nearly 1 million pages of documents.

Fearing that it would be a whitewash, Democrats boycotted a similar House committee inquiry, though two Louisiana Democratic congressmen participated informally and the results were generally agreed to be thorough. The White House also conducted its own in-house investigation, which placed much of the blame for the failed response on state officials.

The release of the Senate committee's 800-page report comes as Bush travels to Louisiana on Thursday and as agencies grapple with being ready for the official start of hurricane season on June 1.

The committee is issuing 86 recommendations for righting the fissures exposed by the Katrina response. The recommendations, obtained by The Times, include:

--Creating regional strike teams and operations to better coordinate with federal agencies.

--Building "a true, government-wide operations center " to provide up-to-date information.

--Fully funding the emergency agency "commensurate with the significance of its mission."

--Developing mass evacuation plans.

Among its 24 findings, the Senate report accuses the Bush administration of focusing on terrorism at the expense of disaster preparedness and of failing to adequately fund disaster response plans following the terrorist attacks.

The committee lays blame in all directions -- faulting the design and construction of the levees in New Orleans as well as the failure of officials at all levels, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and then-FEMA director Michael Brown, to grasp the severity of the storm.

"Secretary Chertoff himself should have been more engaged in preparations over the weekend before landfall," says the report, adding that had he invoked the Catastrophic Incident Annex, which puts federal response to a catastrophe into overdrive, it would have triggered a more robust response.

As for Brown, whom Bush first complimented -- "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" -- and later fired, the committee finds that he "lacked the leadership skills that were needed for his critical position."

Senate Committee Leaders Urge FEMA Dismantling (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 —The Federal Emergency Management Agency was so fundamentally dysfunctional during Hurricane Katrina that Congress should abolish it and create a new disaster response agency from scratch, according to a draft of bipartisan recommendations proposed by a Senate committee.

The new agency, which would still be part of the Department of Homeland Security, should be more powerful, with additional components that would give it a budget twice as big as FEMA's, the report's draft recommendations say.

It would assume functions spread throughout the department, like preparing for disasters or terrorist attacks, protecting the nation's infrastructure and distributing grants to state and local governments.

And during major catastrophes like Hurricane Katrina, the agency's director would report directly to the president.

FEMA today has a budget of $4.8 billion, and 2,600 full-time employees.

Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who is chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said the new agency would be "better equipped with the tools to prepare for and respond to a disaster."

DOJ_NMG_0026645

The committee's ranking Democrat, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, also endorsed creation of what would be called the National Preparedness and Response Authority. But the full committee has not yet debated or voted on the draft recommendations.

The report has also not yet been shared with the Bush administration. But officials at the Department of Homeland Security said that from what they had already heard, they were not impressed.

"It is time to stop rearranging organization charts and start focusing on how governments at all levels are preparing for the fast-approaching storm season," said Russ Knocke, the department press secretary.

Since Hurricane Katrina hit, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, has been working on his own alternative to the agency's current structure, which he has described as "retooling" FEMA. That has meant bringing in professional disaster managers to replace the former director Michael D. Brown and other senior officials, many of whom had little emergency management experience.

Mr. Chertoff has also moved to fill hundreds of other vacant jobs, establish a better disaster-resistant communications system and set up a way to ensure that the agency can more rapidly deliver emergency supplies.

The proposal by the Senate committee leaders will join others now before Congress. Bills are pending that would keep FEMA intact, but remove it from the Homeland Security Department and have the director report directly to the president, as was the case before the department was created after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Separately, Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, in a report released in February called for other agencies to pick up certain responsibilities now assigned to homeland security, like providing temporary housing to disaster victims.

Bruce Baughman, the director of emergency management for the state of Alabama and the president of the National Emergency Management Association, said that despite the bureaucratic-sounding nature of the Senate committee's draft recommendations, he believed they would create a more capable agency.

"Whatever the hell you call it, FEMA or National Preparedness and Response Authority, it does not matter," Mr. Baughman said. "But what this does is it ties all the pieces together."

Mr. Lieberman, in a statement, said the Senate investigation, which was based on 22 hearings with testimony by 85 witnesses and the assembly of 830,000 pages of documents, reached the same conclusion as a separate House investigation: that the response to Hurricane Katrina was flawed at all levels of government.

"For years, government officials at all levels neglected their duties to prepare for a forewarned catastrophe," he said, adding, "These failures cost lives and multiplied the anguish of the storm's survivors."

The draft recommendations also call for the creation of "strike teams" that would be set up in 10 regional offices now run by FEMA that would be made up of disaster experts from the new national preparedness agency, as well as officials from the Defense Department and other federal agencies that would train together with local and state governments to prepare for a possible natural disaster or terrorist strike.

Ms. Collins and Mr. Lieberman, who in 2004 helped lead a similar restructuring of the management of the nation's intelligence agencies, said the recreated agency at homeland security would have the authority and resources needed to lead a response by the full federal government to a disaster, instead of seeing itself pushed to the side, as FEMA was after Hurricane Katrina.

FEMA was created in 1979 by President Jimmy Carter in an effort to better unify the nation's fragmented disaster response programs. Today, it is charged with providing food, water and cash aid to victims and then helping people figure out temporary living arrangements while they rebuild their homes.

It is also supposed to lead the recovery effort by helping state and local governments rebuild roads, bridges, hospitals and other government buildings, preferably in a way that makes the new neighborhoods less prone to similar disasters in the future.

In about 20,000 communities, FEMA also runs the federal government's flood insurance program, which is supposed to be self-sufficient, but which the government now must bail out because the claims from Hurricane Katrina are so enormous.

Mr. Lieberman, in remarks that have not been endorsed by Ms. Collins, said the investigation only further documented how the White House was not fully focused when Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, with the president on vacation in Texas and traveling on the West Coast.

"Before landfall, the president should have returned to Washington, D.C., convened the cabinet, taken stock of the federal government's readiness for Katrina, made sure key White House staff were at their posts before landfall, and directly addressed the people of the Gulf Coast," Mr. Lieberman said in a statement.

Senators: FEMA Can't Be Fixed, So Replace It (USAT)

GAO: FEMA Still Not Set To Stop Aid Waste (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, April 26, 2006

With hurricane season approaching, FEMA is destined to repeat million-dollar mistakes of disaster aid waste and fraud unless it can quickly establish controls for verifying names and addresses, congressional investigators say.

Gregory Kutz, managing director of special investigations for the Government Accountability Office, said he has little confidence that FEMA will be ready by June 1 to safeguard taxpayer dollars should a major disaster like Hurricane Katrina strike again.

"They're not close to where they need to be," Kutz said this week in a telephone interview that previewed a GAO report. The report, which covers FEMA's $2,000 debit cards and other emergency cash assistance, is to be released next month.

"There's a lot of heavy lifting required to put an effective fraud prevention system in place by this summer. It will take years," said Kutz, who is heading the audit. "You need to have a mechanism in place and field test it. FEMA doesn't have one."

Responding to the audit, FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said Wednesday that FEMA officials have been working hard to improve and tighten controls in its disaster aid program.

In the past, the agency has said its procedures were necessary to expedite aid and that it would be "extremely disingenuous" to suggest aid is distributed without housing inspections and several other layers of verification.

"We are confident in our ability to verify disaster victims' identities," Walker said.

The GAO's recommendations include:

_Install a reliable system to match Social Security numbers with names of people who apply for aid over the phone and Internet.

In a preliminary audit released in February, the GAO found that up to 900,000 of the 2.5 million applicants who received aid under the emergency cash assistance program after Katrina hit Aug. 29 were based on duplicate or invalid Social Security numbers, or false addresses and names.

Kutz said the GAO's review determined the contractor hired by FEMA to verify identities — ChoicePoint Inc. of Alpharetta, Ga. — was ineffective. That was partly because its system didn't keep track of people who applied over the Internet with false information and were rejected, allowing many of them to try again and get the aid when they applied over the phone.

Responding to the GAO, ChoicePoint spokesman Matt Furman said his company's contract is limited to verifying applications over the Internet and not by telephone. "That criticism should not be directed toward us," he said.

_Establish a system that can quickly and effectively verify property addresses to see if they match up with the accompanying name and Social Security number as well as whether they fall within the disaster-stricken area. In several cases, individuals applied for Katrina aid under several different bogus addresses to fraudulently obtain multiple payments.

_Provide instructions and guidelines to recipients who receive aid through debit cards on how the money should be used. Such information is already provided with the traditional form of aid payment through checks, according to the GAO.

The GAO's previous audit found that recipients improperly used their debit cards intended for food and shelter for $400 massages, a $450 tattoo, a $1,100 diamond engagement ring and $150 worth of products at "Condoms to Go."

In recent weeks, FEMA has sought to crack down on those who received erroneous payments, sending letters to thousands of Gulf Coast residents demanding repayment of amounts ranging from $2,000 to $26,200 for aid that it said was excessive or unjustified.

While Kutz praised the move, he said efforts to recoup the money are no substitute for internal controls since they generally recover no more than 1 percent to 2 percent of the wasted aid. He said the agency must first identify the fraudulent payments, then locate the recipients and hope they do the right thing and return the money.

In the coming months, the GAO plans to expand its waste review to FEMA's housing assistance as well as aid improperly paid out for damage already covered by property insurance. He believes millions of dollars of additional waste have yet to be found.

In February, the GAO estimated the waste so far in roughly $7 billion in disaster aid alone could be in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

"Any projection we make will probably understate the actual waste," Kutz said.

Evacuees Find Housing Grants Will End Soon (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON, April 21 — Thousands of hurricane evacuees who counted on a year of free housing and utilities are being told by the Federal Emergency Management Agency that they are no longer eligible for such help and must either pay the rent themselves or leave.

Of about 55,000 families who were given long-term housing vouchers, nearly a third are receiving notices that they no longer qualify, FEMA officials said. For the rest, benefits are also being cut: they will have to sign new leases, pay their own gas and electric bills and requalify for rental assistance every three months.

The process has been marked by sharp disagreements between the agency and local officials, and conflicting information given to evacuees about their futures. Although agency officials say they never promised a full year of free housing, many local officials around the country say yearlong vouchers were exactly what FEMA agreed to provide.

[The agency was sharply criticized in draft bipartisan recommendations to be released Thursday by a Senate committee, which said the agency functioned so poorly during Hurricane Katrina that Congress should abolish it and rebuild a more powerful agency. Page A22.]

In the desperate weeks after Hurricane Katrina, the vouchers helped stabilize the lives of evacuees who had bounced from place to place while trying to find missing family members and deal with mysterious skin rashes, shellshocked children and reams of red tape. At least, the vouchers promised, they would not have to worry about shelter.

Now, eight months later, the notices have panicked evacuees and raised the ire of local officials and landlords, who say FEMA is reneging on a promise and dismantling a program that is helping more people and is far less expensive than other housing solutions like trailers.

To make matters worse, advocates and local officials say, many evacuees either do not know why they have been found ineligible or have been given spurious reasons. Many notices do not even give a deadline, saying only, "You will not be asked to leave before April 30."

"We believe that many of the people who received notice that they're ineligible are eligible," said Mayor Bill White of Houston, where more than 9,000 of the 35,000 families on vouchers have been determined to be unqualified, raising fears of mass homelessness.

In an effort to persuade FEMA to reconsider, Mr. White has gone so far as to send teams of building inspectors to New Orleans to photograph evacuees' destroyed homes.

David Garrett, FEMA's acting director of recovery, said the agency had promised only to reimburse for "up to" 12 months of housing. But the cities that actually issued the vouchers, including Houston, Memphis and Little Rock, Ark., said the agency had agreed in negotiations to pay for the full term.

Although the paperwork accompanying the vouchers in Houston did say they were good for "up to" 12 months, local officials in all three cities said evacuees had been told, without contradiction from FEMA, that they would last a year.

"They knew exactly what we were doing," said Buddy Grantham, the chief operating officer of the Joint Hurricane Housing Task Force for Houston, which issued the 12-month vouchers in anticipation of being reimbursed by FEMA. "We were totally transparent."

Agency officials say fairness and the law prevent them from leaving the voucher system in place. The programs were hurriedly set up by state and local governments under FEMA guidelines for emergency housing, which is available to virtually anyone from a disaster-stricken area but is not intended to be used for extended periods.

Now, the agency is converting the families to its more traditional, and stricter, long-term housing program, the individual assistance program. Many people who qualified for emergency housing do not meet the requirements for long-term assistance, and the agency says it cannot ask taxpayers to continue to bankroll those families, although an agency spokesman, Aaron Walker, was unable to provide an estimate of how much money would be saved.

Mr. Garrett said the program was not fair to families who did not get vouchers, but instead went directly from shelters or hotels into the stricter program, under which they receive rent money every three months. The payments count against the total each family can legally receive from FEMA, $26,200, while rent and utilities under the voucher program do not. (FEMA trailers do not count either, agency officials said, because they are not as comfortable as apartments.)

The emergency housing program covers utilities, but the individual assistance program will not, unless Congress approves a request from President Bush to change the regulations.

The movement away from long-term vouchers has created widespread confusion among evacuees. A disabled evacuee in Little Rock said that when she called FEMA to ask why her rent was no longer being paid she was informed, erroneously, that she had never had a voucher. In Memphis, where there are 1,500 families on vouchers, FEMA initially asked those running the program to reclaim the furniture and basic kitchen items issued to evacuees, backing down after strenuous objections, said Susan Adams, the executive director of the Memphis and Shelby County Community Services Agency.

"It feels like a total lack of compassion," Ms. Adams said. "A total lack of humanity."

FEMA has no record of the furniture request, a spokesman for the agency said.

In interviews with more a dozen evacuees, some said they had been told they were ineligible because their home in New Orleans had not suffered enough damage, or they had insurance covering living expenses, or their paperwork lacked a signature, or they had not appeared in person for an inspection of their damaged home. FEMA recently agreed to review its findings for mistakes.

Mr. Garrett emphasized that evacuees could appeal any decision. But according to written guidelines, the agency will not continue to pay rent while a case is on appeal.

FEMA itself has difficulty explaining the ineligibility findings. The agency told Houston officials that about 1,200 of 8,500 families had insufficient damage to their homes and that 1,600 were in a category called "ineligible — other." Some 1,050 were denied on appeal, but the original reason for the denial was not given. More than 2,300 were described as being eligible only for an initial $2,000, with no further explanation.

Some evacuees said they had planned their lives around the security of the 12-month voucher. Erica Stevens, 26, said the promise of housing had drawn her and her three children to Houston after Hurricane Rita destroyed her home in Beaumont, Tex. She did not receive much other assistance, she said, because her landlord filed a FEMA claim on the house before she did, making her ineligible.

Karen Douglas, an evacuee living with two sons in a pleasant house in a Houston suburb, said that amid enrolling the elder son in school, battling insurance adjusters and looking for a job, she had managed to put the insurance proceeds from her destroyed house into investments that would mature in November, when her voucher was to expire. "It's stressful, but I thought I had it together," she said.

Then, on April 15, Ms. Douglas too got a letter. She would like to appeal but does not know why she was found ineligible. The letter says only that she had been previously notified of the reason. "I was expecting FEMA to honor the agreement," she said. "I wasn't expecting them to go midstream and pull the rug out from underneath us."

Trailer Plan Is Revived

NEW ORLEANS, April 26 (AP) — Mayor C. Ray Nagin and federal officials on Wednesday revived the effort to place thousands of trailers throughout the city as stopgap housing for people who lost their homes .

Three weeks ago Mr. Nagin halted work on new trailer sites, saying FEMA had used "bullying" tactics and built a site outside a gated community without the proper permits. But Mr. Nagin and FEMA officials now say they have bridged their differences. Officials hope to install about 8,000 trailers by the end of June. Before the impasse, FEMA had placed about 1,500 travel trailers at enclosed sites around the city.

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) -- Mayor Ray Nagin and federal officials on Wednesday revived the effort to place thousands of trailers throughout the city as stopgap housing for people who lost their homes during Hurricane Katrina.

Three weeks ago Nagin halted work on new trailer sites, complaining that the Federal Emergency Management Agency used "bullying" tactics and built a site outside a gated community without the proper permits.

On Wednesday, Nagin and FEMA officials announced that they had bridged their differences. Nagin said he changed his mind after "frank, productive discussions" with Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff. He did not elaborate.

Nagin's decision is "permitting us to move forward," said Gil Jamieson, FEMA's deputy director of Gulf Coast Recovery.

Officials hope to install about 8,000 trailers by the end of June. Before the impasse, FEMA had placed about 1,500 travel trailers at enclosed sites around the city. Most occupants of those trailers had rented before the storm.

In addition, there are about 10,000 trailers sitting in yards and side-lots occupied by homeowners. Another 10,000 homeowners are still waiting for trailers, and officials said those, too, should be in place by the end of June.

For months the process to establish trailer parks has been slowed as Nagin, FEMA, the City Council and neighborhood groups have weighed in.

Hurricane Victims Battle Banks (WSJ)

By Valerie Bauerlein

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

As homeowners along the Gulf Coast try to recover from the devastation of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, some say mortgage lenders are refusing to turn over insurance proceeds while demanding immediate payment on overdue loans.

Hurricane victims in Louisiana and Mississippi have filed nearly 1,000 complaints with state regulators claiming mistreatment by mortgage lenders. About 800 of the complaints have been resolved, often as a result of mediation initiated by regulators.

Jim Wolf of Pass Christian, Miss., a DuPont Co. technician currently living in a company trailer, for example, wanted to use proceeds of an insurance settlement for a down payment on a new home. On Dec. 10, he sent his $40,000 insurance settlement check to giant Countrywide Financial Corp. to pay off $5,000 remaining on the mortgage of his destroyed home, expecting to get $35,000 back. He said he called Countrywide, based in Calabasas, Calif., every business day for a month, spoke to a dozen representatives and couldn't get the balance returned.

Only after "an angel" in the Mississippi Department of Banking and Consumer Finance intervened, he says, did he get his money back. No one in California seemed to understand the desperation on the Gulf Coast, he says. "I knew other people in the same boat," Mr. Wolf said. "They kept a lot of people hung out to dry a long time."

"We had to have a serious talking-to" with some lenders, said John S. Allison, the Mississippi banking commissioner, in an interview. Still, while roughly 200 cases are open, no lenders have been fined or lost their licenses to operate in the two hurricane-ravaged states.

Following more than 40 accusations of wrongdoing by Countrywide, Louisiana Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. launched a probe of the company in December. Most complaints involved alleged delays in forwarding insurance-settlement checks to storm victims so they could rebuild or repair their damaged properties.

Countrywide said it received a letter from Mr. Foti earlier this month saying the probe had been closed. In an interview, Mr. Foti said he is satisfied with Countrywide's response to his probe.

A Countrywide spokesman denied any wrongdoing by the lender and said the unprecedented damage from Katrina and Rita had resulted in "unfortunate and unusual delays."

Last month, the company started canvassing cities with large numbers of hurricane evacuees to encourage borrowers to seek payment-postponement options and other assistance. Countrywide also said the company and its employees have contributed about $2 million to hurricane-recovery programs on the Gulf Coast.

Mr. Foti's office has received about 400 storm-related complaints, while 547 additional complaints were reported to the Louisiana Office of Financial Institutions, which regulates state-chartered banks, thrifts and credit unions. The financial-services agency wouldn't identify which lenders triggered complaints. It said about 25% of the cases haven't been resolved.

Most lenders have ended initial grace periods encouraged by federal regulators that allowed borrowers to stop making regular monthly payments on their loans, and they now are working out procedures on a case-by-case basis. Some homeowners are using insurance proceeds to cover outstanding payments on destroyed homes, but because the insurance checks typically are made out to both the homeowner and the mortgage holder, homeowners often must send the full proceeds to the lender and wait for the balance to be returned.

In some instances, accusations of wrongdoing have been resolved through agreements giving borrowers more time to catch up on past-due payments. Donald E. Powell, federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, said most problems appear to reflect the widespread destruction that displaced residents and initially overwhelmed most lenders and insurers in hard-hit areas.

Many homeowners are battling lenders on one front and insurers on another. State Rep. John Read, of Gautier, Miss., said he got calls from the mortgage arm of Citigroup Inc. asking when he was going to catch up on his payments almost a month after he'd sent an insurance settlement check to pay off the $160,000 balance.

Mr. Read, who is living in a trailer with his wife and daughter, has resolved his dispute with Citi but is in court against his insurance carrier, disputing the payout on his home and contents. "You do what you have to do and go from there, but it has not been easy," he said.

Citi has made "deep and substantive loan concessions" to more than 100,000 customers in the affected area and there were only "a handful" of formal complaints, a spokesman said. In Mr. Read's case, Citi said misunderstandings on both sides contributed to the delay.

As of Dec. 31, the most recent data available, nearly 76,000 homeowners in Louisiana and Mississippi had fallen at least 90 days behind on mortgage payments or were facing foreclosure, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association, a trade group.

FEMA Handling Of Gulf Schools Criticized (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Putting the Federal Emergency Management Agency in charge of rebuilding and reopening schools on the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina was a critical mistake, congressional Democrats on the House Education and the Workforce Committee said yesterday.

"Now we realize FEMA has to step aside," said Rep. Betty McCollum, Minnesota Democrat.

The Democrats issued a report asserting that eight months after the storm hit the region, its schools remain in crisis. The lawmakers called for the creation of an education-recovery czar to oversee the reopening of Gulf Coast schools and colleges.

"FEMA is operating out of a very old playbook" and deserves a large heap of the blame for slowing down rebuilding efforts with an extra layer of bureaucracy, said Rep. George Miller of California, the ranking Democrat on the committee.

"We heard repeatedly that FEMA gave out contradictory guidance, lacked one single point of contact for schools and colleges, and displayed near-total unwillingness to give local educators the flexibility they need to rebuild and reopen their schools quickly and efficiently," Mr. Miller said. "The people of New Orleans and the Gulf states, they deserve better than that. FEMA is just the wrong agency at the wrong time."

In the New Orleans public school system, 20 of the 130 schools are open.

The schools that are open are crowded, and students must take classes in cramped trailers. School officials are being forced to lay off teachers and borrow money as they wait for payments from the federal government. Some are facing bankruptcy.

Colleges are in an equally difficult position, the report says. Several schools were destroyed, and thousands of students were left without a learning institution or a place to live in.

Democrats argued that adequately funding schools so they can rehire teachers and faculty will stimulate the economy as students return. The report blamed President Bush for assigning FEMA to handle recovery efforts at schools in Louisiana and Mississippi. Democrats say the Department of Education should assume the rebuilding role and ensure that schools in the region get more funding.

Less than 2 percent of the $87 billion in federal money sent to the Gulf Coast was used for education, the Democrats said.

Mr. Miller said it would cost several billion dollars to properly rebuild schools.

"It's expensive, but it has to be done. There really is no alternative," he said. "We have made a decision as a nation that we are going to rebuild and recover this area. Education is critical to that mission. It can't be done without it."

Meanwhile, school officials from the Gulf Coast testified before the committee, and members heard many of the same complaints.

Officials testified that federal money has been slow to trickle in because of red tape at the state level.

"Today's hearing has highlighted the fact that many local schools have not received one penny in the federal aid we have approved. This is unacceptable," said Rep. Charles Boustany Jr., Louisiana Republican.

Father William F. Maestri, superintendent of Catholic Schools for the Archdiocese of New Orleans, told the committee to consider public-private school partnerships to make the transition easier.

"The old divisions that have too long divided us must be laid aside so we can move forward together," he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Team Visits Iraq, Pushes For Unity Government (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The Bush administration mounted a concerted diplomatic effort to capitalize on the selection of Iraq's new prime minister, sending its two top national-security officials here to push for the completion of a national-unity government and to continue setting the stage for a possible U.S. military withdrawal this year.

The unannounced trips by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice marked the first time two U.S. cabinet officials were in Iraq simultaneously. The visits highlighted the administration's hope that the selection of a new candidate for prime minister could clear the way for a permanent Iraqi government to take power.

Millions of Iraqis voted Dec. 15, but the country's political leaders have spent months squabbling over posts, dissipating the optimism generated by the election and contributing to a worsening cycle of sectarian violence.

Mr. Rumsfeld and Ms. Rice met with prime minister nominee Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, as well as other incoming Iraqi leaders. American officials here and in the U.S. had been instrumental in pressuring interim Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to step down, a step demanded by leaders of Sunni Muslim and ethnic Kurdish groups.

Mr. Jaafari's critics, including U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, had derided him as a weak-willed leader who was unable to prevent Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces from abducting, torturing and, in some cases, assassinating Sunnis suspected of links to the insurgency. They praised Mr. Maliki as a strong leader who understood the importance of forming a broad government of national unity. Mr. Maliki, who had adopted the name Jawad al-Maliki while in exile during the regime of Saddam Hussein, yesterday announced he will go by his birth name, Nouri al-Maliki.

Mr. Maliki's first and most pressing task will be to stamp out sectarian militias. Thousands of Shiite fighters have infiltrated the country's police and security forces, while large and heavily armed militias affiliated with the country's biggest Shiite political parties operate openly across the country.

In nearly all of his recent public remarks, Mr. Maliki has stressed the need to gradually disarm the militias. Iraq's nascent security forces will almost certainly be unable to do so without heavy U.S. military support, however, and Mr. Rumsfeld seemed to rule out such assistance.

In a joint appearance with Ms. Rice, Mr. Rumsfeld said it was a mistake to assume the militias had to be forcibly disarmed. Instead, he said the militia problem required a political solution under which the fighters were peacefully persuaded to lay down arms.

U.S. officials stressed that the purpose of the visits was to give Iraq's political process a high-profile endorsement, but the trips also signaled the White House's hopes that the formation of a permanent new Iraqi government could help reverse weeks of bad news from Iraq that have pushed domestic support for the war to new lows and fueled a continuing decline in Mr. Bush's standing at home.

U.S. officials said the installation of Mr. Maliki and other Iraqi leaders into key cabinet posts could help set the stage for the withdrawal of a substantial portion of the 132,000 American troops in Iraq. Gen. George Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, said the selection of the new government leaders was "a major step in the process."

Gen. Casey has said in the past that a "fairly substantial" drawdown could begin this year if Iraq was able to cobble together a stable coalition government and continue making progress in fielding effective military and paramilitary forces. In the meantime, American commanders on the ground have continued to lay the foundation for a drawdown by turning dozens of smaller military posts over to the Iraqis and consolidating American forces here into a handful of massive military installations.

The U.S. is seeking a new legal agreement with the Iraqi government allowing for the maintenance of a reduced number of American military bases here. The United Nations resolution giving U.S.-led forces formal permission to maintain a military presence in Iraq expires this year. Mr. Rumsfeld said he had opened discussions with Iraqi leaders about a new agreement centered on the future of the remaining U.S. military bases and the continued push to transfer primary security responsibility for many parts of the country to Iraqi troops.

In Iraq, A Joint Show Of Support (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 26 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made an unannounced joint visit to Iraq on Wednesday to bolster the emerging leadership and to suggest that the sometimes disjointed U.S. political and military operations are working seamlessly during the transition to a permanent government.

President Bush -- whose approval ratings have sunk to new lows, in large part because of the war -- secretly directed Rice and Rumsfeld to undertake the unusual mission as soon as the four-month impasse over the selection of Iraqi's prime minister ended last week, officials said. The visit came several weeks after the two secretaries had an unusual public tiff over whether the Bush administration has made mistakes in Iraq.

U.S. officials indicated that they were embracing perhaps the last chance the Bush administration had to turn around public opinion at home and to ensure that Iraq has a viable political future. The administration had previously pointed to the drafting of a constitution and the election of a transitional government as watershed moments in Iraq, even as violence has continued to rage. The new government will last four years and administration officials say they expect it to become increasingly independent of U.S. influence.

Rice said the creation of a permanent government should be seen as a turning point in the war and "an important message to the American people" because "it gives Iraq a real chance to deal with the obviously vexing problems that it has faced."

Rice and Rumsfeld stayed inside the heavily fortified enclave known as the Green Zone during their entire visit. They spent much of the day in meetings with top Iraqi leaders, including the prime minister-designate, Nouri al-Maliki; Rice also held a second late-night one-on-one session with him. Maliki emerged as an unexpected compromise choice to lead Iraq for the next four years and was largely unknown to Washington officials.

During a meal of Sayadieh fish and Arab salads, Rice and Rumsfeld were briefed by Planning Minister Barham Salih on details for putting together the new government. He said that "success depends on our competency," one participant in the meeting said. Iraqi officials also told the visiting Americans that fixing the unstable security in the capital was a key objective.

Earlier, in a meeting at the residence of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, Maliki, speaking in Arabic, told Rice and Rumsfeld that while terrorism was the major problem, his first goal was to address the "mistrust" among religious and ethnic groups, a U.S. official said. Resolving this issue would in turn help reduce the violence. His second priority was making electricity supplies reliable. Three years after the invasion, sporadic electricity continues to be a symbol for many Iraqis of the failure of the U.S. occupation. "The people need electricity," he said.

Maliki and the U.S. visitors also held a lengthy discussion on staffing for government ministries, with Maliki saying the ministers should be "ministers for Iraq," not ministers for Sunni Arabs, Shiite Arabs or Kurds. The Interior Ministry is believed to be infiltrated by Shiite militia groups that are targeting Sunnis, and Maliki said he was looking for technocrats who were competent.

"We wanted to say how important it was that the ministries would be ministries of national unity, just as the government is a government of national unity," Rice said later. "But before we could say that, the leaders said that to us."

Maliki's office announced Wednesday that he would begin to use his birth name, Nouri, rather than Jawad, which he adopted while in exile during Saddam Hussein's rule. He has a long career as a legislator but has never held an executive position. He does not even have a secretary, though he has promised the U.S. Embassy he would hire one this week.

Rice and Rumsfeld also presided over a working lunch of about 30 senior U.S. political and military officials that, in the spirit of a presidential campaign, was listed on Rice's itinerary as: "First 100 days: Government Formation, Security and non-

Security Priorities." The lunch did not cover a specific 100-day plan but focused mainly on such issues as helping establish effective ministries.

The State Department and Pentagon earlier this year differed over how to provide security for reconstruction teams in Iraqi provinces, slowing the implementation of plans. The dispute was largely resolved this month, and Rice in recent days has cabled Foreign Service officers to say she has crafted a special incentive program to make tours on the teams more attractive.

"Clearly the new Iraqi government must perform on behalf of the Iraqi people," said Jim Wilkinson, Rice's senior adviser. "But the new government also gives us a chance to correct our mistakes and do our part to make Iraq work.

"This is an opportunity to be seized," he added. "The Iraqis must seize it, but the U.S. government must organize itself to help the Iraqis do so."

Rice, in a trip to Baghdad three weeks ago, personally pushed for transitional Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to give up his nomination to a new term. During a meeting with him Wednesday, however, she and Rumsfeld were "very relaxed," according to Adnan Ali Kadhimi, a Jafari aide. Jafari "appreciated the visit, and he said that no matter what has happened, we still appreciate what America has done for us," Kadhimi said.

Rice and Rumsfeld made no public statements in their meetings with Iraqis, though they jointly met with Iraqi reporters traveling on their aircraft. Earlier this month, Rice said the administration had made possibly "thousands" of "tactical errors," prompting Rumsfeld to declare that anyone making such a statement did not understand the nature of warfare. In Baghdad, Rumsfeld minimized the dispute, saying he "wasn't aware of what she meant," while Rice told Fox News that she and Rumsfeld have "an excellent relationship."

Rice, Rumsfeld Tout New Iraq Government (AP)

By Anne Gearan And Robert Burns, Associated Press Writers

AP, April 27, 2006

Success in forming a new Iraqi government may let some U.S. troops leave the war zone within months, the top American military commander in Iraq said Wednesday. Paying a surprise visit, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld embraced the country's fledgling leaders as independent and focused on the future.

"I came away most encouraged," Rumsfeld said after he and Rice spent a day meeting with Iraqi politicians and U.S. military and diplomatic advisers in the capital city.

Rice called the priorities and commitment of Iraq's newly selected prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, "refreshing and really heartening."

The double-barreled show of support for Iraq's first permanent democratic government was meant to resonate in Iraq and among Americans, whose frustration with the war effort has helped drive President Bush's poll numbers to new lows.

A four-month political stalemate had sapped support for U.S. involvement in Iraq. The administration remains under election-year pressure from the public and many in Congress to draw down its forces there.

"There is no question but that as the new government is formed and the ministers are in place, that it's appropriate for us to begin discussions with the new government about the conditions on the ground and the pace at which we'll be able to turn over responsibility in the provinces," Rumsfeld said.

Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander, said selection of government leaders marked a major step toward creating conditions that could allow a partial withdrawal.

"I'm still on my general timeline" for a possible withdrawal, he told reporters after meeting with Rumsfeld.

Casey used no figures. There are about 130,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, and military officials have spoken before of their hopes of reducing that number below 100,000 by the end of the year if the insurgency does not grow worse and if Iraq makes continued progress on political and security fronts.

Casey said breakthrough agreements last weekend to name al-Maliki as prime minister and to fill six other top government posts "certainly is a major step in the process" of reducing troop levels this year. He said more must be done on the political side, particularly filling key government ministry jobs.

The Pentagon has not said when it expects to make decisions about further troop reductions. Casey had said late last year that he expected to submit his recommendation this spring.

"We are seeing the situation a little clearer, I'd say," as a result of the latest political progress, Casey said. "And the clearer I see it the better I can make my recommendations."

Bush said last month that U.S. troops would stay in Iraq for years. Administration hopes for a major pullout soon have been tempered by the ongoing insurgency and the increase since February in sectarian violence.

"I think we're fairly resolved on the military side to understand that this is going to take time," Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told reporters Wednesday. He added that political leaders would make the key decisions about how long U.S. troops remain deployed.

Rice said the United States has an obligation to be ready to do what will best help the emerging Iraqi leadership tackle persistent violence and such grinding problems as petty corruption and poor electricity.

The secrecy surrounding the two leaders' visit and the omnipresent security precautions inside the fortified U.S. government complex underscored the dangers and difficulties the Iraqi leaders inherit.

The trip also came after recent calls by a half-dozen retired generals for Rumsfeld, 73, to resign. Asked by a reporter whether this visit — his 12th — would be his last trip to Iraq as Pentagon chief, an unsmiling Rumsfeld replied, "No."

Rice refused to second-guess the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq more than three years into a war that two-thirds of Americans now say the president is handling badly.

"Have we made mistakes? I'm sure we have," Rice told reporters with Rumsfeld beside her. "In a big historical circumstance like this you're going to do some things well and you're going to do some things not well."

Last month, Rice said the United States had made thousands of tactical errors in Iraq, a remark Rumsfeld said confused him. Their unusual joint appearance was also intended to show the sometimes feuding U.S. diplomatic and military branches engaged side by side.

Al-Maliki was largely unknown outside Iraq before he emerged last week as a compromise candidate to break a four-month political logjam. Neither Rice nor Rumsfeld had met him before Wednesday's session, and Rice met with him a second time privately.

Al-Maliki opposed both Saddam Hussein and the U.S.-led invasion that overthrew the dictator more than three years ago. He has been described as a hardline Shiite partisan and by U.S. officials as an Iraqi patriot who stood up to attempted political meddling by neighboring Iran.

He has a month to form Iraq's first permanent democratic government, and U.S. officials are direct about the high stakes.

"This new Iraqi government must perform on behalf of the Iraqi people, but the new government also gives us a chance to correct our mistakes and do our part to make Iraq work," said Jim Wilkinson, a senior adviser to Rice.

The American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, has said Iraq risks civil war if its political leadership falters.

Rice, Rumsfeld Visit Iraq (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld flew to Iraq yesterday to meet with the prime minister-designate and emphasize the importance of a "nonsectarian" government.

The unprecedented joint visit by the top two Cabinet officials demonstrated Washington's full backing of Nouri al-Maliki, who has been selected to head a new government.

"I came away most encouraged," Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters after he and Miss Rice met with Mr. al-Maliki, who announced yesterday he would use his given name, "Nouri," rather than Jawad, a name he adopted for security reasons while being sought by Saddam Hussein's regime.

"I found him to be very focused and very clear that he understood his role and the role of the new government to really demonstrate that it is a government of national unity," Miss Rice added.

Gen. George Casey, the commander of the U.S.-led coalition forces, said that the agreement on Iraq's top government leaders last week would help create conditions to reduce American troop levels.

Miss Rice said that ministerial appointments should begin with the ministries of interior and defense, so they can take control of security and public order and disband sectarian militias. The ministers, she said, must be nonpartisan and unifying figures.

"I think they understand that the importance of appointing ministers and subordinates who have a reputation for technical competence and a mind-set that is nonsectarian," Miss Rice said of Mr. al-Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and other leaders she and Mr. Rumsfeld met yesterday.

In addition to security and providing "essential services," such as electricity and water, Mr. al-Maliki told his guests that his top priorities include building trust among different ethnic groups, Miss Rice said.

She dismissed the statement by terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, made on a tape posted on the Internet on Tuesday, that Mr. al-Maliki was a U.S. puppet.

"We know that he has not always agreed with us, or we with him, but he's somebody who's always had the interests of the Iraqis at heart," Miss Rice said.

Iraqis voted for parliament on Jan. 30, but the formation of the country's first democratically elected government was delayed for months because Sunnis and Kurds would not support interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's bid to retain his post.

Miss Rice added the Baghdad stop to a trip she's making to the Balkans, while Mr. Rumsfeld flew in from Washington.

Gen. Casey, who has said in the past that he would recommend "fairly substantial" reduction of the 132,000 U.S. forces this year if the insurgency did not worsen and if Iraq made political progress, noted yesterday, "I'm still on my general timeline."

Mr. Rumsfeld said that no one in yesterday's meetings "suggested that there should be lower [troop] levels than currently existed."

In fighting yesterday, U.S. troops backed by a helicopter and jets struck a suspected safe house of foreign insurgents, killing 12 militants and a woman in a raid near the site where an American helicopter crashed, the U.S. military said, according to the Associated Press.

In Baghdad, a bomb ripped through a minibus carrying passengers to their Shi'ite neighborhood, killing four persons, who were among at least 12 Iraqis killed in violence. Police also found 11 bodies dumped in Baghdad and elsewhere, the apparent victims of sectarian killings, the AP reported from Baghdad.

Visit By Rumsfeld, Rice Sets Off Criticism In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Paul Richter, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

Some leaders worry that the Americans' surprise trip could hurt talks on forming a government.

BAGHDAD — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld paid a surprise visit to Baghdad on Wednesday to express support for Iraq's new leaders, but drew criticism from Iraqi politicians who said they feared the unannounced visit might do more harm than good.

"We didn't invite them," said Kamal Saadi, a Shiite legislator close to the new prime minister-designate, Nouri Maliki.

Saadi said Iraqi leaders had not been given advance notice of the visit, which came just days after Iraqi politicians broke through a months-long impasse on the selection of a prime minister.

"Maybe Rumsfeld's visit can be justified" because of American troop presence, "but I can't see a clear reason behind Rice's visit," Saadi said. "The crisis is over and negotiations are taking place."

Since parliamentary elections in December, American officials have pushed Iraqi legislators to form a national unity government. During the nearly four-month delay, the country has been rocked by violence with increasingly sectarian overtones, raising the specter of full-blown civil war.

Iraq's Shiite coalition broke the deadlock last week when it withdrew the nomination of interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari to lead the new government and substituted Maliki, whose nomination was approved Saturday by parliament. (Maliki said this week he was reverting to his original first name, Nouri. He said he had adopted the name Jawad during his time in exile, to protect his family in Iraq.)

During a news conference with Rumsfeld, Rice said that Maliki and others had made it clear in meetings that "Iraqis are taking responsibility for their own future."

"We can be partners. We can support. We can help. But this is Iraq's time and the time for Iraq's newly elected leaders to take on these responsibilities."

Some observers and Iraqi politicians speculated that the visit had more to do with the U.S. domestic audience than the creation of an inclusive and sustainable government in Iraq.

In Washington, the visit was seen as an attempt by the White House to shore up U.S. public opinion about the war and as the first foreign policy calling card of the new chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten.

"I actually think it's completely aimed at American public opinion," said Brian Katulis, Middle East analyst at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "What's going on here is part of Bolten's plan to signal to the American public that we're not staying there forever."

Ivo H. Daalder, a foreign policy analyst at the Brookings Institution, said the visit was "all about us."

"We are trying to demonstrate that there is positive direction. How better to do that than having the chief horses of the State Department and the Defense Department make this joint and dramatic appearance. Every newspaper will quote them as saying this is a new turning point."

Lee Feinstein, a senior fellow with the Council of Foreign Relations in Washington, saw nuances in the White House mission.

"This is an opportunity for Secretary Rice to greet the new prime minister after criticizing Jafari very pointedly in her last visit just three weeks ago," he said.

In an unusual public display of divisions within the administration, Rice and Rumsfeld traded barbs this month over post-invasion mistakes in Iraq. On Wednesday, Rice sent a more harmonious message about State Department-Pentagon relations.

"We're working very hard together," she said. "We're actually having a great time here in Iraq. I think it's very stimulating for us both to be in these meetings with Iraq's leaders together."

Some Iraqi politicians thought the visit could backfire on the sensitive negotiations. Similar concerns were raised recently about the statements and actions of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and about Rice's April 2 visit with her British counterpart, Jack Straw.

"It would be more appropriate if they would leave us alone," said Mahmoud Othman, a senior Kurdish legislator. "Let us solve our problems by ourselves."

"Enough is enough," said Sheik Mahmoud Sudani, a politician affiliated with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr. "Rice's trip to Iraq at this critical time is just another desperate move by the Americans to try to impose themselves on our new government. But they have lost their influence."

There has been grumbling among some Iraqi officials as U.S. officials pressed them to form a new government and eventually urged Jafari to step aside in the face of opposition from Sunni Arabs, Kurds and secular Shiite Muslims.

The most positive reaction to the visits was among Sunni leaders, who fear their minority will lose political clout in the democratic setup.

Americans can help coordinate and speed the process, "which will benefit everyone," said Azhar Samarrai, a Sunni legislator with the Iraqi Islamic Party.

Rice said U.S. officials were hearing "loud and clear" that the new Iraqi leadership intended to be nonsectarian in its decisions on who should head ministries, particularly Interior and Defense, which oversee police and armed forces respectively.

"I think they understand … the importance of appointing ministers and subordinates who have a reputation for technical competence and a mind-set that is nonsectarian," Rice said.

Meanwhile, another sibling of Sunni Vice President Tariq Hashimi was slain in the country's continuing violence. Gunmen killed Maysoon Hashimi and a bodyguard this morning in Baghdad. Mahmoud Hashimi was shot to death April 13.

Tuesday, a civilian was killed by a roadside bomb near the city of Kirkuk, police said.

In the capital, a bomb on a bus exploded, killing four people and injuring 21.

In a western district of the city, two people were killed and four injured in a roadside bombing aimed at police.

Police also recovered 15 bodies from various Baghdad neighborhoods.

Just north of Baqubah, a roadside bomb exploded in the Shiite village of Kharnabat, killing three people and injuring 10, local police said.

The U.S. military announced that American-led forces killed a dozen suspected rebels during a raid Tuesday in Yousifiya.

GOP Critics Resigned To Life With Rumsfeld (LAT/AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Republican critics of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld are deferring to President Bush's support for the Pentagon chief, mindful that his fate is out of their hands.

But in the aftermath of calls by several retired generals for Rumsfeld's ouster, those GOP lawmakers remain uncomfortable with him. Given the chance, they offer no words of support.

"He still is in the confidence of the president. The president reiterated that the other day, so I'll continue to try to work with him," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said Wednesday.

"There really is only one person he needs to please, and that's the president," added Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. "The president's made clear that the secretary is his choice and that really ends it."

"Is he still here?" joked Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss.

Yes. Should he not be?

"That's up to him and the president. I don't see that his performance has changed," said Lott, who has said he's "not a fan" of Rumsfeld.

Hardly glowing endorsements.

In Baghdad on Wednesday, Rumsfeld was asked by a reporter whether this visit -- his 12th -- would be his last trip to Iraq as Pentagon chief.

"No," responded Rumsfeld.

Last week, Bush used a Rose Garden appearance to declare, "I'm the decider and I decide what's best. And what's best is for Don Rumsfeld to remain as the secretary of defense."

In recent weeks, at least six retired generals have publicly criticized Rumsfeld's handling of the Iraq war and his management style, an extraordinary rebuke of a civilian military leader from uniformed officers who recently served at his behest.

As the White House sought to quell the uproar, Democrats pounced.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Senate Democrat, called for a Senate vote of no confidence on Rumsfeld, and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., sought a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on the matter. She suggested hearing testimony from retired generals -- those who have been critical as well as those with different opinions -- and administration officials.

But neither of those efforts appear to be going anywhere anytime soon, if at all.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada has said Democrats won't push for a no-confidence vote. Some Democrats are privately expressing concern that weighing in on the debate could diminish the power of the retired generals' remarks and invite criticism from Republicans that they are politicizing the war.

On Clinton's request, Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he would consult with his 23 other committee members about whether a hearing is warranted, as he does with every such request. But the Virginia Republican indicated he was in no hurry to hold a hearing. He said the committee schedule was packed through Memorial Day, by which time the uproar over Rumsfeld could further subside.

A congressional hearing would give Rumsfeld's critics a high-profile national platform while keeping alive a controversy the White House wants to put to rest.

Striking a careful balance, Warner issued a statement this week calling the debate among retired generals about Rumsfeld "an important exercise of the right to freedom of speech."

But Warner noted that Bush has decided to retain Rumsfeld in his Cabinet and said: "I support the president's right to make this decision."

Notably missing was praise for Rumsfeld. There wasn't even lukewarm support.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, is urging that Warner hold a hearing. But Levin also suggested he was somewhat indifferent about Rumsfeld's future at the Pentagon's helm.

"If I felt his departure would change policy, I'd be all for it. But I think the policy would stay the same," Levin said.

Other Democrats renewed their calls for Rumsfeld's departure.

"He should have been gone two years ago. There's no more to say," said Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the lead Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Republicans recognize that getting rid of Rumsfeld now, three years into the Iraq war, could signal failure, not to mention give Democrats ammunition for this fall's congressional election as they try to wrest control of the House and Senate from the GOP.

Seeking to counter the mounting criticism and head off a hearing, Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., held a rally-around-Rumsfeld breakfast on Capitol Hill on Tuesday for the secretary and his Republican backers.

Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., was among those who attended. Even though he has clashed with Rumsfeld in the past, Thune said getting rid of Rumsfeld now would hurt the overall effort in Iraq.

"It's the wrong message to send," Thune said.

Plus, he said, Congress' hands are tied even if it wants a fresh face leading the Pentagon for one reason: "He serves at the pleasure of the president."

The Iraqi Oil Pipeline Fiasco (NYT)

The Bush administration's promise that Iraq's reconstruction could be paid for with the country's own oil revenues was one of the many false assertions and assurances that ushered in the invasion. But unlike the predictions of weapons of mass destruction and streets filled with cheering Iraqis, this claim might have been at least partly true — if the administration had more carefully supervised the lucrative no-bid oil industry repair contract it awarded to a subsidiary of Halliburton, the firm formerly headed by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Part of that contract involved repairing a crucial pipeline link that American bombing had severed in the course of the invasion. Had the repair been done right the first time, Iraq would have been able to export much more oil from its northern oil fields in the past few years, making it far less dependent on American reconstruction aid, which has amounted to about $30 billion so far.

How this costly and unnecessary failure came about was spelled out by James Glanz in a compelling investigative report in Tuesday's Times. He described the easily avoidable engineering errors that delayed the reopening of the crucial Fatah pipeline link while the contracted funds ran out and the security situation for reconstruction workers deteriorated drastically. It is instructive to recall the circumstances in which Halliburton was awarded this contract just prior to the Iraq invasion — with no competitive bidding. Later, when Democrats in Congress began raising questions, the Pentagon pointed to Halliburton's special expertise in oil-field management and its long experience working under Army Corps of Engineers' supervision.

But neither the expertise nor the supervision were much in evidence on the Fatah repair job. The Halliburton subsidiary managing the project ignored the clear warnings of its own consultants and let the drilling begin without any rigorous testing of the ground it needed to work in, which turned out to be a geological fault zone. As a result, drill bits repeatedly snapped and drill holes kept collapsing. It took an unconscionably long time for the corps to find out about the problems. By then, months had passed and almost all of the roughly $75 million allocated for the project had been spent.

There are crucial lessons to be learned here about the rarely justified practice of awarding no-bid contracts based on presumed special expertise. There are lessons as well for the Corps of Engineers, which is also supervising much of the Katrina rebuilding effort — some of the reconstruction work there is also being done by Halliburton.

On the Fatah pipeline crossing project, American taxpayers got a particularly raw deal. The repair work they originally paid for wasn't done. The government agency that was supposed to supervise the work did not do an effective job. And the oil exports that could have helped pay Iraq's reconstruction bills never made it through the pipeline.

Zarqawi Message: 'I'm Still Here' (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD - After years of operating in Iraq as a shadowy force who was sometimes heard but never seen, the Jordanian-born militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi stepped out of the shadows with a video released on the Internet Tuesday that showed him planning operations against US forces and walking freely about the desert of what was claimed to be Iraq's Anbar Province.

Mr. Zarqawi, whom Iraqi officials blame for dozens of suicide attacks inside Iraq as well as terrorist attacks in his native Jordan, was even at this late date seen as a mythical figure by many Iraqis, a fiction designed to spread fear and put a face on the Sunni Arab insurgents who have spread so much terror here.

"Before, I thought there was no Zarqawi, he was just a fiction. But now I believe in him. He's really out there," says Thalib Jabbar, a businessman in Baghdad. "Zarqawi wants to show his power and frighten people. But in reality, he's the one who should be afraid. We want him dead."

That's a common sentiment among many ordinary Iraqis, one played on by Iraqi officials Wednesday who condemned Zarqawi as a foreigner trying to destroy their country. Their strong response highlights the risk such a video poses for Zarqawi: The effort to show his strength within the insurgency also puts a foreign face on the movement, leaving an opening for his opponents to appeal to national unity.

Yet experts say he remains hugely popular among hard-core insurgents particularly in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province - and point out that the video shows him as calm and in control, despite a massive US manhunt for him.

At its most basic level, analysts say the point of the slickly produced half-hour video was for Zarqawi to say "I'm still here," much like the audiotape released Sunday by Osama bin Laden. US military propaganda and some Iraqi sheikhs have claimed recently that many of Zarqawi's past admirers had turned on him, and that he was on the run.

Most Iraqis, particularly the Shiites and Kurds whom he reviles, view him with loathing. "This terrorist is bombing all of the Iraqis. He never discriminates between any people. Christians, Muslims, women, children," says Mohammed Jemaah, a 24-year-old policeman in Baghdad. "If he was a real man, he would fight like a man, show himself, and not use car bombs."

Zarqawi is shown in the video, claimed to have been made last Friday, strolling among dozens of masked followers, pouring over maps and tactics with masked insurgents said to be from the Anbar city of Ramadi, and in a Rambo-moment emptying round after round from a bulky large-caliber machine gun into the desert.

"He shows himself as healthy and able to walk around outside, surrounded by loyal legions of followers, which counters the rumors that he's afraid, he's running and hiding and has no friends left," says Evan Kohlmann, author of "Al-Qaida's Jihad in Europe" and a terrorism consultant. "There was a lot of speculation that he was out of the picture. And he needed to respond to that, to show that he's still there, still in charge, and there's nothing to stop him from putting together military operations."

Also noteworthy is the ease with which he can get his message out. While analysts speculate it takes weeks for Mr. bin Laden to transmit tapes or other messages to the outside world, Iraq's urban battleground makes logistics for terrorists much easier.

Zarqawi's tape was released less than a day before US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flew into Baghdad for surprise visits designed to show support for Iraq's newly named Prime Minister Jawad al-Maliki. Mr. Maliki, a religious Shiite who fought hard for Islamic law provisions to be included in Iraq's Constitution, told Ms. Rice that his top priority is reducing ethnic and sectarian animosities.

But those old hatreds are precisely what Zarqawi and his followers have been trying to stoke, in the hopes of sparking a full-scale civil war that would destabilize Iraq for years to come and give him what he imagines is his best chance at eventual success.

In his video, the powerful and chipmunk-cheeked Zarqawi said the Iraqi government, "whether made up of the hated Shiites or the secular Zionist Kurds or the collaborators among the Sunnis, will be tools of the crusaders and a poison dagger in the heart of the Islamic nation."

Speculation that Zarqawi's role in the insurgency was weakening has grown since Jan. 15, when a statement posted on insurgent websites announced the formation of the Majilis Shura al-Mujahdin, or the Mujahidin Shura Council (MSC), as an umbrella for Sunni insurgent groups who share Al Qaeda's ideology and goal of turning Iraq into a state governed by Sunni religious law.

Subsequent statements named an Iraqi militant with the nom de guerre of Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi as the group's leader, which some took to mean that Zarqawi had lost stature.

But insurgent sources say the move was mostly to put an Iraqi face on the operations of the self-styled holy warriors, and to counter US claims that foreign fighters, not Iraqis, were leading much of the violence, particularly in the volatile Anbar Province. They say Zarqawi has all along been their most respected operational commander.

The new group also makes it harder for him to be painted as a meddling foreigner, while also giving more face and respect to his Iraqi comrades. Zarqawi's video begins with a full screen shot of the MSC logo, and a smaller version remains on screen for the whole tape.

"It seems pretty clear that he's still the boss," says Mr. Kohlmann. "When the MSC chose to highlight their leadership, guess who's the star? It's an indication that the MSC is a propaganda front."

Kohlmann argues the MSC, which has at least eight member organizations, is sort of like a jihadi NATO.

"When we've got a coalition operation, we go under the NATO flag, because it helps the smaller nations feel they belong, it creates a sense of equality, and that's what the MSC is for: It gives the Iraqi [fighters] the sense that they're in control of their own jihad."

Video Shows Another Side Of Al-Zarqawi (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, April 26, 2006

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's new video marks a shift by the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq toward a less radical image, one that might appeal to the Iraqi insurgency more than the beheadings for which he's become notorious, analysts said Wednesday.

The video released Tuesday, the first by al-Zarqawi that shows his face, features scenes of the black-garbed terrorist firing a gun and hunkered over a map plotting strategy. The Sunni Muslim extremist, 39, looks youthful and healthy in the springtime desert.

"It's a departure from the past. There's no strident anti-Shiite rhetoric and no beheadings," said Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director at the International Crisis Group, based in Amman, Jordan.

"He wants to be a `good' insurgent in a more moderate sense — an Iraqi sense — to appeal to Iraqis," Hiltermann said.

Iraqi government officials, however, condemned the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi as a foreigner determined to destroy Iraq. They said his promise to launch more attacks may have been in response to the appointment of a new prime minister, a major step toward a unity government including Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds.

"I believe that al-Zarqawi was caught off guard by the new government taking shape because it will be very strong one representing all Iraqis," said Sheik Khalid al-Attiyah, the Iraqi parliament's new first deputy speaker. He added that al-Zarqawi is determined "to inflame a civil war."

"He feels very worried that he's losing popularity inside Iraq," Maysoon al-Damluji, a member of the Iraqi parliament, told CNN. "This is a change of strategy. He feels that he needs to make himself visible more in order to get support."

The video comes at a time when Arabs have voiced distaste for Islamic extremists' tactics such as beheadings and bombings, including deadly hotel attacks in Jordan that caused widespread protests.

"He is often seen as more extreme than even (Osama) bin Laden," said Jeremy Binnie, an analyst with Jane's Terrorism and Insurgency Center in London. "In reality their ideology isn't that different."

Binnie said the video shows a "softer image" of al-Zarqawi. It suggests he "isn't just the leader of a fanatical band, but a more general-like figure, and also an action man himself."

Al-Zarqawi has done audiotapes, including one in January. But he has kept a relatively low profile since then, when his group merged with five other Iraqi insurgent groups to form the Mujahedeen Shura Council.

The new video was stamped with the logo of the Mujahedeen Shura Council as well as the black flag logo of al-Zarqawi's al-Qaida in Iraq.

Al-Zarqawi has claimed responsibility for some of the bloodiest suicide bombings in Iraq since the 2003 fall of Saddam Hussein and for the beheadings and killings of at least 10 foreign hostages, including three Americans and a Briton.

The last time al-Zarqawi made a video was the 2004 beheading of American Nick Berg. In that one, al-Zarqawi's face was masked.

"He appeared to have a sense of mystique by never showing his face. In choosing to come out of the shadows, he may be changing tack," said London-based security consultant Charles Shoebridge.

Shoebridge, a former counterterrorism officer with London's Metropolitan police and a former British army officer, said the tape suggests al-Zarqawi is working to shore up his position within the insurgency.

Added Hiltermann: "Osama bin Laden is sitting somewhere in a cave, but al-Zarqawi is showing he is carrying out jihad in front of the world."

The tape was posted on the Internet two days after an audiotape of bin Laden appeared on Arab television. However, the al-Zarqawi tape is dated Friday, meaning it was made before bin Laden's was released.

In one scene in the tape, al-Zarqawi is pictured in a flat desert of dried, cracked mud with sprouts of vegetation similar to that in Iraq's western Anbar province. Although his whereabouts can't be definitively discerned, Binnie called it "extremely likely" al-Zarqawi was in Anbar or someplace close to it.

The United States has put a $25 million bounty on his head.

A Dagger To Al-Qaeda (WP)

THE APPEARANCE of an al-Qaeda video on the Internet more often than not is a sign of good news in the war on terrorism. Tuesday's posting by Iraqi commander Abu Musab al-Zarqawi is the latest example: The 34-minute show by the newly unhooded extremist is in part a bid for advantage in factional feuding that has curtailed al-Qaeda's visibility and effectiveness. More important, the terrorist acknowledges that the agreement of Iraq's leading Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish parties on the country's first permanent postwar government last week was, as he bluntly put it, "a dagger in the heart." The Zarqawi movement has spent the past several years trying to ignite a sectarian war between Iraq's Sunnis and Shiites; the new "unity" government, if it takes hold, could be the turning point toward defeating that strategy.

Iraq's insurgents and terrorists are a long way from beaten, as the daily toll of killings tragically demonstrates. But the nominee for prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has made an encouraging start. Although he has yet to form a cabinet -- that may take another month -- Mr. Maliki was on Iraqi television Tuesday night appealing for national unity. Though he has been thought of as a relatively uncompromising Shiite partisan, Mr. Maliki promised to appoint nonsectarian ministers and said he believed the participation of "our Sunni brothers" in the government would "dry up the sources" of the insurgency. He appears focused on pragmatic results, saying his top priority after fostering national accord is increasing electricity supplies.

Another sign that this is good news was the appearance in Baghdad yesterday of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. President Bush was said to have ordered them to Iraq to boost the emerging new government and demonstrate the administration's intent "to correct our mistakes and do our part to make Iraq work," as one of Ms. Rice's aides put it. That's a good aim, and Mr. Maliki certainly deserves high-profile support. Still, a lingering question is whether Mr. Rumsfeld and Ms. Rice were in Iraq to revitalize the U.S. mission or to seize on a rare positive moment to inaugurate its retreat.

The administration and U.S. commanders are clearly eager to find reasons to draw down troops from the current total of 132,500 by the fall. Both Mr. Rumsfeld and Gen. George W. Casey Jr. seized on the government breakthrough: "I'm still on my general timeline," Gen. Casey told reporters yesterday. Of course, if U.S. forces can be drawn down without damaging the new government or undermining its ability to fight the insurgency, that will be welcomed by both Americans and Iraqis. But so far Iraq's slow political progress has had no impact on the violence, which has been growing steadily worse. Before welcoming Iraq's new government by pulling out tens of thousands of soldiers, President Bush ought to carefully consider whether that is the best way to achieve the victory he says he seeks.

GIs Kill 13 In Raid On Iraq Safehouse (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, April 26, 2006

U.S. troops backed by a helicopter and jets struck a suspected safehouse of foreign insurgents, killing 12 militants and a woman in a raid near the site where an American helicopter crashed, the U.S. military said Wednesday.

In Baghdad, a bomb ripped through a minibus carrying passengers to their Shiite neighborhood, killing four people, who were among at least 12 Iraqis killed in violence Wednesday. Police also found 11 bodies dumped in Baghdad and elsewhere, the apparent victims of sectarian killings.

The violence came as Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians haggled over forming a new government aimed at stopping the bloodshed.

The new Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, made a show of unity with his Kurdish and Shiite colleagues, calling for Iraq's insurgency to be put down by force.

Al-Hashimi shrugged off a videotape by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in which the al-Qaida in Iraq leader tried to rally Sunni Arabs to fight the new government and denounced Sunnis who cooperate with it as "agents" of the Americans.

"I say, yes, we're agents. We're agents for Islam, for the oppressed. We have to defend the future of our people," al-Hashimi said at a news conference with President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, and his fellow vice president, Shiite Adil Abdul-Mahdi.

"We believe that Iraq's interest now is to normalize the situation and maintain stability, as well as to impose security and peace by force," he said.

The three spoke after meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rica and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who made an unannounced visit to Iraq for talks on the new government.

U.S. officials are hoping Sunni participation in a national unity government led by Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will undermine the Sunni-led insurgency as well as reduce Shiite-Sunni violence that has flared in the past two months.

Coalition forces hit the suspected safehouse Tuesday in Youssifiyah, 12 miles south of Baghdad, near where a U.S. Apache helicopter crashed April 1. The U.S. command said the helicopter was believed to have been shot down.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council, purportedly a new umbrella organization that includes al-Qaida in Iraq and smaller insurgent groups, claimed responsibility for that attack, and Al-Jazeera TV aired footage provided by the insurgents which they claimed showed parts of the wreckage.

The U.S. military did not say whether the suspected militants killed in the raid were believed to have been involved in the helicopter crash. The area is part of the infamous "triangle of death" and scene of numerous ambushes against U.S. and Iraqi troops, foreigners and Shiite civilians.

According to the U.S. statement, intelligence led coalition forces to the safe house, and when they reached it they came under direct fire.

The soldiers fought back with the support of a coalition helicopter and jets, killing five militants outside the safe house, including one armed with a shoulder-fired rocket, and destroying the building, the U.S. military statement said.

A search of the wreckage found the bodies of seven heavily armed insurgents and an unidentified woman, the military said.

The troops also discovered suicide notes on one of the militants, explosives vests used by suicide bombers, hand grenades and ammunition, the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0026664

In Baghdad on Wednesday, a bomb exploded aboard a minibus, killing four Iraqi passengers and wounding two, police said. The bomb, hidden in a shopping bag, exploded as the minibus was driving from the center of the capital to a Shiite neighborhood, said police Maj. Mahir Hamad.

Such privately owned minibuses are frequently used as public transport in the capital.

The bodies of five Iraqis who had been kidnapped and killed were found in Baghdad, and six bodies were discovered in Karbala, 50 miles south of the Iraqi capital, police said. All the Karbala victims had been shot in the right eye, said police.

In southwest Baghdad, police received a tip that two men were traveling in the area with explosives hidden beneath their clothes, said police Capt. Jamil Hussein. After a brief gunbattle, the explosives detonated, killing both men, he said.

In other violence, five roadside bombs, two mortars and an attack by gunmen killed two Iraqis and wounded 17, six of them policemen, authorities said.

A string of shootings in Baghdad on Wednesday evening killed six more Iraqis — including a Sunni cleric and an army officer whose home was stormed by gunmen.

That raised to 108 the number of Iraqi civilians or police who have been killed in insurgency- or sectarian-related violence since al-Maliki was tapped as Iraq's prime minister designate on Saturday and asked to form a national unity government.

Iraqis Building Makeshift Roadblocks (AP)

By Antonio Castaneda

AP, April 26, 2006

They're set up on roads all around the Iraqi capital, sometimes rusty car skeletons, washing machines or home appliances piled together, sometimes piles of garbage or dirt. Often a gunman or two keeps watch for any strangers.

Desperate to protect their homes from sectarian violence, Baghdad's residents have turned to makeshift roadblocks. In some areas, the majority of streets are blocked off or protected by homemade barriers that slow traffic.

Some barriers have been in place for over a year in both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods. But many more have appeared since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra that ignited a wave of sectarian violence and left the country struggling to defuse another crisis.

"They increased twofold after Samarra," said 1st Lt. Brian Murphy of Eastchester, N.Y., assigned to the 8th Squadron, 10th Cavalry Regiment, 4th Infantry Division. "They're everywhere, in Shiite neighborhoods, Sunni ones."

Some of the barriers are sophisticated, built in curved "serpentine" shapes that allow traffic to pass at a reduced speed. Residents said this would allow them to fire back at roaming militants trying to gun down pedestrians.

Gunmen "would be surrounded if they did anything. We would be happy if we could have more" road barriers, said Sheik Nassar Khazal, a neighborhood leader in a cluster of apartment buildings in the religiously mixed neighborhood of Dora in south Baghdad.

As he spoke, two neighborhood guards dressed in black quietly watched a passing U.S. patrol. U.S. soldiers have received reports that some of the guards are Shiite militiamen led by radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whom Sunni leaders accuse of instigating much of the sectarian violence.

But some of the guards were thought to be Iraqis simply trying to protect their families as Iraqi troops remain overwhelmed by the insurgency. U.S. soldiers said some guards would quickly throw down their weapons as U.S. patrols approached, while other lookouts would keep their AK-47s in nearby homes.

In the wave of violence that has struck everything from elementary schools to marketplaces, the barriers have sprouted up around nearly every facility that could be a target.

"A lot of times they'll put them up in defense of their mosques or schools, or to slow down a (car bomb)," said 1st Lt. Chuck Williams of Laurel, Miss., assigned to the 2nd Battalion, 506th Regimental Combat Team, 101st Airborne Division. Some mosques in the area that Williams patrolled also had sandbagged rooftop positions.

American soldiers complained the barriers also had the unintended consequence of slowing down U.S. vehicles trying to catch insurgents or those responsible for sectarian killings.

As U.S. soldiers picked up concertina wire along a street and told bystanders not to build any more barriers, one resident responded: "We want to protect our areas from Sunnis." Graffiti threatening Shiite residents was all along the street.

"Well, tell them it doesn't allow us to protect them. It takes forever to weave through this," said Sgt. Nolan Dawson of Boise, Idaho, speaking to an Iraqi interpreter. "They don't understand."

Some soldiers, however, sympathized with residents.

"If you're not from the area and you're looking to start trouble, you might look at the barriers and figure everyone is watching," said Murphy.

Many residents gave much thought to the barriers, unpredictably moving them around to confuse possible attackers — a tactic apparently adopted from U.S. soldiers who guard bases and outposts.

"Tonight there are no barriers (on this street). But tomorrow another patrol may come by and they'll have to zigzag through here," said Sgt. 1st Class Charles Ilaoa of Tafuna, American Samoa, assigned to the 8th Squadron.

In some poorer Shiite slums, the barriers were simple mounds of rubbish piled four feet high. Elsewhere, large concrete barriers — the type that surround U.S. bases — were lined up on the roads. Soldiers said Iraqi police and paramilitary commandos had even helped residents put some in place.

"You know people want to keep people away when they use the washing machines," said Ilaoa.

For now, residents said the barriers were here to stay, or at least until they felt safe again in front of their own homes.

"Some strangers' vehicles come into our neighborhood and do crimes, so we put this here," explained Hassan Iman Hashem, a smiling Shiite man who used dirt and concrete blocks to cut off the road in front of his home. His children milled around the barrier as they watched a U.S. Humvee climb around the mound.

Behind The Chaotic Battle Lines In Iraq (TIME)

By Micahel Ware

Time, April 26, 2006

When Baghdad's notorious Adhamiya district exploded in vicious gun battles last week, few were really surprised. The area, rich with former army, intelligence and secret police officers from Saddam's regime, had been trumpeted by the U.S. military as a former insurgent hot spot brought under control — a success story in the effort to hand over more of the responsibilities for keeping order to the Iraqis. Yet most on the ground knew that beneath the suburb's surface, trouble still brewed. U.S. military intelligence believed the town was still being used by the Ba'ath insurgents as a command headquarters and logistics base, and American officers suspected that Iraqi commanders they're allied with had struck an accord with the guerrilla leadership, promising not to interfere as long as their troops were not attacked.

But all that came apart in the early hours of April 17 when a two-day firefight between local insurgents on one side and Iraqi soldiers and American GIs on the other broke out. Though the encounter was minimized by top U.S. military officials, the battle appears to have been a more serious outbreak of sectarian violence, between well-organized units of the insurgency and what military sources suspect was a Shi'ite death squad linked to the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

The basic facts of the battle are not in dispute. Some time between 1 a.m. and 3 a.m. on April 17 a well-known Iraqi army checkpoint at a prominent Adhamiya intersection came under intense fire from insurgent forces in the town. Other Iraqi units responded and a blazing battle ensued. American advisors from a Military Transition Team (MiTT) with the 101st Airborne, embedded within the battalion under attack, were called out and were soon fighting for their lives. A coalition quick-reaction force was summoned.

Though the severity of the battle was played down by official U.S. military spokesmen, officers on the ground tell a different story. "It lasted for about seven hours after we arrived, so the enemy was pretty determined. They did not just fade away," says the MiTT team chief Major Chuck Markos, whose men were hit with flurries of rocket propelled grenades and small arms fire. "It was significant." The exchanges lasted until shortly before lunch. By mid-day, the district was boarded up, bereft of traffic or life, but quiet. The next morning at about 6 a.m., hostilities started again, with several more hours of fighting before quiet finally returned. By week's end, the scene was tense but trouble free. Cars are back on the street, but many shops remain closed.

The question is exactly what triggered this battle and who fought it. Sunni community leaders claim that local residents grabbed whatever weapons they had to defend their homes from a sectarian attack by Shi'ite militias in government uniforms. They say night guards, akin to an armed neighborhood watch, fired back at roaming gunmen strafing them as they stood watch. However, American officers say the men they ended up fighting weren't mere homeowners. They used the fire and movement techniques of trained soldiers. "These guys who stood and fought were not just neighborhood types," says Markos, a steely artillery officer from Chattanooga, Tenn. Intelligence officer Capt. Joshua Brandon notes that "a lot of [insurgent] command and logistics comes out of here" and that, along with posters for the locals who died in the fight, "we see lists of martyrs who were not local residents."

One of those insurgent fighters confirmed these suspicions in a clandestine interview with TIME. Abu Marwan, an insurgent footsoldier from the Ansar al-Sunnah network, said that once the fighting broke out, his cell, along with those from other guerrilla groups, was brought in from surrounding quarters as reinforcements. Adhamiya is a safe haven for any number of anti-American organizations, which share intelligence and weapons and coordinate their activities. According to insurgent sources, the groups agreed that only sparing attacks would be launched locally so as not to attract U.S. attention. American brigade commander Col. Thomas Vail says the district's concentration of working poor made it easy for insurgents to hide. "It was easy sanctuary," he says.

Abu Marwan and his cell arrived in the afternoon of the first day's fighting, he says, but there was a lull while they waited for a counterattack that night. His job was to help defend the Abu Hanifa mosque, he says, and when combat resumed the next morning that's what he did. "We heard they were coming," he says of the Iraqi troops, "so we took our positions and started shooting at them from near the mosque. We used PKC [machine guns], RPGs, grenades, everything." The men of the 101st Airborne's MiTT have no reason to doubt him. A U.S. soldier told TIME days later of how RPG rounds had whizzed past his humvee, with one sliding right under it.

Though the insurgents admit to attacking the checkpoint identified by the Americans as ground zero, they claim they did not start the battle. Local clerics, municipal officials, community leaders and the insurgents themselves all say the hostilities were started by a raid from a "death squad" backed by the Ministry of Interior (MOI) — carloads of men in MOI uniforms and irregular forces in civilian clothes who entered Adhamiya after passed through the Iraqi army checkpoints. Indeed, sources within one prominent Shi'ite militia say their men were part of the Adhamiya raid, which was targeting top insurgent leaders holed up in a building. A report prepared by the local council for the Iraqi army claims the men arrived in police and civilian cars and that another group of men in military uniforms attacked from a second direction. The report claims it took 90 minutes before the army units stationed in the area intervened. By then the battle was in full fury, and it was left for the American and Iraqi soldiers to bear the onslaught.

The death squad claims are not far-fetched. Maj. Markos told TIME his men have previously "encountered unauthorized MOI elements" in Adhamiya conducting illegal "snatch and grab type activities." He says, "The bottom line is I can't tell you definitely [what started last week's battle]. But nothing is black and white here and I would be lying to say the MOI is never here." He adds, "We're definitely going to look into" the charges of death-squad involvement. Intelligence officer Brandon admits the fusion of legitimate government forces with militia is a problem. "So many players are tied to the government and to armed militias, and a lot of the time the interests overlap," he says. Major General Rick Lynch sums it up: "We don't know what happened yet." With the Iraqis set to assume more control of the war, and with newly anointed Prime Minister Jawad al-Maliki calling for more militias to be integrated into government forces, the murky battle at Adhamiya could be a harbinger of more troubles to come.

Army Plans To Charge Abu Ghraib Officer (AP-Y2)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP2, April 26, 2006

The Army is planning to charge a colonel with criminal offenses in connection with the abuse of prisoners at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, officials said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0026667

Formal charges are expected next week against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, which would make him the highest-ranking officer charged in the case, three defense officials said. They spoke only on condition of anonymity because Jordan had not yet been charged. They did not say specifically what the charges might be.

The abuse scandal broke in April 2004 when pictures of prisoner abuse were leaked to the news media. Prisoners had been beaten, sexually humiliated and forced to assume painful positions while being photographed.

Publication of the photos led to condemnation worldwide and triggered months of investigations, recriminations and a re-examination of U.S. policy on prisoners.

In Wednesday editions, The New York Times and The Washington Post quoted Jordan's former attorney Samuel Spitzberg as saying he expected the charges as early as this week. The lawyer said Jordan, a reservist who has remained on active duty for three years, is currently stationed in the Washington area.

Army spokesman Col. Joseph Curtin told The Associated Press on Tuesday that Jordan had not been charged. After any charges, the next step would be a preliminary hearing to determine whether a court-martial or other action was warranted.

Nearly a dozen soldiers have been convicted in connection with Abu Ghraib, many of them contending they were following orders aimed at preparing prisoners for interrogation. The U.S. military has also opened at least 400 investigations of prisoner abuse allegations.

Meanwhile, human rights groups said Wednesday that allegations of detainee abuse, torture and killings have now implicated at least 600 U.S. military and civilian personnel deployed to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as to the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, prison for terrorist suspects.

Those findings counter the Pentagon's assertion that Abu Ghraib was an aberration, according to a report compiled by the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights Watch and Human Rights First.

"Two years ago, U.S. officials said the abuses at Abu Ghraib were aberrations and that people who abused detainees would be brought to justice," said Meg Satterthwaite, a professor at the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice at New York University Law School.

"Our research shows that detainee abuses were widespread ... and few people have truly been brought to justice," she said in a statement.

In response to similar criticism over the past two years, Pentagon officials have defended the Defense Department's response to the Abu Ghraib abuse, calling it one of the most closely scrutinized matters in the history of the military.

The groups said they researched and analyzed tens of thousands of pages of government documents, interviews with witnesses and victims and previous Pentagon probes into the abuse.

"We've seen a series of halfhearted investigations and slaps on the wrist," said Tom Malinowski of Human Rights Watch. "The government seems more interested in managing the detainee abuse scandal than in addressing the underlying problems that caused it."

Hundreds Of Detainees Abused, Report Finds (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Three human rights groups said Wednesday that they had found credible evidence that U.S. troops and government civilians in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had abused, tortured or killed at least 460 detainees.

The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved. The findings are in a report by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch.

At least 600 U.S. service members or civilians have been implicated in the cases of abuse. About 400 of them have been investigated, and only one-third of those who have been investigated have faced punishment of any kind, researchers said.

Also Wednesday, Army officials confirmed that criminal charges were being considered against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan for his role in the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Col. Joe Curtin, an Army spokesman, said no decision had been made.

Jordan is the former head of the interrogation center at Abu Ghraib. If he's charged, he would be the highest-ranking officer charged in a case of detainee abuse.

The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers.

It shows that detainee abuse has been more widespread that government officials have admitted and the American military and other government agencies have made only limited attempts to investigate and punish those responsible, the rights groups charged.

"Our findings show that the abuses and torture revealed in the Abu Ghraib photos were not the isolated acts of individual soldiers," said Meg Satterwhite, the faculty director of the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice.

The Pentagon wouldn't address specific findings in the report. A spokesman said the Defense Department had investigated more than 600 allegations of abuse and had held more than 250 service members responsible.

Of the 12 major reviews of U.S. military detention operations that have been conducted, "none of them found that the department directed, sanctioned, encouraged or condoned abuse," said Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman.

"When there have been allegations of wrongdoing, they are taken seriously, investigated thoroughly and individuals are held accountable when appropriate," he said.

Tom Malinowski, the Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, said recent interviews with troops suggested that detainee abuse was less widespread than it was two years ago. But he and other researchers said civilian and military leaders needed to send a strong message that abuse wouldn't be tolerated and would be punished.

The 27-page report was based primarily on government documents, interviews with witnesses and victims, military investigation reports, court documents, detainee accounts provided by attorneys, official military statements and news accounts.

It said the alleged abuses included assault, humiliation, sexual assault or abuse, and stress techniques.

According to the report:

-Fifty-four military service members have been convicted by courts-martial in prisoner abuse cases. Of these, 40 were sentenced to prison time. The average sentence was four months. Ten of those sentenced received terms of more than a year.

More important, according to the researchers, only three officers have been convicted by courts-martial for detainee abuse. The highest-ranking was a major. No officers have been held accountable for any criminal acts committed by troops under their command.

-Of the 20 civilians referred to the Justice Department for criminal prosecution in cases of abuse, only one - a contractor - has been indicted.

-Most of the punishments meted out have been administrative, such as reduction of rank, fines or temporary confinement to base.

The researchers charged that their findings illustrated a lack of accountability over detainee abuse throughout the military and the civilian chain of command.

Danger Attaches To Sunni Names (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Zaid Sabah

USA Today, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Omar Ali al-Dulaimi had always been proud of his first name. It's a strong, Sunni-sounding name that honors a seventh-century caliph and revered figure in Sunni Muslim history.

Last week, however, he paid $60 to get a fake ID card and become “Mohammed.” Lately, it's too dangerous to sound Sunni, he says.

“It's a form of stolen freedom,” says al-Dulaimi, 34, a mobile phone sales representative who lives in Baghdad with his wife and two young children. “But we need to be cautious. Each day I go to work, my family doesn't know if I'll return.”

DOJ_NMG_0026669

Iraqis in Baghdad named Omar or Othman — two of the most recognizable names identified with Sunni Islam — are getting fake IDs, changing their names legally in court, even teaching their young children to say more neutral-sounding names if asked, al-Dulaimi says.

Some names, such as Ali, Mohammed and Ahmed, are common among both Sunnis and Shiite Muslims. But Omar and Othman are linked mostly with Sunnis.

The rush to mask identities underscores the increased sectarian tensions in Iraq since February's bombing of a sacred Shiite mosque in Samarra. The attack led to reprisals by Shiite gunmen and continuing violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

Bullet-ridden bodies are regularly found around Baghdad. Some are victims of sectarian killings. Hussam al-Jubouri, a human rights officer with the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party, says his office has counted 544 Sunnis killed since the bombing Feb. 22. Those numbers could not be independently verified.

"Many of them were named Omar, and others were killed because of their Sunni tribal names," he says. "Every day, there are 10 to 15 Sunnis killed."

Ali al-Obeidi had long been known to clients and friends as "Abu Omar," or "Father of Omar." It is common among Iraqis to take the name of one's eldest son in this fashion. But shortly after the shrine attack in Samarra, customers at his money-exchange shop in Baghdad's al-Khadra neighborhood stopped calling him Abu Omar. His 13-year-old son, Omar, was taunted at school for his name, al-Obeidi says.

He got scared after reading about Sunnis being targeted for their names, he says. So he took his son to the registry office downtown and had his name legally changed from Omar to the more neutral-sounding Samir.

"These problems did not exist before, but they will continue for years," al-Obeidi says. "I just needed to protect my son from future sectarian threats."

Gen. Ali Ghaleb, deputy interior minister for police affairs, acknowledges that some people are targeted because of their names and says it is not surprising that people would want to conceal their identities. "A human being has the right to protect himself by all means," he says. "Even our officers don't always carry their police IDs on them to protect themselves."

Omar and Othman represent two of the most revered figures in Sunni history: Omar Bin Al-Khattab and Othman Bin Affan, seventh-century caliphs revered by Sunnis but considered illegitimate by many Shiites.

Sunni Arabs represent about 20% of Iraq's 26 million people, but they have long dominated Iraq's ruling class. Shiites, about 60% of the population, were oppressed under Saddam Hussein, particularly after the Gulf War of 1991 when Kurds and Shiites unsuccessfully rose up against the regime.

In Baghdad and other parts of Iraq, secular Shiites and Sunnis have lived together for years. Some tribes or extended families have both Sunni and Shiite branches.

Al-Dulaimi says he first noticed targeted killings of Sunnis and Shiites last summer, about the time Shiites gained control of the Interior Ministry, which handles internal security. In July, his cousin, also a Sunni, was arrested in a raid in Baghdad's predominantly Sunni Adamiyah neighborhood and was never seen again, al-Dulaimi says.

After the Samarra bombing, the violence intensified. Shortly after the attack, he says, he and a friend were stopped at a police checkpoint in southwestern Baghdad on their way to work and made to show their identity cards. Commenting on their names and neighborhoods, the officers forced them out of their car and searched it for weapons, al-Dulaimi says. Though they had taken that route many times, they had never been searched or questioned, he says.

They were released, al-Dulaimi says, but he made up his mind to change his name. Many of his friends are doing the same, he says.

He says he doesn't expect improvement with the new government. "They've already planted the seeds of sectarian violence," he says. "It could never go back to how it was."

Six-Nation Bloc Plans Anti-Terror Maneuvers (WP)

By Edward Cody

DOJ_NMG_0026670

BEIJING, April 26 -- China, Russia and four Central Asian nations announced Wednesday that they will hold joint anti-terrorism exercises next year, emphasizing a desire to balance U.S. military influence in Asia with stepped-up preparations of their own.

The regional security grouping, known as the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, includes Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. Its activities have centered mainly on guarding against cross-border threats to internal stability, particularly from militant Islamic groups.

Guo Boxiong, vice chairman of the Chinese Communist Party's Central Military Commission, said the plans for joint drills demonstrate the group's growing role in maintaining security in the region, the official New China News Agency said. He vowed that defense ministers from the six nations will work together to combat what China calls the "three forces" -- separatism, terrorism and extremism -- that threaten to provoke unrest in the area.

In a communique, the six nations said next year's exercises will be held in Russia. They did not detail what activities were planned. But the Russian defense minister, Sergei Ivanov, told reporters here that the exercises will be designed by a group of military and anti-terrorism experts to enhance regional security coordination and are not aimed at any third country.

In China's case, the threat has mainly come from Uighur separatists in the heavily Muslim Xinjiang autonomous region of western China. Through common Turkic languages and history, the estimated 8 million Uighur people have maintained ties to their Central Asian neighbors even as the region increasingly is populated by China's Han majority. As a result, Beijing is eager to cultivate influence with the governments of those nations, lest Uighur militants find support and encouragement from across the borders.

China also has a growing stake in maintaining a stable environment in Central Asia, which is a source of oil and gas for the energy-hungry Chinese economy. Although Russia traditionally has played a leading role in the region -- the nations of Central Asia were Soviet satellites -- Chinese diplomacy and trade have established a significant presence in recent years. The Shanghai Cooperation Organization was formally organized in 2001 under Chinese leadership.

The first joint anti-terrorism maneuvers by the group were held in 2003, although Uzbekistan did not participate. They included some exercises in the Xinjiang region.

Separately, China and Russia held bilateral military exercises last August. They were billed as a drill against ethnic unrest but also were interpreted as a demonstration that Beijing and Moscow want the United States to understand it is not the only guarantor of security in the region despite its dominant role since World War II.

Army Moving To Secure Data At Afghan Base (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

After reports of thefts, the chief of staff says troops are being trained in the proper use and protection of computer memory drives.

WASHINGTON — The Army's chief of staff said Wednesday that he was frustrated by security lapses at Bagram air base in Afghanistan that led to the loss of potentially sensitive data, and that the military must learn how to be more careful with new technology.

Weeks after revelations that flash drives carrying sensitive and classified information have turned up for sale in a bazaar outside Bagram, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said the Army was trying to improve how soldiers used and secured flash drives.

"We have been working hard to educate the force to develop policies to make sure everyone understands what the vulnerabilities are," he said.

A market for used computer memory drives has sprung up outside the Bagram base. On April 10, The Times reported that drives being sold at a marketplace just outside the base gate contained documents and files labeled as secret. Although some of the information had been deleted, it was easily reconstructed with software available on the Internet.

Documents on some of the drives appeared to contain the names, photographs and telephone numbers of Afghan informants aiding U.S. forces.

After the disclosure, the military began a criminal investigation and tightened security at the base. But last weekend, more drives with sensitive data were again being sold at the Bagram bazaar. One smuggler told The Times that he sold four memory drives to a local shopkeeper after a shift change Sunday afternoon.

At the request of military officials, The Times on Wednesday returned the flash drives it had purchased at the Bagram bazaar.

U.S. military officials have been vague about the steps they are taking to improve security practices in Afghanistan and throughout the armed forces.

The military is "making all attempts to protect the identities of people who are helping us to defeat the enemy," Col. Thomas Collins, a spokesman for the U.S. military in Afghanistan, wrote in an e-mail.

Collins and other officers familiar with the situation in Bagram said they believed the security improvements made after the first disclosures of stolen drives were working.

Schoomaker's comments came as members of Congress said this week that they wanted to learn more about what commanders were doing to stop the security lapses. Sen. Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said it was disconcerting to learn information was still being stolen, even after the original security crackdown by the military.

"I have to be concerned," he said. "It seems that materials of varying degrees of sensitivity are being pilfered from the base and sold in the markets of Bagram."

Lawmakers say they are having difficulty assessing the extent of potential damage from the sale of the drives from Bagram, which houses a detention and interrogation center for terrorism suspects flown in from around the world.

Reed said he was waiting to hear more from the military about the steps officials were taking to protect Afghans who had been aiding U.S. forces.

Rep. Vic Snyder (D-Ark.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said the thefts had shown the Army one of the "perils of modern warfare."

"The more you are dependent on computers, the more you are at risk of some of the hazards of computers," he said. "You can really have a lot of stuff walk off in something just 3 inches by an inch [long]."

Flash memory drives, also called thumb drives or jump drives, are as common in the military as they are in civilian life. Soldiers are supposed to treat drives that hold classified information as sensitively as a file folder marked "top secret."

Last year, the Army formed an organization called the OpSec Support Element, which has been assigned to renew attention on security. Army officials said that Schoomaker had begun pushing for a new emphasis on operational security, particularly with electronic data.

Speaking at a breakfast meeting of defense writers on Wednesday, Schoomaker said it was not realistic to stop using technology such as flash drives.

"Cellphones, cellphones that take pictures, all of this stuff including things like thumb drives and flash drives, these are great innovations," he said. "But they have tremendous liabilities."

The general, who is known for occasional folksy metaphors, suggested the military must learn to be more careful with what it puts on the drives, and where the drives are left. "You don't put the family cat," he said, "into the microwave."

Reed, who visited Afghanistan in January, said the military was trying to balance security with economic development. Keeping Afghans off the base would cut them off from an important source of jobs, he said. Nevertheless, Reed said the command needed to find a way to prevent loss of military secrets.

"You have this impetus to employ indigenous workers," Reed said. "But then you have the problem if some of them are engaging in theft. That poses a dilemma. And that is the situation we face right now."

Suit Claims Illegal Use Of Recruitment Database (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- The Defense Department is violating the privacy of millions of high school students nationwide with a detailed database it uses for military recruitment, a federal lawsuit filed Monday claims.

The New York Civil Liberties Union sued on behalf of six high schoolers, saying the department is ignoring privacy rules set by Congress regarding the collection and distribution of students' personal information.

Military officials have said they have about 30 million names in the database. The Pentagon said last year the list includes high school students ages 16-18 and college students, and includes such information as the students' Social Security numbers, gender and race.

Hope Reichbach, a 17-year-old senior at Hunter College High School in Manhattan and a plaintiff, said she contacted the NYCLU after she had tried unsuccessfully to get her name removed from lists and databases that she said subjected her to repeated phone calls from military recruiters.

"I want them to leave me and other students alone," Reichbach said.

The department is flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private, the lawsuit said.

The current database includes information on 16-year-olds, is storing the information for five years and is being shared with law enforcement and other agencies, the lawsuit said.

Megan Gaffney, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office, declined to comment on the lawsuit Monday.

The plaintiffs are six 16- and 17-year-old students who don't know if they are included in the database, but who object to it, lawyers said.

"Our clients don't wish to join the military," said Corey Stoughton, an NYCLU attorney. "And they don't want their genders, ethnicities and social security numbers collected and distributed."

Gang Activity Brings Attorney General To Tampa (TAMPTRIB)

By Anthony McCartney

Tampa Tribune, April 27, 2006

TAMPA â€“ Saying gangs represent a threat to the â€œAmerican dream,â€• U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced a $2.5 million grant to combat the spread of gangs in Hillsborough County.

Gonzales spent about half a day in Tampa and Hillsborough County, touring the site of a suspected gang shooting that killed two people in February and the shooting of a deputy with a BB gun days later.

But Gonzalesâ€™ tour of Tampa and northwest Hillsborough County touched on numerous other topics, including opportunity, education and immigration.

He spoke to a group of students at Leto High School, who he said were curious about his security detail, immigration and whether he had any presidential ambitions. (He didnâ€™t indicate any to a group of reporters later.)

During the session, Gonzales said he sought to draw parallels between the studentsâ€™ lives and his own. â€œTheir high school looked like my high school,â€• he said.

Gonzales acknowledged that the Tampa Bay area is not a hub of gang activity that other cities awarded the grant are, but said even one gang member poses a threat to the community.

â€œOne gang member represents a productive member of society â€¦ who may be lost,â€• Gonzales said.

He said the county presented the Department of Justice a thorough and â€œâ€•well-thought-out planâ€• that would prevent further gang encroachment.

The other areas awarded Justice Department grants were Los Angeles, Dallas-Forth Worth, Milwaukee, Cleveland and a corridor that stretches from Easton to Lancaster, Pa.

Gonzales said the $2.5 million would be divided this way: $1 million for education programs, $1 million for enforcement and $500,000 to try to prevent suspected gang members who are arrested or convicted from returning to a life of crime.

US Attorney General Says Tampa Will Get Money To Combat Gang Activity (WUSF)

By VALERIE INGRAM

WUSF AM , Tampa, April 27, 2006

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales TAMPA (2006-04-26) Tampa is one of six U.S. cities receiving a $2.5-million grant from the Department of Justice. Earlier this year two former Leto High School students were killed during a gang related gun battle in Town and Country.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales visited the school and spoke with students like 17 year old Saed El-Hadri.

SAED: He talked about gang related things around our neighborhood and how we needed to stay in school and don't be associated with gangs cause you won't go notwhere in life.

Gonzales also met with local law enforcement and community leaders.

GONZALES: My general impression is that people understand that they want to focus on this as an issue and they've developed a good plan to deal with it, so I'm optimistic that working together we'll see success here in dealing with this issue.

He says the anti gang grant will be used on education, law enforcement and community re-integration programs for former felons.

Heaton Picked For U.S. Attorney (SSJR)

By BERNARD SCHOENBURG, POLITICAL WRITER

Springfield (IL) State Journal-Register, April 27, 2006

Bush sticks with interim holder of the position

Rodger Heaton, interim U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, is President Bush's choice to continue as the top prosecutor in the region, The State Journal-Register has learned.

"The White House has made the decision," according to a local Republican source.

Copley News Service reported last week that the three people whose names had been forwarded to the White House by House Speaker Dennis Hastert and GOP congressional colleagues were: Heaton; Darin LaHood, the son of U.S. Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Peoria; and John Michelich, an Auburn native who works for the U.S. Department of Justice.

A White House spokesman said Tuesday that no decision on the prosecutor has been announced. Senate confirmation is required.

The U.S. attorney for the 46-county central region oversees prosecution of federal crimes in the area.

Sharon Paul, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield, said Heaton considers it a privilege to be serving in his current position. He is "hopeful he'll be nominated, but as yet he hasn't been notified of any decision," she said Tuesday.

Heaton, 46, was appointed to the interim post as of Dec. 1 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Heaton replaced U.S. Attorney Jan Paul Miller, who took a job with a St. Louis law firm.

Heaton began his career as a federal prosecutor in Indianapolis in 1989 before transferring to the U.S. attorney's office in central Illinois. He was an assistant U.S. attorney from July 1990 to December 2000. From January 2001 to April 2003, he was a litigation partner with Kirkland & Ellis in Chicago. He returned to the federal prosecutor's office in May 2003 as chief of the civil division.

From September 1997 to July 1998, he was assigned to help independent counsel Kenneth Starr in the Whitewater investigation. In that capacity, he handled the tax-evasion prosecution of former Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker, who resigned his office.

Also in 1997, Heaton was a prosecutor in the case of Management Services of Illinois, in which a jury in Springfield found the company, a co-owner and a former state Department of Public Aid administrator guilty of mail fraud and bribery.

Heaton has been an adjunct professor at the University of Illinois College of Law, where he taught courses in white-collar crime. He was on the Rochester School Board from 1995 to 1999.

Darin LaHood recently moved to Peoria from Las Vegas, where he was lead terrorism prosecutor. He now works in the law firm of Miller, Hall and Triggs.

Michelich has worked in a variety of roles with the Department of Justice since 1988, including time in The Hague, helping with investigation and prosecution of war crimes in the former Yugoslavia. He is a former assistant state's attorney in Sangamon County.

State Sen. Rick Winkel, R-Urbana, was also a candidate for the job. And Kent Gray, chairman of the Lincoln Land Community College board and an attorney with the Springfield firm of Giffin, Winning, Cohen & Bodewes, said Tuesday that he, too, applied for the job and was interviewed by Hastert and others in Washington.

Justice To Make Case Management More Inclusive (GCN)

By Jason Miller, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, April 27, 2006

While the Justice Department was bogged down in awarding a $305 million contract for its do-over case management system called Sentinel, the Line of Business Consolidation initiative for a similar effort was treading water.

But with Sentinel awarded earlier this year to Lockheed Martin Corp., the Office of Management and Budget is pushing Justice to include all agencies under the LOB umbrella.

For litigation case management, Justice, which completed the target architecture in fiscal 2005, now will work with any agency that is involved with litigation, according to an administration official familiar with the LOB.

These agencies include the Environmental Protection Agency, IRS, Securities and Exchange Commission and many more.

“We know it’s more than just the Justice Department and we want to make sure whoever is going forward with a litigation system either builds onto or adds to the Justice system,” the official said. “If we are going to build many times, we want to use a similar architecture so the systems can share information and components easily.”

Justice and OMB held a meeting last week to develop the plan with new LOB program manger Paul Garrett, who took over for Price Roe in March.

For the federal investigative case management system, the second piece of the LOB—of which Sentinel is one part—the official said the goal is to get Justice, the Homeland Security Department and any other agency that does investigations to work more closely together. Justice also developed the target architecture for the case management system and held an industry day last fall.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Get First Shot At Lay (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON -- Under hard questioning by a federal prosecutor, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay1 admitted that he probably violated the company's code of ethics and had to fend off accusations of hypocrisy and attempted witness tampering.

The confrontation with prosecutor John Hueston came as the government began its questioning after Mr. Lay spent nearly three days testifying in his own defense. The two men clashed sharply as Mr. Hueston pushed to ruffle the usually affable Mr. Lay.

The witness angrily denied Mr. Hueston's allegations that calls he made as recently as this month to potential trial witnesses were attempts to improperly influence them to agree with his version of events. "You are distorting the phrase 'in agreement with my story,' " Mr. Lay shot back, adding that, "I don't have a story." Mr. Lay said he made the calls to educate himself and confirm his own recollections of events.

The possible ethics-code violation concerned a $120,000 investment Mr. Lay made in a private Internet company called PhotoFete.com Inc. The PhotoFete issue first arose during the testimony of Mr. Lay's co-defendant, Jeffrey Skilling2, who had made about a $160,000 investment in the firm, which did about $450,000 of business with Enron. Messrs. Lay and Skilling were supposed to notify Enron's board about the potential conflict of interest.

The government has accused the two of allowing former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow3 to run conflict-laden private partnerships that helped manipulate company results. However, neither defendant is charged with wrongdoing in connection with PhotoFete or approaches to potential witnesses.

Mr. Hueston also attempted to portray Mr. Lay as a hypocrite. The prosecutor said that Mr. Lay stood by as one of his attorneys, outside the courthouse, disparaged a government witness, former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan4 Jr., as a "monkey." (The attorney's full phrase was "performing monkey.") Mr. Hueston asked whether Mr. Lay later approached the witness in private and offered him sympathy. "One message for the outside world and one message for the inside world," said the prosecutor.

Mr. Lay said he was merely trying to comfort Mr. Glisan in a tough situation. Mr. Hueston shot back, "You made him feel better by calling him a monkey?" Mr. Lay said he didn't recall what his attorney said. "I can't take full responsibility for what my lawyers say or do," he added.

Under questioning by his own attorney, Mr. Lay defended his decision not to disclose in 2001 that he cashed in some $70 million of Enron stock. He said such disclosure wasn't required and that such news "would not have been a positive event in the marketplace." Mr. Lay isn't accused of insider trading, but has received much public criticism for cashing in the stock before Enron's December 2001 bankruptcy filing.

Prosecutors contend that Mr. Lay misled Enron employees in September 2001 about the transactions. Mr. Lay said he didn't mention cashing in his shares because he viewed them as "forced sales" and "not indicative of my optimism in Enron." Mr. Lay said he cashed in the stock only to meet pressing margin calls on personal loans.

To charges that he misled the public in 2001, Mr. Lay said that he relied in good faith on a variety of accountants, lawyers and company subordinates when he made upbeat statements about Enron.

Enron Founder's Testimony Is Fiery (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON, April 26 -- A federal prosecutor accused Enron Corp. founder Kenneth L. Lay of trying to influence the testimony of witnesses in Lay's fraud trial and blasted him for failing to disclose a conflict of interest in the scorching start to his cross-examination Wednesday.

Lay, 64, grew furious at the government attack, pointing his finger and answering questions from Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston in an increasingly aggressive tone.

Hueston began his presentation by throwing back at Lay a quote from his own lawyer's opening statement three months ago: "By our deeds we are known." The prosecutor followed up with unrelenting questions designed to cast doubt on actions Lay took before the energy trader hurtled into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Government lawyers contend that Lay misrepresented Enron's health in a series of public statements to employees and investors in its waning months -- accusations that Lay, who once stood at the center of Houston society and hobnobbed with the Bush family, denied vehemently as a form of character assassination.

Hueston also presented quotes from one of Lay's defense lawyers, who told reporters earlier in the trial that former Enron treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr. was "a performing monkey" who "contradicted the theory of intelligent design." Glisan, who pleaded guilty and is serving a five-year prison sentence, testified that he informed Lay about Enron's dire financial problems, providing some of the most potentially damaging testimony against him.

"Did you engage in character assassination of witnesses?" the prosecutor asked.

Lay replied sharply, "Are you considering yourself? I just want to make sure I understand who's on that list."

Hueston, who has drawn Lay's ire for years as the main investigator in the case against him, shot back: "Mr. Lay, I'm an assistant U.S. attorney. This is my job. You may call me anything you want."

A clutch of Lay's relatives and friends, including his pastor, spilled over into a second bench of the courtroom Wednesday, and spectators vied for a better view of what could be the pivotal moment in a case that launched an era of business scandals. How the eight-woman, four-man jury assesses the credibility of Lay and his fellow defendant, Jeffrey K. Skilling, who finished his own testimony last week, could be a decisive factor in its verdict. Both Lay and Skilling, 52, face more than a decade behind bars if they are convicted.

Hueston asserted that Lay had placed several phone calls to friends at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. in the course of the trial, seeking to find witnesses who would discredit the account of a Sept. 6, 2001, meeting given by former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, one of the government's key witnesses. The prosecutor also claimed Lay had tried to reach another witness, risk analyst Vincent J. Kaminski, through an intermediary just days before he began his testimony. Lay said he "did not recall" whether Kaminski was a likely government witness, even though his name appeared on lists provided to the defense.

"You were trying to recruit people to say what you wanted them to say," Hueston charged. Lay retorted that he didn't have a "story" he was trying to get straight, as prosecutors claimed.

The prosecutor noted that Lay, who resumed day-to-day control of Enron after Skilling resigned abruptly in August 2001, received frequent updates on the company's finances. Lay said he did not recall those documents, partly because he said he depended on Skilling to notify him about trouble spots. Lay also said he performed only brief reviews of securities filings and scripts of presentations to investment analysts, an issue the government is likely to revisit.

Hueston also asserted that Lay violated the company's code of ethics by not disclosing to the board of directors his $120,000 personal investment in Photofete Inc., an online photography company that won about $400,000 in contracts from Enron. Lay said he had "forgotten about this investment altogether" until prosecutors used it against Skilling, who also invested in the company, in cross-examination last week. Lay conceded that he did not get board approval for his investment, which he characterized as small.

The afternoon's verbal fireworks stood in stark contrast to Lay's 2 1/2 days of more deferential direct questioning by defense lawyer George "Mac" Secrest. Lay, who has called himself a decentralized manager, repeatedly interrupted his own lawyer to correct him on minor points and to offer extended lectures about business issues, even as jurors' attention wandered and they failed to respond to his jokes. The defense drew emphatic warnings from the judge this week to accelerate the pace and focus on relevant information.

Hueston, who is likely to continue questioning Lay into next week, has yet to focus in depth on one of the most inflammatory issues in the case: Lay's use of an Enron credit line to sell $77 million worth of stock back to the company in its final weeks.

Earlier Wednesday, jurors heard Lay talk about mounting financial pressures as banks sought to call in tens of millions of dollars in loans he used to buy stock. Lay testified he could not unload his $4 million Houston penthouse; three Aspen, Colo., homes; and properties in Galveston, Tex., quickly enough, leading him into "forced sales" of stock back to the company in late 2001. Lay said he received advice that the sales comported with the law, and his lawyer pointed out twice that he had not been charged with insider trading. He testified that he had tried to reach a settlement over the $7.5 million he still owed Enron but added in an impassioned tone, "it was not finalized because John Hueston blocked that deal."

Even so, the sales could prove inflammatory, as underscored by a loud whisper by one spectator to his wife when the numbers were unveiled. "Seventy-seven million dollars!" he exclaimed.

On a positive note for Lay, the judge indicated that he is likely to reject a government proposal to argue that Lay engaged in a pattern of turning a blind eye to trouble, based on a 1987 trading scandal in Enron's New York operations. Also Wednesday, jurors unanimously agreed to extend court hours after the judge warned them the case was likely to eat up at least three more weeks. The jurors used the words "bear hug" to describe their decision, a joking reference to illegal, unwritten agreements prosecutors say Enron insiders employed.

Lay Loses His Cool On Stand (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo And Simon Romero

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON, April 26 — After waiting 13 weeks to respond to his accusers, Kenneth L. Lay lost his legendary cool on the witness stand Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0026677

Just minutes into his cross-examination by a prosecutor, John Hueston, Mr. Lay, Enron's founder and former chief executive, testily accused Mr. Hueston of personally preventing him from repaying a company credit line Mr. Lay had used to shore up his personal finances.

"Mr. Hueston, you know you blocked it," Mr. Lay said, his voice booming. "It's a simple answer."

Mr. Lay also struggled Wednesday to restrain his agitation when Mr. Hueston suggested that Mr. Lay had tried to tamper with potential government witnesses.

Before he took the stand, a number of legal experts had predicted that Mr. Lay would use the same folksy charm he employed during his heyday as the public face of Enron to seek to win over the 12 jurors deciding his fate in the criminal fraud trial here. But during his three days so far as a witness, Mr. Lay has found it harder and harder to maintain a kindly grandfatherly image.

Instead, Mr. Lay, 64, has become increasingly agitated, at times reacting impatiently even to his own lawyer, George McCall Secrest Jr., and lashing out at what Mr. Lay portrayed as a cabal of former Enron executives, investors and journalists whom he repeatedly blamed for the company's downfall in late 2001.

The contrast to his fellow defendant, Jeffrey K. Skilling, was particularly striking. Despite a much harsher reputation for arrogance, Mr. Skilling, in his two weeks on the stand, generally maintained his composure with only a few exceptions.

In the first 90 minutes of a cross-examination that is expected to continue at least to Monday, Mr. Lay also found himself on the defensive over a matter that tripped up Mr. Skilling as well. Mr. Lay acknowledged that he had violated Enron's code of ethics by investing $120,000 in Photofête, the same photo-sharing company that Mr. Skilling had supported, in part because it was run by Mr. Skilling's girlfriend at the time.

In testimony critical to his defense, Mr. Lay also insisted on Wednesday that he borrowed $77.5 million from Enron in the months before it collapsed to pay personal bank debts, not because he knew that the company was about to implode. Mr. Lay was under pressure to repay the loans from banks, which were issuing margin calls because of Enron's falling stock price. The margin calls required Mr. Lay to pay his debt in cash or face the prospect that the banks would sell the Enron shares he was using as collateral. He was seeking to counter government suggestions that his stock sales showed he knew Enron had serious problems.

Mr. Lay said Wednesday that he was "fighting off bankruptcy myself" at the time.

Mr. Lay boiled over even before Mr. Hueston began his cross-examination Wednesday. In a long discussion of his deteriorating personal financial situation, Mr. Lay lashed out when questioned by Mr. Secrest about efforts Mr. Lay said he had made to repay several million dollars owed on an Enron credit line.

Mr. Lay testified that he used the final $1 million he borrowed from the line, which was backed by his Enron shares, to pay the mortgage on his $4 million Houston condominium. At the time plaintiffs' lawyers were seeking to freeze the assets of Enron executives and, Mr. Lay said, he was concerned that he would be "left without a place to live." Mr. Lay said he tried to work out a deal with Enron's creditors after the company declared bankruptcy. When asked by Mr. Secrest why a deal was not consummated, Mr. Lay nearly jumped out of the witness box.

"It was not finished because John Hueston blocked that deal," he said loudly as he pointed with an outstretched arm at Mr. Hueston.

When Mr. Hueston took over, he challenged Mr. Lay over whether he had ever repaid the last $7.5 million he owed on the Enron credit line, evoking a response that it was the prosecutor himself who had prevented him from paying the debt.

When Mr. Hueston pressed, Mr. Lay retorted: "Mr. Hueston, when I was sworn in here it was to tell the whole truth, not just in part."

Mr. Hueston then drew Mr. Lay's ire by asking him about efforts to reach out to potential government witnesses and what the prosecutor described as "character assassination" of government witnesses.

Mr. Lay, his voice rising, responded, "Are you considering yourself?"

Mr. Hueston questioned Mr. Lay about comments by Mr. Lay's lawyers, who described the former Enron treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr., as a "monkey" and a "liar" to reporters after Mr. Glisan testified last month about fraudulent activities at Enron. "I can't take full responsibility for what my attorneys do," Mr. Lay said.

Mr. Lay acknowledged that he had tried to meet with some of the witnesses against him, including Vincent J. Kaminski, the former Enron risk management specialist. Under questioning, Mr. Lay said he sought Mr. Kaminski out in a bid to arrange a private chat over coffee just nine days before he testified in the government's case.

Mr. Hueston also suggested that Mr. Lay was trying to tamper with a witness when he spoke with an executive and longtime friend in the Houston office of Goldman Sachs, which was one of Enron's most prominent former investment banks. Mr. Hueston asked whether Mr. Lay was trying to "recruit people" at the bank to convey Mr. Lay's version of events in the trial, a suggestion that Mr. Lay angrily denied.

Earlier Wednesday, Mr. Lay described the deterioration of his personal finances, saying his net worth had dwindled to "about a quarter of a million dollars negative." Mr. Lay earned $223 million in total compensation from 1999 to 2001 but was $100 million in debt by early 2001, he said.

"Where does $100 million go?" Mr. Secrest asked.

Mr. Lay said he was forced to sell his three homes in Aspen, Colo., and three others in Galveston, Tex., to pay legal fees and other debts. What remains are his Houston condominium and three cars. But he acknowledged that he had lived very well for a long time.

"Happily," he said, "we achieved the American dream."

That comment drew a muffled laugh from a spectator in the courtroom, which was packed with ordinary Houston citizens on Wednesday.

Mr. Lay said his investment advisers and his wife had urged him to diversify his holdings — roughly 80 percent of his net worth was tied up in Enron shares or stock options. "But very simply," he testified, "I had great confidence in Enron and Enron stock."

Lay Denies Accusation Of Witness Tampering In Enron Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay dropped his affable persona as his cross-examination began Wednesday, snarling at a prosecutor who accused him of witness tampering when Lay called several potential witnesses during his fraud and conspiracy trial.

Jurors who had been listening impassively snapped to attention.

"Did you have any conversations to get your story straight for trial?" asked prosecutor John Hueston.

"Can you elaborate on that Mr. Hueston?" Lay shot back. "I'm not sure what story you're talking about."

The prosecutor noted that Lay called two Goldman Sachs & Co. executives during the trial regarding a September 2001 meeting about Enron.

Former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow - whom Lay has dubbed a traitor, liar and crook - testified that he and Lay met with the executives to discuss restructuring Enron at the same time Lay was telling employees and reporters that the company was sound. Lay says the executives called the meeting to discuss Enron's vulnerability to a takeover.

Lay said he called the executives in March - the same month Fastow testified - but he said he did not try to align their memories of the meeting with his.

"I was trying to make sure some facts I had about a meeting we had in the fall of 2001 was right. I was just trying to make sure that all of my facts were as accurate as they could be," he declared, noting further that Fastow "gave a fake version of that meeting."

Hueston noted that Goldman Sachs attorneys warned Lay to stop calling the executives directly, a fact to which Lay glumly replied, "Uh, yeah."

Lay, known in Houston for his avuncular, polite persona and who frequently headlined charity events, shed any pretenses to his usual diplomacy when faced with the prosecutor who secured his indictment in July 2004. Lay's visible anger and Hueston's rapid-fire questioning produced an electricity that has been absent from the trial, even during almost eight days of testimony from his far scrappier co-defendant, former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling.

After a short afternoon break, Lay appeared to calm down.

Lay also acknowledged he tried to contact Vince Kaminski, a former top risk analyst for Enron, nine days before Kaminski testified for the prosecution. Kaminski told jurors he got a cold reaction when he told Lay and other executives in October 2001 that Enron needed to "come clean" on questionable financial structures in the weeks before it crashed into bankruptcy proceedings.

"I was trying to reach Vince Kaminski a long time ago before I even knew he would testify. I was trying to reconnect with Vince, to talk to him about some issues I wanted to talk to him about," Lay said.

Kaminski has been on the prosecution's witness list since the government released its first version in November. Lay acknowledged trying to reach Kaminski March 6 through one of his colleagues. He did not say, nor did Hueston ask, whether he reached Kaminski.

Lay recalled that he has said he endured some character assassination. Hueston asked if he had engaged in character assassination of others during the trial.

"Are you considering yourself in that league?" the ex-chairman said slyly.

"I am a United States attorney. This is my job, and you can call me anything you want," Hueston retorted. He then pressed Lay on whether he denounced former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. as he testified for the government that he warned Lay the company was in dire straits throughout the fall of 2001.

"I don't recall what I said," Lay said. "I do think Mr. Glisan lied."

During Glisan's testimony, Lay told reporters, "I've never heard so many lies in one day in my whole life."

Lay then acknowledged that he approached Glisan near a bathroom and a witness area during a break in the ex-treasurer's testimony and tried to soothe him.

Lay said Wednesday he thought Glisan, who is serving a prison term for creating one of the structures Kaminski complained about, has been under "enormous pressure" from federal prosecutors.

The ex-chairman also snapped, "I can't take full responsibility for what my lawyers say and do" when Hueston asked about lead Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey calling Glisan a "monkey." Ramsey has been absent from the trial since early April, recovering from cardiac procedures.

Under questioning earlier in the day from defense lawyer George Secrest, Lay insisted he borrowed $77.5 million (â,¬62.37 million) from Enron in the months before the company imploded to pay personal debt - not because he knew disaster loomed.

Prosecutors have highlighted through witnesses that Lay, 64, repaid $70 million (â,¬56.34 million) of those company loans with Enron stock. But the ex-chairman didn't tell employees or investors about that activity even as he encouraged workers to buy more shares two months before the energy giant sought bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Lay told jurors he tried to repay the rest, but Hueston blocked him from doing so shortly before he was indicted.

Hueston took up that mantle.

"As of today, you have not repaid one dime of the principle loan of that $7.5 million (â,¬6.04 million) ?" Hueston asked.

"We tried and you blocked it," Lay snapped, adding later, "Mr. Hueston, you know you blocked it" - though he didn't explain how.

"It's a simple question," Hueston pressed.

"It's a simple answer," Lay retorted. "Mr. Hueston, when I was sworn in here, I swore to tell the truth and the whole truth, not the partial truth."

Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy from when he reprised the role of CEO following Skilling's abrupt resignation in mid-August 2001. Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors related to his activities from 1999 to 2001.

Once jurors in the Lay-Skilling case begin deliberating, Lay faces a trial without a jury before Lake on bank fraud charges for allegedly reneging on an agreement with banks not to use $75 million (â,¬60.36 million) in loans to buy Enron stock on margin.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rove Testifies 5th Time On Leak (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove sought to convince a federal grand jury yesterday that he did not provide false statements in the CIA leak case, testifying for more than three hours before leaving a federal courthouse unsure whether he would be indicted, according to a source close to the presidential aide.

In his fifth appearance before the grand jury, Rove spent considerable time arguing that it would have been foolish for him to knowingly mislead investigators about his role in the disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media, the source said. His grand jury appearance, which was kept secret even from Rove's closest White House colleagues until shortly before he went to court yesterday, suggests that prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald remains keenly interested in Rove's role in the case.

Rove for the first time partly waived his attorney-client privilege to detail conversations he had with his attorney, Robert Luskin, about the leak and his knowledge of it, the source said.

Rove's testimony focused almost exclusively on his conversation about Plame with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper in 2003 and whether the top aide later tried to conceal it, the source said. Rove testified, in essence, that "it would have been a suicide mission" to "deliberately lie" about his conversation with Cooper because he knew beforehand that it eventually would be revealed, the source said. Lawyers involved in the case said yesterday that they expect a decision on Rove's fate soon.

The source's account could not be corroborated by the prosecutor's office, which has declined to discuss the case.

Luskin said in a statement that the top Bush strategist testified "voluntarily and unconditionally" at Fitzgerald's behest.

"In connection with this appearance, the special counsel has advised Mr. Rove that he is not a target of the investigation," Luskin said in a statement. "Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges." Regarding Rove's testimony, Luskin said that it centered on information that has surfaced since he last testified, in October 2005. A spokesman for Fitzgerald declined to comment on the case.

The leak investigation, which led to the indictment last year of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, began after administration officials were accused of disclosing Plame's identity as part of a broader White House effort to discredit critics of the administration's justification for the Iraq war.

Specifically, Fitzgerald began investigating in late 2003 whether administration officials illegally disclosed Plame's post at the CIA to discredit allegations made by her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. In the summer of 2003, Wilson publicly charged that President Bush had twisted intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain nuclear weapons material to justify the invasion.

The disclosure of Plame's name was used to argue that because she had helped set up a trip Wilson took to Niger to investigate Iraq's efforts to obtain nuclear material, that mission was little more than a boondoggle.

Fitzgerald has not charged anyone with the original crime. But in October 2005, a grand jury indicted Libby on charges of perjury, making false statements and obstructing justice in the course of the investigation. Libby's trial is scheduled to begin early next year. He has denied the charges, and his lawyers say that he is guilty of nothing more than a faulty memory and that he is the victim of an overzealous prosecutor.

The Libby case has served as a constant distraction for the White House and comes at a politically turbulent time for the president. A court filing by Fitzgerald earlier this month, for instance, provided the new and politically damaging revelation that Bush had authorized Libby to disclose previously classified information about Iraq's weapons programs. The president did not authorize Libby to leak information about Plame, however, according to Libby's legal team.

Rove, who recently gave up his role in White House policy as part of a staff shake-up, testified only hours after Bush named Tony Snow as his new press secretary. Snow replaces Scott McClellan, who has come under fire for initially telling the media that Rove was not involved in the Plame leak.

In grand jury appearances and other conversations with federal investigators, Rove has testified that he discussed Wilson's wife briefly with columnist Robert D. Novak and Cooper before she was publicly unmasked in July 2003, according to lawyers in the case. Fitzgerald zeroed in on Rove's contact with Cooper yesterday, according to the source who provided Rove's version of events.

The source said Rove testified in February 2004 that he did not recall discussing Plame with Cooper. Rove told the prosecutor that at the time he had no recollection of that short conversation with one of the scores of reporters he talks to in his job.

Cooper later testified and then a wrote a first-person account that Rove told him that Wilson's wife was in the CIA and had authorized her husband's CIA mission.

Rove would later tell the grand jury that he had forgotten that conversation and remembered it only after his legal team unearthed a crucial e-mail. The e-mail -- written by Rove to then-deputy national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley shortly after the Cooper conversation -- shows Rove saying he waved the Time reporter off Wilson's claim. Luskin found the e-mail as part of a document search he conducted before Rove testified a second time in October 2004, telling the grand jury that the conversation must have taken place.

All the while, Fitzgerald suspected that Rove was acknowledging what had happened only because new evidence was surfacing, according to lawyers in the case. But Rove and his lawyer have presented an alternative explanation: that Rove genuinely did not remember his conversation with Cooper, and testified to that effect even though he was aware of rumors that he was one of Cooper's sources.

The new information Luskin cited in his statement yesterday relates to this part of the saga. After agreeing to a partial waiver of attorney-client privilege, Rove testified yesterday about a conversation Luskin had with former Time magazine reporter Viveca Novak, the source said. (Viveca Novak is not related to Robert Novak, the columnist who first revealed Plame's identity in 2003.) Luskin had informed Fitzgerald about that conversation last October, a few days before Libby was indicted, in a last-ditch effort to save Rove from the same fate.

Luskin told the prosecutor that Viveca Novak had informed him that she had heard from other Time reporters that Rove was Cooper's source for a July 2003 story on Plame. Luskin shared this information with Rove -- before Rove testified that he did not recall his conversation with Cooper.

Yesterday, Rove told the grand jury that it would make no sense for him to lie in February, knowing that all of this would so on be public, the source said.

But the timing of that Luskin-Novak conversation is in dispute. Novak has said she testified that the conversation took place between January and May of 2004 -- which could place it either before or after Rove's initial grand jury testimony. Moreover, Rove did not know at that point that Cooper would later be forced to testify and reveal him as a source, according to lawyers who follow the case.

Rove also testified that he was aware that several aides had been subpoenaed in the case before that first grand jury appearance and that they would be forced to turn over documents.

Grand Jury Gets Rove Testimony Over C.I.A. Leak (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

WASHINGTON, April 26 — Karl Rove, the senior counselor to President Bush, testified for several hours on Wednesday before the federal grand jury in the C.I.A. leak case, in an appearance that was a sign of renewed attention by the special prosecutor in a matter that has lingered unresolved for months.

It was the fifth time Mr. Rove has appeared before a federal grand jury in the case. The appearance came at a politically sensitive time for Mr. Rove, who was relieved of his policy portfolio at the White House in a staff reshuffling earlier this month and now faces the challenge of helping Republicans maintain their primacy in the midterm elections this fall.

Mr. Rove last appeared before the grand jury in October, and his lawyer has said he is not a major figure in the leak inquiry and will ultimately be exonerated.

To date, the only criminal charges in the case, which involves the exposure of a C.I.A. operative's identity, have been brought against I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, who was charged with lying and obstruction last November and is preparing for trial. The prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, has declined to comment on Mr. Rove's status, saying publicly only that he is continuing to explore outstanding issues in the case.

The White House declined to comment on Wednesday about Mr. Rove's appearance. White House officials have said the recent personnel moves inside the West Wing have been unrelated to Mr. Rove's legal status. It was unclear on Wednesday whether the decision by the new chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, to remove domestic policy from Mr. Rove's portfolio preceded the scheduling of his latest grand jury testimony.

On Wednesday, Mr. Rove spent about four hours inside the federal courthouse after entering through a side door shortly before 12:30 p.m. He emerged beaming as usual at the end of his testimony. He declined to comment, but his lawyer, Robert D. Luskin, issued a statement declaring that Mr. Rove had testified "voluntarily and unconditionally" about "a matter" that had arisen since Mr. Rove's last grand jury appearance.

The unresolved matter appears to involve the testimony of Viveca Novak, a former reporter at Time magazine, who told Mr. Fitzgerald last fall that she may have unwittingly helped Mr. Rove by telling Mr. Luskin he had played a bigger role in the case than he had initially admitted. Since Mr. Libby's indictment, Mr. Fitzgerald has summoned both Ms. Novak and Mr. Luskin to provide grand jury testimony about their conversations, and he also summoned Bob Woodward of The Washington Post to discuss conversations related to the C.I.A. leak matter with an administration official who has still not been publicly identified.

Mr. Rove's appearance suggests that Mr. Fitzgerald remains interested in learning more about why, in his initial testimony to the grand jury, in February 2004, Mr. Rove failed to disclose that he had ever discussed the issue of Valerie Wilson, the C.I.A. operative, with any reporters. Mr. Rove came forward months later to change his story, acknowledging that he had a phone conversation with Matthew Cooper of Time magazine in the summer of 2003 that eventually turned to the subject of Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, the C.I.A. operative's husband. Mr. Rove said he had forgotten the call, one of hundreds he participates in each day.

Lawyers for Mr. Rove have maintained that he will be exonerated in the case, in part because he volunteered details of his conversation with Mr. Cooper.

Since then, however, Ms. Novak, who worked alongside Mr. Cooper at the magazine, has said that she told Mr. Rove's lawyer, in several conversations in early 2004, that she believed his client had been a source for Mr. Cooper.

Ms. Novak said the lawyer, Mr. Luskin, appeared surprised to hear of Mr. Rove's involvement, raising questions about whether Ms. Novak effectively tipped off Mr. Rove to come forward with evidence about himself.

In a telephone interview on Wednesday, Ms. Novak, who no longer works for Time, said she had not had any contact with Mr. Fitzgerald since her deposition in December. She left the magazine after a dispute over her role in the case, taking a buyout package last month. Mr. Cooper also recently moved from his position as a White House correspondent to become the political editor of the magazine's Web site.

Mr. Fitzgerald, continuing to conduct the case in the utmost secrecy, did not comment about calling Mr. Rove to testify, and no one involved in the case said they clearly understood its status. It did not appear that there would be any immediate resolution for Mr. Rove, who has spent months defending himself against assertions that his legal troubles are distracting him from his White House duties.

Potentially complicating the case further still is the criminal trial of Mr. Libby, scheduled to begin early next year. The pretrial activity by Mr. Libby and Mr. Fitzgerald has raised several significant political and substantive questions, including whether Mr. Bush may have played a role in authorizing the leak of classified material.

Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty and is expected to call Mr. Rove, among other witnesses.

According to court documents filed by the prosecutor, Mr. Libby has testified that Mr. Cheney told him the president had authorized the release of some information contained in a classified National Intelligence Estimate chronicling the efforts of Saddam Hussein to purchase uranium from Niger. That revelation has thrust both the president and vice president into the center of the leak case, which had otherwise simmered at lower levels of the administration since 2003.

Even before Mr. Rove arrived at the courthouse, Democrats pounced on the turn of events, one of several controversies they hope to capitalize on in the fall elections.

"This additional Rove visit clearly shows that the Plame investigation is far from over and that Patrick Fitzgerald is living up to his reputation as an impartial, dedicated prosecutor determined to turn over every stone," Senator Charles E. Schumer said in a statement.

No one has been charged with the underlying crime of revealing classified material. Mr. Fitzgerald is seeking to establish whether any crimes were committed with the disclosure of Mrs. Wilson's identity, which first appeared in a column by Robert D. Novak — no relation to Ms. Novak — in July 2003. The identity of Mr. Novak's original source for the column that triggered the entire case is still unknown, at least to the public. Mr. Novak has testified to the grand jury since Mr. Rove's last appearance in October 2005.

Rove Again Testifies To Jury In CIA Leak Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Tom Hamburger, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Presidential advisor Karl Rove was called again before a federal grand jury Wednesday, a surprise appearance signaling that a perjury and obstruction investigation into his role in a CIA leak case remained alive.

As the White House was introducing a new press secretary in an effort to put a new face on a troubled administration, Rove testified for three hours before the grand jury. Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald is investigating whether Rove lied to investigators in connection with the summer 2003 disclosure of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

The appearance — Rove's fifth before a grand jury in the case — comes six months after a previous grand jury expired without indicting Rove, raising expectations among his supporters that he would not be charged in the case.

That grand jury indicted another top Bush administration aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, whose trial on perjury and obstruction charges is to begin in January.

Robert D. Luskin, Rove's lawyer, said Wednesday that Fitzgerald had made no decision on whether to bring charges against Rove.

Some legal experts said the timing and circumstances of Rove's latest testimony, which Luskin said was given "voluntarily and unconditionally," suggested that an indictment might not be imminent and that the development could be viewed as positive for Rove.

Luskin said the subject of Rove's testimony Wednesday involved a matter that had arisen since he last testified in October. It is believed to involve the chain of events that followed a belatedly disclosed conversation between Luskin and a Time magazine reporter about Rove's contact with another Time reporter.

The lawyer added that Fitzgerald had continued to advise Rove that he was not an investigation "target," a legal distinction that refers to a formal notification prosecutors give suspects about to be charged.

Fitzgerald declined to talk to reporters as he left the courthouse.

The grand jury appearance comes a week after the presidential advisor was relieved of his policy responsibilities at the White House to focus on electoral politics.

At the time of the change in Rove's portfolio, White House aides said it was part of a broader reorganization and unrelated to Rove's ongoing legal vulnerability. But the request for him to testify again is believed to have come several weeks ago, and the White House may have been aware that his legal troubles were likely to flare again.

Coincidentally or not, last week's action helped inoculate the White House against Rove's latest appearance before the grand jury. If Rove is indicted and forced to resign, the White House can say that Rove's substantive policy responsibilities have already been transferred.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, whose resignation was announced as part of last week's White House reorganization, declined to answer any questions about the grand jury appearance.

"I have no new information on that matter, and even if I did have new information, I wouldn't be in a position to share it with you," McClellan said. Fox News commentator Tony Snow was named Wednesday as McClellan's successor.

Fitzgerald's investigation has led to a series of embarrassing disclosures about White House efforts to discredit an Iraq war critic who is married to Plame.

The White House initially denied any involvement in the unmasking of Plame, who was first identified by syndicated columnist Robert Novak in a July 2003 article. But Fitzgerald found that Rove and Libby had actively talked with reporters about Plame at the time, although both deny they broke any laws. It is a crime under federal law to knowingly disclose the name of a covert agent.

Fitzgerald's probe also turned up an organized White House effort to rebut allegations made at the time by Plame's husband, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, that the Bush administration had twisted intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq. According to a court filing, Libby testified that President Bush had ordered the leaking of a classified document to counter Wilson's criticism.

Rove has been a focus for Fitzgerald because he initially told a grand jury in February 2004 that he had not spoken about Plame with Time magazine correspondent Matthew Cooper.

When later presented with a document indicating the men had talked, Rove — who had previously acknowledged to investigators that he had been a source for the Novak article — said he had forgotten the conversation with Cooper.

A person briefed on Wednesday's testimony described the examination by Fitzgerald as "an exploration of the back story" of what Rove knew about Cooper and when, including an explanation that Rove's attorney had offered up for the delay. The person declined to be identified because of the ongoing investigation.

Fitzgerald suspects Rove may have deliberately misled the grand jury about his conversation with Cooper. Among other things, the prosecutor is exploring whether another Time magazine reporter, Viveca Novak, tipped off Luskin to the fact that Cooper had spoken with Rove, and led Rove to change his testimony. (Robert Novak is not related to Viveca Novak.)

Eventually, Luskin turned up a July 2003 e-mail referring to Cooper that Rove had sent to then-White House national security aide Stephen J. Hadley. Luskin has said that the e-mail refreshed Rove's memory, and Rove subsequently amended his testimony during a grand jury appearance in October 2004.

Fitzgerald is also believed to have been exploring inconsistencies in the stories that Cooper and Rove have told the grand jury about their conversation. Rove reportedly testified that they mostly talked about welfare reform; Cooper has said the conversation focused on Wilson and Plame.

Though some observers viewed Rove's being called Wednesday to testify as a negative for the White House insider, others said that Fitzgerald may simply be addressing unfinished business in the case without an agenda in mind.

The prosecutor has been embroiled in a fierce dispute in the Libby case over access to classified documents and other information. The judge in that case has recently resolved some of those issues, which might have freed up Fitzgerald to start focusing anew on Rove.

Some lawyers involved in the case said the appearance could be construed as a welcome development for Rove.

"Rove showed up voluntarily and his lawyer is able to say that he is not a target. If he was about to be indicted, I don't think you would see it unfolding like this; grand juries aren't typically used in that fashion," said a lawyer who has been engaged with the long-running inquiry. "This is a positive development for Rove, I think." The lawyer spoke on condition of anonymity because he represents a client who has been a subject of the investigation.

Fitzgerald has yet to publicly identify a second source used by Robert Novak in writing his column.

The prosecutor is also believed to be interested in who provided Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward with information about Plame; Woodward has said his source provided the information several weeks before Novak learned of Plame's identity.

Rove Testifies Again In CIA Leak Case (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, April 26, 2006

Top White House aide Karl Rove made his fifth grand jury appearance in the Valerie Plame affair Wednesday, undergoing several hours of questioning about a new issue that has come to light since the last time he testified.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald declined to comment at the conclusion of the grand jury session. Rove appeared at ease as he left the U.S. courthouse, joking to journalists to "move to the back" as the White House aide, his lawyers and several reporters entered an elevator to leave the building.

A week ago, Rove, the architect of Bush's election victories, gave up his policy duties at the White House. He is returning to a full-time focus on politics with Republicans facing major problems in the upcoming midterm elections.

Wednesday's session is believed to be only the second time Fitzgerald has met with a new grand jury examining questions left unanswered in the leaking of Plame's CIA identity. The only other time Fitzgerald was seen going before the new panel was Dec. 7.

The previous grand jury looking into the CIA leak expired Oct. 28, the day it indicted Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI.

The only new issue in the CIA leak probe known to involve Rove is a contact his lawyer, Robert Luskin, had with Time magazine reporter Viveca Novak.

The contact is important because during it, the Time reporter told Luskin that Rove might have disclosed Plame's CIA status in 2003 to another Time reporter, Matt Cooper.

The Luskin-Novak conversation occurred many months before Rove belatedly revealed to the prosecutor that he had spoken with Cooper. Rove says he'd forgotten about his conversation with Cooper.

Rove's legal problems stem from the fact that it was more than a year into the CIA leak investigation before he revealed the Cooper conversation.

Rove "testified voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance," Luskin said in a statement. "Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges."

Several days after Rove's conversations with conservative columnist Robert Novak and Cooper in July 2003, both the columnist and Cooper wrote stories identifying Plame as a CIA officer.

The exposure of her CIA employment came little more than a week after her husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, accused the Bush administration of manipulating prewar intelligence to exaggerate an Iraqi nuclear threat.

Robert Novak is not related to Viveca Novak.

Other unfinished business in the probe focuses on the source who provided Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward information about Plame, whose CIA identity was leaked to Novak in July 2003.

Woodward says his source, who he has not publicly identified, provided the information about Wilson's wife, several weeks before Novak learned of Plame's identity. The Post reporter, who never wrote a story, was interviewed by Fitzgerald late last year.

Rove Testifies For The Fifth Time Before Grand Jury In Leak Case (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove testified for the fifth time yesterday before a grand jury investigating whether Bush administration officials purposely leaked the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative.

Mr. Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, confirmed his client's appearance, saying it was done "voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance in October 2005." Mr. Luskin said Mr. Fitzgerald hasn't made any decisions about charging Mr. Rove, who remains a subject of the investigation. White House spokesman Scott McClellan declined to comment on Mr. Rove's grand-jury appearance, which lasted just over three hours.

Former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby has been indicted on charges of lying and obstruction in the probe, which began in September 2003. Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty. His trial is expected to start in January.

Mr. Fitzgerald has focused on whether Mr. Rove initially lied about his contact with reporters concerning CIA agent Valerie Plame, whose husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq. Mr. Rove previously testified he hadn't discussed the matter with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper, who told a grand jury last July that they had.

In December 2005, another Time magazine reporter, Viveca Novak, said she had told Mr. Luskin about a phone call between Messrs. Rove and Cooper. Mr. Luskin then found an email that referenced that conversation, which he brought to the attention of his client and the prosecutor. Ms. Novak, who has since left the magazine, testified about the matter to Mr. Fitzgerald.

Whether Mr. Rove may face charges remains an open question. Also outstanding is what, if any, charges might be brought against the Bush administration official who leaked Ms. Plame's identity to columnist Robert Novak, who is no relation to Ms. Novak. Mr. Novak was the first to publicly disclose Ms. Plame's CIA role in July 2003, about a week after Mr. Wilson accused the administration of inflating information that Iraq had tried to obtain nuclear bomb-making material from Niger.

Mr. Novak is believed to have the same source as Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward, who testified earlier this year that a senior administration official told him about Ms. Plame's CIA job before other reporters. Mr. Fitzgerald has refused to publicly identify this person and so far hasn't charged anyone with the crime of purposely blowing the cover of a U.S. intelligence operative.

Pellicano Says U.S. Spied On Him (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Henry Weinstein And Andrew Blankstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

The PI's then-girlfriend fed the FBI information gained during prison visits, his attorney says.

In a twist to a wiretapping scandal captivating Hollywood, the private eye indicted for allegedly bugging celebrities and other high-profile targets has accused the federal government of spying on him in prison through a secret arrangement with his then-girlfriend.

Anthony Pellicano's attorney filed motions this week in federal court saying Sandra Wil Carradine provided FBI agents and prosecutors with a "fountain of information" after a series of jailhouse visits late last year, giving them insights into the lawyer's legal strategy and violating his attorney-client privilege.

As she met with Pellicano at the Taft Correctional Institute in Bakersfield, where Pellicano was finishing up a sentence for possession of explosives, the private detective did not know that Carradine had secretly begun cooperating with the government in July or that he had already been indicted in the wiretapping scandal, said Pellicano's attorney, Steven Gruel, in court documents. Both her cooperation and his indictment remained under seal until February.

"According to the indictment, the government alleges that Anthony Pellicano engaged in conduct for clients to gain an unfair advantage in litigation," Gruel said in an interview.

"My initial review of the legal and factual landscape suggest that is what the government did here," he said.

In motions filed to force the government to produce additional information in the case, Gruel says Carradine, the ex-wife of actor Keith Carradine, acted as a "go-between" between the lawyer and Pellicano in December when they were still negotiating the terms of Gruel's legal representation.

Gruel said Sandra Carradine solicited his "thoughts, opinions and general observations about the government's case."

In mid-December, Gruel says in the motions, Carradine told FBI Special Agent Stan Ornellas, the bureau's lead investigator in the case, that Pellicano was attempting to hire the attorney, making it "likely that the government knew of Mr. Pellicano's interest in my representation even before I did."

Carradine also told Ornellas of Pellicano's interest in calling a particular defense witness, enabling the FBI to contact the person before Pellicano's defense did, according to Gruel.

His motions also say information he has already received from the government as part of the legal discovery process shows that Carradine has given Ornellas "Mr. Pellicano's correspondence to several attorneys."

The motions were filed late Tuesday and represent Gruel's most aggressive attack against the government's case, filed in February, which has led to charges against Pellicano and 13 others.

Six defendants have pleaded guilty. Those include Carradine, who admitted in January that she lied to a grand jury about her knowledge that Pellicano had wiretapped the home of Keith Carradine during a dispute over child support.

DOJ_NMG_0026687

The U.S. attorney's office and FBI declined to comment on Gruel's assertions and said they would soon file formal responses. Carradine's lawyer, Peter Knecht, said his client had not breached any attorney-client relationship or acted improperly in her dealings with Pellicano or Gruel.

Knecht said that at the time of Carradine's prison visits, Pellicano had not retained counsel in the wiretapping case. The lawyer added that Pellicano knew Carradine was being looked at by federal authorities and encouraged her to protect herself.

"He told her, 'Remember, take care of No. 1.' So, in effect, he gave her permission to do whatever was necessary to benefit herself," Knecht said.

He also said the government told Carradine that she was visiting Pellicano in prison, not being sent there as a government informant. It is unclear how Gruel's allegations could affect the prosecution of Pellicano.

Gordon Greenberg, a Los Angeles defense lawyer, said that any time a prosecutor obtains information he knows is covered by the attorney-client privilege, "you are not on firm ground; you have an issue" to confront.

With a potential mountain of evidence in the Pellicano case, Greenberg and Loyola Law School professor Laurie Levenson said the government has taken special precautions to avoid problems with evidence by setting up "clean" and "dirty" teams of prosecutors and investigators. They have been created to ensure that those who will try the case are walled off from information that they are not legally entitled to see, such as conversations between defendants and their attorneys.

In the Pellicano case, members of the "dirty" team have reviewed tapes of attorney-client conversations so "clean" team members have not been privy to information they should not have seen.

"The prosecutors knew that Carradine was talking to Pellicano," Levenson said, "so to the extent they knew about this, the 'dirty' team is supposed to screen that information, so the prosecutors do not have any privileged confidential information."

Gruel, in his motions, says that "the sensitive information provided by defendant Carradine … appears to have gone directly to case agent Ornellas and, presumably, the prosecution team."

In other action related to the Pellicano case, five people named in the government's indictment as having been allegedly victimized by his illegal searches of their confidential records filed civil damage claims against the city of Los Angeles.

The claims allege that the Los Angeles Police Department acted improperly by allowing former Sgt. Mark Arneson, one of Pellicano's co-defendants, to run their names through confidential criminal databases.

Both Pellicano and Arneson have pleaded not guilty.

The civil damage claims, which allege emotional suffering and invasion of privacy, are precursors to what attorney Neville L. Johnson said would be lawsuits against Los Angeles and, ultimately, Beverly Hills, where another former officer also allegedly accessed confidential records without authorization.

Among those filing claims was model Monika Zsibrita, who allegedly became a target for Pellicano and his associates after she asserted a paternity claim against comedian Chris Rock in 1999.

In a brief interview with The Times this week, Zsibrita refused to discuss the paternity action or who was involved. But she did say that two years ago, an FBI agent called her and alleged that she had been one of Pellicano's victims.

Earlier this year, she said, she learned from the indictment that Pellicano had allegedly used his LAPD contact to access her confidential records.

"They wiretapped me and they followed me around. I was afraid," she said in the interview. "It was very unsettling. I felt violated."

On Tuesday, a spokesman for Rock acknowledged that representatives for the comedian hired Pellicano after Zsibrita alleged in 1999 that she was pregnant with Rock's child.

But neither Rock nor any of his representatives, the spokesman said, knew that Pellicano had allegedly broken the law to obtain information about Zsibrita.

In a separate legal action Wednesday, the company behind the yet-to-be-released film "Crash Bandits" sued director John McTiernan for breach of contract and damages of more than $2 million for failing to disclose during pre-production that he had been targeted by federal authorities in the Pellicano investigation and was negotiating a guilty plea.

McTiernan, whose film credits include "Predator" and "Die Hard," admitted earlier this month that he lied to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wiretap veteran film producer Charles Roven in the summer of 2000.

Pellicano Brief Lobs Grenade At Feds' Methods (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, April 27, 2006

Steven Gruel has long contended that the feds were out to get his client, the celebrity private eye Anthony Pellicano, well before they executed a 2003 search warrant that resulted in Pellicano's conviction on explosives charges -- and a protracted federal investigation aimed at some of Hollywood's biggest lawyers.

In court papers filed late Tuesday, Gruel, a former San Francisco federal prosecutor, gave the most detailed peek yet into how he plans to support that claim. He also outlined his contention that prosecutors improperly used Pellicano's girlfriend as an informant to pry into the detective's defense strategy.

All of the arguments are aimed at getting more discovery out of Los Angeles federal prosecutors and ultimately, Gruel said, getting the indictment tossed.

Based on discovery turned over by prosecutors and evidence gathered on his own, Gruel's filings challenge the FBI's reasons for initially searching the detective's office.

The warrant, which was obtained in connection with a threat made to former L.A. Times reporter Anita Busch, "was a subterfuge," Gruel wrote.

He argues that agents were actually seeking evidence of illegal wiretaps -- particularly a recording of an FBI agent -- but didn't have probable cause to get a warrant for such material.

He supports his claim by pointing out that in 2002, FBI agents had issued a subpoena to Pellicano asking for "any audio or video recordings in your custody or control which were obtained from investigative services" relating to a separate criminal case in which Pellicano worked for a defendant. The government asked for "recordings or photographs of any federal or state law enforcement personnel."

The Pellicano search warrant has already been upheld by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in connection with the explosives case. But Gruel said he believes the warrant -- along with a handful of follow-up searches and seizures of the detective's computers and storage locker -- are open to new challenges.

"I'm trying to figure out whether there was bad faith," he said in a Tuesday phone interview shortly after visiting Pellicano in jail.

That charge is one of several that Gruel has made in an attempt to discredit the conduct of FBI agents and prosecutors working the case.

Daniel Saunders and Kevin Lally, the lead prosecutors in the case, did not return calls by press time. "We will respond in writing in due course," said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Gruel also said he plans to argue that the lead FBI agent in the case, Stanley Ornellas, provided misleading testimony and should be deposed.

Perhaps most significantly, Gruel is aiming to show that the government used Sandra Carradine -- Pellicano's ex-girlfriend, who had a cooperation deal with prosecutors -- to plumb the jailed detective for information about his defense late last year and early this year.

Citing discovery turned over by the government, Gruel wrote that "Carradine would speak with Mr. Pellicano in the morning and report the conversation to agent Ornellas later that same day."

He charges that the government used Carradine to gain strategic information on Pellicano that may have violated attorney-client privilege. For example, he wrote, Pellicano late last year told Carradine about a potential defense witness in the case.

"That information, as well as the content of the defense witness' possible assistance, was then reported to FBI agent Ornalles [sic]," Gruel wrote. "Later, in February 2006, I was contacted by that possible defense witness who said that agent Ornellas contacted him in late December or January 2006 concerning this case."

Gruel also said Carradine provided the government with information about Pellicano's legal representation and that "she acted as a 'go-between' for me and Mr. Pellicano in December 2005 with respect to messages about the case. My recollection is that during this time she would solicit my thoughts, opinions and general observations about the government's case," Gruel wrote.

"I am concerned that she provided the government with information pertaining to my involvement in the case," he added.

The questions about Carradine's role in the case are aimed at arguing that prosecutors engaged in outrageous conduct, Gruel said. Such a finding -- which can be extremely difficult to prove -- could justify dismissing the case.

"The standard is high," Gruel said Wednesday. "It says the government has to shock the standards of society."

Gruel took a separate tack in seeking to question Ornellas, arguing that a contention made by the detective in obtaining the 2002 warrant -- that he knew from his "own personal experience" what would be in a PI's office -- is less than kosher.

The problem, Gruel said, is that while Ornellas had a private investigator's license, "the government has conceded that although passing the written test for a private investigator's license, agent Ornellas really has no experience as a private investigator."

Gruel also claims that in a 2003 case, Ornellas "may have, at a minimum, provided inconsistent or troubling testimony." Taking aim at the FBI could result in a Franks hearing, in which a defense lawyer may directly question an agent.

Patrick Robbins, a partner at Shearman & Sterling who worked with Gruel in the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office, said all of Gruel's efforts seemed aimed at forcing the government to cough up information to defend its conduct.

"Steve appears to be trying to obtain as much discovery as possible on all these fronts," Robbins said.

Cruise-Kidman Call Said To Be On Tap In H'wood P.I. Case (NYDN)

New York Daily News, April 27, 2006

A recording of a phone call between Nicole Kidman and Tom Cruise was just one of the treasures the FBI found in the "War Room" of jailed private eye Anthony Pellicano, according to the June Vanity Fair, now online.

Kidman took to joking to friends during calls, "So, Tom, are you listening? Am I saying what you want me to say?" Stories that could have come only from Kidman's phone soon started appearing in The National Enquirer. Both stars have been questioned by the FBI, according to the story by top investigators Bryan Burrough and John Connolly, who is writing a book about the P.I.

Pellicano, who allegedly spied on Hollywood's top stars while working for its biggest executives and lawyers, including Cruise's lawyer Bert Fields, had apartments in all five L.A. area codes so he could wiretap their phones and learn their credit card numbers. (Investigators also found hand grenades and a wedge of C-4 plastic explosive; Pellicano's now in jail on weapons charges.)

The mag also reports:

Pellicano found the exhumed body of Liz Taylor's late husband Mike Todd in an area that cops had swept many times, a coincidence police found fishy.

A very rich Beverly Hills woman, Sarit Shafrir, whom Pellicano had talked into spying on her own husband, became so afraid of him that she flew from L.A. to Israel just to make a phone call to the F.B.I. about him.

Pellicano's ex-wife Kat tells VF, "Six or seven years ago, Anthony comes home one night and tells me we are going to become Jewish and that Bert Fields has arranged conversion classes for both of us. ... I said, 'Anthony, why the hell do you want us to become Jewish?' He tells me, 'Because Bert thinks it will be good for my business. Most of the lawyers out here are Jews, so it would be a good thing.'"

Michael Jackson paid Pellicano $2 million in his child-abuse case; Steven Bing paid Pellicano at least $100,000 at the time of his paternity case with Liz Hurley. Pellicano also helped Stevie Wonder, James Woods and Kevin Costner, among many others.

A former Brillstein-Grey executive says Brad Grey used Pellicano for work on behalf of any number of his clients, including Brad Pitt and Adam Sandler. FBI agents also found a trove of info on Garry Shandling, whom Grey had to pay $10 million after a lawsuit. And when James Gandolfini walked off the set of "The Sopranos" in a pay dispute, Grey was going to replace the HBO hit with a show on Pellicano's life, but the acting great came back.

Whew.

A little diss 'n' dat from Cam'ron

Beyoncé may be regretting the day Cam'ron got the address of her two-way.

"Cam has been text-messaging Beyoncé like crazy," our tipster says. "He's been asking her out, and dissing Jay[-Z]. He's been telling her she should be with a real man like him."

Yes, Cam'ron, who was linked with Mariah Carey, has cred on field and street: He was an All-American football player before becoming a drug dealer in his native Harlem. But few would say Jay-Z isn't a "real man": He pulled himself up from Brooklyn's Marcy Houses projects to become a platinum-selling rapper; he started Roc-A-Fella Records with Damon Dash, and now he's Def Jam CEO and part owner of the New Jersey Nets.

It's not the first time Cam'ron has jousted with the rap royals. After splitting with the mogul's former label, Cam'ron said in his song "You Got It" that Jay-Z looked like the puppets in "Fraggle Rock." "I open up the Daily News," he raps. "How's the 'King of New York' rockin' sandals with jeans?/Open-toed sandals? You talk about you a '80s baby/you 37 years old/you was born in 1968," (actually 1969) taunts the 30-years-young upstart, whose real name is Cameron Giles.

Reps for Beyoncé and Cam'ron didn't return calls for comment.

Fugitive Molester Back In County (LAT)

By Gregory W. Griggs, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

The 13-year saga of a Ventura man ends with his arrest in France and a 12-year prison term.

For nearly 13 years, law enforcement officials tried to bring convicted child molester Channa Pryia Ruberoe to justice.

Now, Ruberoe, convicted in Ventura in 1993 of three counts of lewd acts against his stepdaughter, is behind bars.

Ruberoe, a native of Sri Lanka, was spotted in at least four countries and arrested several times before he was returned to Southern California in February. His circuitous route through Europe and southern Asia and the dogged pursuit by investigators with the Ventura County district attorney's office and the local FBI office rival the plot of a spy novel.

Gary G. Auer, the district attorney's chief investigator, was the supervising agent in the Ventura FBI office in 1993 when Ruberoe fled. Auer called it "most unusual" for a sexual assault case to turn into a global manhunt.

"The investigation went very well," said Auer, who left the FBI in 1998. "We followed him all over the world, but actually getting him out of Sri Lanka, and later Paris, was quite an effort. It required a lot of cooperation by agencies in the Sri Lankan government, the U.S. government and later the French government."

Ruberoe, now 40, was convicted July 23, 1993, in Ventura County Superior Court on three counts of molesting a child under 14. He was married to Ventura resident Nikki Lynn Ruberoe, who had a 13-year-old daughter and 10-year-old son from a previous marriage. He sexually assaulted his stepdaughter in April 1992, according to court records.

After Ruberoe's conviction, his wife arranged for him to be released on a $75,000 bond and he did not show up for his sentencing. Authorities determined that Ruberoe fled to Spain four days after his scheduled sentencing date. Three months later, on Nov. 7, Ruberoe flew from Paris to Sri Lanka.

Meanwhile, Nikki Ruberoe lost custody of her children to their father but rather than give them up, she took them to Paris the same week their stepfather fled there. Nikki Ruberoe reportedly had relatives in Paris.

Nikki Ruberoe kept the children in Paris until Nov. 16, 1993, when she sent them back to their father in Virginia. She joined her husband in Sri Lanka, where she was arrested and deported. She pleaded guilty to child abduction, conspiracy to jump bail and assisting her husband to flee the country. Because Nikki Ruberoe didn't have a criminal record, she was given probation and a six-month suspended sentence.

Superior Court Judge Don Coleman, who was a county prosecutor who oversaw child abuse cases at the time, said Wednesday he was surprised at how long it took to capture Channa Ruberoe.

"I guess it's true: You can run, but you can't hide," Coleman said. "The FBI and their international law enforcement contacts are the real heroes in this story."

Nearly two years after he fled the United States, Channa Ruberoe was arrested by Sri Lankan police on May 30, 1995, on the child abuse charges. He remained in custody until December 1996, when he was released on house arrest while he appealed his extradition. About 13 months later, that nation's Supreme Court upheld the extradition, but Ruberoe again missed his court appearance.

Sri Lankan officials began their own manhunt and learned Ruberoe had fled using a false identity and passport. He turned up in Bulgaria on June 28, 1999, and was seeking a visa to enter Russia.

He was next arrested in August 2004, this time by French police in Versailles, but he again appealed his extradition. Ruberoe exhausted his final appeal in February and French authorities alerted the U.S. Marshals Service, which sent agents to escort him back to Ventura County.

Last week, Ruberoe was given the maximum sentence of 12 years and must serve at least 85% of his sentence, minus the nearly three years he had already been incarcerated in Sri Lanka and France.

Feds May Hit Gottis With New Charges (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, April 27, 2006

The feds raised the ante against John (Junior) Gotti yesterday by telling a judge they may yet charge the mob scion - and his little brother - with new crimes.

Prosecutors say they're looking into Gotti's transfer of ownership of his Long Island mansion to his wife, Kim, at a time when the government was trying to seize the property because it was bought with mob money.

The government also is taking aim at brother Peter, citing testimony at Junior's recent trial that prosecutors believe could link the younger Gotti to possible crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0026692

In August 2005, Junior Gotti shifted ownership of his $1.3million Oyster Bay Cove, L.I., home to his wife, presumably to shield it from government seizure.

A 4.35-acre property in Milford Township, Pa., where Gotti's pals used to go hunting, was turned over to mom, Victoria, and sister Vicki in February 2005.

All this comes as the 42-year-old mobster mulls a plea deal that would require he serve up to five years in prison to resolve racketeering charges that include the 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Peter Gotti, 31, has never been charged with a crime.

But business failures and gambling losses have forced him to move his wife and kids into his mother's house in Howard Beach, Queens, once the domain of his late father, John (Dapper Don) Gotti.

Junior's defense lawyers have been trying to squash a subpoena that would require Peter Gotti to appear before a grand jury to answer questions about his ties to known mobsters and his brother's business dealings.

They have complained about the dozens of federal subpoenas sent out to possible defense witnesses in the mob scion's third trial, set for July.

Prosecutors said Peter Gotti's testimony at his brother's last trial raised questions about the wiseguy-laden guest list for Peter's 1997 wedding and a $96,000 loan from his brother to open a Howard Beach bakery called Uncle Crumm's.

"The government is entitled to and would be remiss if it did not inquire further of Peter Gotti about the criminal conduct of his brother and other suspected criminals with whom Peter Gotti was close," prosecutors Victor Hou and Miriam Rocah wrote in papers filed in Manhattan Federal Court.

Junior's lawyer did not return calls for comment.

'JUNIOR' RATTED ON SELF: FEDS (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, April 27, 2006

A new grand-jury probe targeting John "Junior" Gotti and the Gambino crime family was sparked by admissions the former Mafia boss made about his underworld activity and crimes committed by other mobsters, court papers show.

Prosecutors publicly disclosed that admissions by Gotti are "a basis" for their sweeping investigation in a letter to Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin yesterday - as they defended sending subpoenas to witnesses who recently testified for Gotti.

The specific subject of Gotti's admissions - and when they were made - are unclear, as the feds indicated they would address the topic in a second letter filed under seal, which is not public.

Gotti's defense has centered on his claim that he once ran the Gambino crime family for his late father, John "Dapper Don" Gotti, but that he left the mob in 1999.

Defense lawyer Charles Carnesi declined to comment, but the letter from prosecutors shows Gotti's attorneys have privately denied he "admitted significant information about criminal activity in which he and others were involved."

"Gotti knows full well that such admissions do exist, as discussed in the sealed letter," Assistant U.S. Attorneys Victor Hou and Miriam Rocah wrote.

On July 5, Gotti is facing a third trial for racketeering charges, including the sensational 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa, after two previous juries failed to reach a verdict.

The feds have offered Gotti a plea deal that would put him behind bars for less than four years and force him to fork over just $500,000, but the mob scion has yet to accept it.

WACKO CAPO FAKING IT: FEDS (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, April 27, 2006

Reputed Gambino acting capo Greg DePalma has borrowed a page from the notorious Mafia boss Vincent "Chin" Gigante by pretending he's too sick to stand trial, prosecutors charge.

DOJ_NMG_0026693

Defense lawyer John Meringolo is expected to argue in Manhattan federal court today that DePalma, 73, is near death due to lung cancer, heart disease and other ailments - and incapacitated by more than 20 medications he takes daily.

But prosecutors are skeptical and have asked Judge Alvin Hellerstein to keep his racketeering trial scheduled for May 8.

"DePalma has a history of exaggerating his medical problems and feigning medical symptoms when confronted with criminal prosecutions," Assistant U.S. Attorneys Edward O'Callaghan and Scott Marrah wrote to the judge.

The feds' court papers claim DePalma "exaggerated the severity" of his illness to get a reduced sentence in 1999 and to "garner sympathy" at a 2001 murder conspiracy trial.

"DePalma told an associate that prior to his 1999 sentencing, which took place in his hospital room, DePalma did not shave for a week and lay a particular way in bed in order to worsen his appearance," the prosecution says.

"DePalma also boasted that he was 'faking' when he appeared in a wheelchair for his 2001 trial in this courthouse."

As soon as DePalma hit the streets in February 2003, after finishing out a prison term, he got right back to mob business, prosecutors say.

III. Judge Bars Juror Background Checks (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-A federal judge barred prosecutors Wednesday from conducting criminal background checks on prospective jurors in the upcoming trial of Mayor Richard M. Daley's one-time patronage chief and three other former city officials.

Prosecutors notified the judge that they planned to make such checks before jury selection gets under way May 10. But U.S. District Judge David H. Coar said such checks could have a "coercive effect" if jurors found out.

"Absent some showing that it would be appropriate or necessary, I don't think as a matter of policy any party ought to be allowed to conduct criminal background checks of the jurors," the judge said.

Federal prosecutors planned to look into the prospective jurors' backgrounds following the corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan. In the Ryan case, two jurors were removed in the middle of deliberations after The Chicago Tribune disclosed that they failed to indicate on a court questionnaire that they had arrest records.

Later, the judge in the Ryan case declined to dismiss four other jurors who failed to indicate that they had experiences with the court system, including a divorce and a theft charge.

Ryan, 72, was convicted of taking payoffs to steer business to friends and political insiders. His attorneys have said the situation with the jurors represents grounds for appeal.

In the City Hall case, former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three other men are charged with fraud. They are accused of faking job interview scores and taking other steps to get around a court order barring political patronage in city hiring.

Surfside Administrator Facing 7 Criminal Charges (MBSN)

By From Staff Reports

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, April 27, 2006

Surfside Beach Town Administrator Clyde Merryman was indicted by a federal grand jury in Florence today on seven criminal counts in connection with an investigation into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach in 2002.

The indictment was returned today against 60-year-old Merryman, a retired FBI agent. He is facing charges of mail fraud and theft of honest services, concealment of a material fact from a U.S. agency, falsification of records in a federal investigation, and obstruction of justice.

Merryman launched the investigation as a FBI Special Agent in January 2002 into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach. The indictment says that the investigation questioned whether the spas used Korean women who were illegally in the United States for the purpose of prostitution.

According to the U.S. Justice Department, the indictment accuses Merryman of developing an ongoing "personal relationship" with a woman who was a confidential witness of the investigation.

An official summons was also issued today ordering Merryman to make an initial appearance to answer the charges at a later date, which has not yet been set.

Feds Will Not Seek Death Penalty In Fatal Carjacking (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Register, April 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors will not seek the death penalty against a pair of Mobile men accused of committing a fatal carjacking last year.

Prosecutors last year announced they would seek permission from the Justice Department to try to execute Alexander L. Bohannon, 23, and Sebastian Sanchez Dubose, 25, for the March 2005 slaying of Michael Lee Rodgers outside of his home in south Mobile.

Lawyers on both sides of the case made presentations in Washington to Justice Department officials, who last month denied permission to go for the death penalty. Both men are scheduled to stand trial in June, and could get life prison terms if convicted.

Defense lawyers said Tuesday they are happy their clients will not face possible execution as they prepare for trial.

"It was entirely due to the efforts of Carlos (Williams, the federal defender). He did an outstanding job," said Donald E. "Skip" Brutkiewicz, who represented Dubose until the Justice Department made its decision. "He deserves all the credit."

In the federal system, the attorney general must sign off on any death penalty prosecution. Rarely granted, it is an arduous process that involves both sides presenting evidence to the Justice Department's Capital Case Unit Committee.

Dennis Knizley, who represents Dubose, said he does not like the system because it forces the defense to tip its hand months before a trial.

"I always found it somewhat offensive to be talking about what penalty someone should get before we've had the trial," he said.

Williams, who represents Bohannon, argued that his client has low intelligence and other mental health issues that make him ineligible for capital punishment. Brutkiewicz said the allegations do not fit the definition of carjacking since Rodgers' vehicle was taken as an after-thought following the shooting.

The Justice Department did not explain its rationale, and federal prosecutors in Mobile did not return phone calls seeking comment.

"One is never confident, because we have no way of knowing what they were thinking or why they did it," Williams said. "We thought we had some good arguments."

Law enforcement authorities have accused Bohannon and Dubose of going to Rodgers' home in the 1300 block of Windsor St. in Mobile's Maysville community as part of a robbery. Bohannon accidentally shot himself in the leg as he and Rodgers struggled for the gun during an altercation, according to an affidavit filed by the FBI.

At that point, Dubose shot Rodgers twice at close range, according to the FBI. The affidavit accuses Bohannon of shooting Rodgers' mother, Lois Ligon, in the arm as they drove off in Rodgers' car.

But Brutkiewicz insisted his client was not even present during the shooting.

"I'm convinced he had nothing to do with it," he said. "The government's case is that Dubose appeared out of nowhere and fired the shots."

Brutkiewicz said the government's case depends on an unreliable witness who told authorities she saw Dubose at the shooting. But he said the woman who took Bohannon to the hospital shortly after the shooting told authorities that he showed up alone.

Brutkiewicz said the altercation between Bohannon and Rodgers apparently was drug-related. As they were fighting, Ligon bit Bohannon in the neck "much like a vampire would," he said.

Bohannon already has been sentenced to life for an unrelated carjacking he committed in Prichard in January 2005. Dubose was charged with murder in a separate incident in 2002 but won acquittal from a jury.

FBI Seizes Computers As Part Of Pension-Fund Probe (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

8 People Face Charges In Connection To Pension Woes

SAN DIEGO -- The FBI has seized computers and documents from the workplace of San Diego's former pension system president as part of a two-year investigation into the city finances.

It's the first known time federal investigators probing the pension problems have sought information outside City Hall and the pension offices.

FBI agents arrived unannounced earlier this month at the San Diego State University Foundation office where Frederick Pierce IV works as a developer. The FBI has not released further details of the search because the search warrant is sealed and Pierce said he was out of town when the FBI went to his office.

Pierce, 43, has not been charged with any wrongdoing and said he has received other federal requests for information and has always cooperated.

"It has always been my policy to provide any information that I am requested to provide," Pierce said.

The pension system is under federal scrutiny after the city cut contributions to its pension fund and -- at the same time -- increased retirement benefits, once in 1996 and again in 2002. The moves helped create a pension deficit of at least $1.4 billion.

In all, eight people face criminal charges in connection with the pension probe.

FBI Searches Pension Fund Ex-chief's Office (SDUT)

By Matthew T. Hall And Lisa Petrillo, Union-tribune Staff Writers

The San Diego Union-Tribune, April 27, 2006

A two-year FBI investigation into San Diego's embattled pension system grew this month to include its former president, Frederick Pierce IV, when federal agents seized computers and unspecified documents from his workplace.

The search marks the first known case where federal investigators probing the city's fiscal failures have sought information outside City Hall and the pension offices.

Agents arrived unannounced two or three weeks ago at the San Diego State University Foundation office where Pierce works as a developer, Pierce and an SDSU Foundation spokeswoman said yesterday.

San Diego FBI Chief Dan Dzwilewski confirmed that agents searched Pierce's office, but declined further comment because the search warrant is sealed.

Pierce and foundation spokeswoman Theresa Nakata would not say whether the scope of the search extended beyond the pension fund and its $1.43 billion deficit.

Pierce said he was out of town when the FBI appeared at his office.

“I received a written request for information, and I complied with that request,” Pierce said. “It has always been my policy to provide any information that I am requested to provide.”

He said it wasn't the first time that prosecutors have sought documents from him related to the pension fund and added that he has cooperated when questioned about fund-related investigations.

An FBI spokeswoman referred calls to the U.S. Attorney's Office, where a spokeswoman said she could not comment unless charges have been filed.

Pierce, 43, has not been charged with any wrongdoing in the pension scandal.

Federal investigators have papered City Hall with subpoenas since early 2004, when they began digging into the pension deficit and allegations of possible corruption and securities fraud by city officials.

The deficit stems mainly from City Council decisions to underfund the system while increasing benefits in 1996 and 2002.

Pierce was appointed to the San Diego City Employees Retirement System board in 1997 under Mayor Susan Golding, then reappointed to a second six-year term in 2003 under Mayor Dick Murphy.

Pierce, a well-connected developer and development consultant, is a former president of the SDSU Alumni Association as well as an ex-trustee of the California State University System, the largest public university system in the nation.

He has been one of the highest-profile developers on the SDSU Foundation's $350 million Paseo retail-housing complex. The project has been in the works for 18 years and was recently taken over by San Diego State.

Pierce has worked for several years with the foundation. His contract ends Sunday because the foundation is shifting its focus away from development.

The foundation is a 60-year-old nonprofit with a $160 million annual budget to handle research funding, scholarships and real estate dealings for the 33,000-student university.

Pierce left the 13-member pension board in March 2005 as the council overhauled its makeup and membership with a slew of new appointees.

He had been president of the board for five of the eight years he served on it.

In January, he became the first witness called by defense attorneys representing six board members charged in San Diego Superior Court with violating state conflict-of-interest laws.

In all, eight people face criminal charges in pension probes.

In January 2005, a federal grand jury indicted the system's former administrator, its attorney and three former board members on conspiracy and fraud charges, contending that they illegally boosted their retirement benefits while condoning the underfunding of the system.

Four months later, District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis filed charges against six past and present pension board members – including three who face federal charges – alleging that each improperly benefited from votes as city employees to let San Diego pay less into the pension fund.

Justices Hear Challenge To Lethal Injection (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court appeared split Wednesday over how a lower court should handle a Florida death row inmate's contention that the state's method of lethal injection is unconstitutional because it could cause him great pain.

Clarence Hill, who shot and killed a Pensacola police officer in 1982, has exhausted the appeals regularly afforded to inmates who challenge their sentences. But his lawyers say his complaint about the lethal injection procedure is a civil rights claim that doesn't directly challenge his sentence, just the way it's going to be carried out. The state says essentially that Hill's claim is a ruse, an indirect way back into court to stop the state from taking his life.

Two lower courts have rejected Hill's claims, but that has happened against the backdrop of a mounting national debate over how cruel or humane lethal injection is. Eight executions have been delayed this year to consider the issue, thanks in part to medical studies that suggest some inmates may feel terrible pain when intravenous drugs are used to end their lives.

The debate is laced with a bit of irony: Most states voluntarily abandoned other forms of execution - the gas chamber, electrocution, even hangings - in favor of lethal injection because it was seen as more humane. Florida, in particular, was notorious for its "flaming" electric chair, which set at least one inmate ablaze.

Those states now find themselves defending lethal injection against claims that the drugs used don't always kill painlessly and instead may simply prevent prisoners from writhing or screaming. One brief in Hill's case notes that in Florida, dogs and cats couldn't be put down the way inmates are.

The justices are jumping into the debate on somewhat oblique terms, to decide whether Hill can get a hearing on his claims and under what conditions. The justices so far have declined to get involved in cases that would require them to decide directly whether lethal injection is unconstitutionally cruel.

During arguments, the justices seemed split largely along ideological lines. Several more-conservative justices jumped quickly on Hill's lawyer, D. Todd Doss, pressing him to demonstrate that Hill's claims weren't a delay tactic that could be repeated.

They wondered why Hill hadn't suggested an alternative means for execution.

"So if the state comes up with another means, you can then object to that, too, right?" Justice Antonin Scalia asked. "You could challenge that method, too, so another few years would go by" before the execution.

Doss said he disagreed that there was a risk of "perpetual litigation."

DOJ_NMG_0026697

Justice Samuel Alito tried to get Doss to be more specific about his objections: Are they about Florida's procedures or the death penalty in general?

"Is there any method used that's not a violation of the Eighth Amendment?" Alito asked, referring to the constitutional protection against cruel and unusual punishment.

Doss said if the sedatives administered during lethal injection work and an inmate feels no pain, then it would be constitutional.

Scalia focused on Doss' idea of "no pain."

"Is excruciating pain the standard, or any pain?" Scalia asked.

Doss said the court has outlawed executions that inflict "wanton or gratuitous" pain on inmates.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. quizzed Doss on why Hill's claim was raised just a few days before his execution. Presumably, the procedure was set long before that, Roberts said.

Doss said Florida had no set procedures for lethal injection nor rules to administer those procedures. He said that despite many attempts, he was rebuffed when he asked for information about which drugs would be used during Hill's execution. He found out only at the last minute.

"This is shrouded in secrecy," Doss said.

Carolyn M. Snurkowski, Florida's assistant deputy attorney general, weathered heavy questioning from many of the court's more liberal justices and Justice Anthony Kennedy, a conservative who appeared to hold the decisive vote in the case.

Snurkowski insisted that unless Hill and his lawyers offered an alternative method of execution, Hill's claims shouldn't be treated any differently from routine challenges to his sentence. She said the court's rulings required Hill to offer an alternative.

"What is the legal source for that? What case? What principle?" Kennedy demanded.

Snurkowski pointed to a 2004 high court ruling that allowed an Alabama prisoner to pursue similar claims. In that case, she said, the court relied on the fact that the prisoner had suggested alternative methods.

Justice David Souter objected to that assertion. He said the court mentioned the suggested alternative methods in that case, but didn't hinge the ruling on it. "I don't know what would elevate that to a principle," he said. "I don't know why the state doesn't have the obligation to not execute without causing gratuitous pain."

The case should be decided by late June.

Supreme Court Enters Lethal-Injection Debate (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON – The Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday in a capital-punishment case that focuses on whether a lethal-injection method used in Florida and most other states causes excruciating pain for death-row inmates.

"Your procedure would be prohibited if applied to dogs and cats," Justice John Paul Stevens told Florida Assistant Deputy Attorney General Carolyn Snurkowski.

Justice Stephen Breyer said that a medical journal study found that inmates can suffer pain under the three-drug combination drugs and it "doesn't seem too difficult" to alter the medicines.

Ms. Snurkowski said that it would be up to the inmate to detail a new method, an argument that seemed to anger several court members. "Doesn't the state have a minimal obligation on its own" to investigate whether its executions cause gratuitous pain, asked Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

The high court is delving into a limited part of the subject: whether inmates can file special last-minute challenges to the chemicals used in lethal injection even if they've exhausted all their regular appeals.

The justices had a wide-ranging discussion about the way executions are carried out, and how they can be contested. Justice Antonin Scalia said that if they allow Florida death-row inmate Clarence Hill to pursue claims, that could drag out a case that has already been pending for more than two decades.

Mr. Hill, convicted of killing Pensacola Police Officer Stephen Taylor in 1982, was strapped to a gurney with lines running into his arms to deliver the drugs when the Supreme Court in January intervened and blocked the execution. He claims that the chemicals -- sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride -- used in Florida executions and by many other states can cause excruciating pain. The first drug is a painkiller. The second one paralyzes the inmate and the third causes a fatal heart attack.

Justices have never ruled on the constitutionality of lethal injection, which is used by the federal government and every state that has capital punishment except Nebraska.

In this case, they can give inmates new authority to challenge lethal injection as unconstitutionally cruel. The court's decision to hear the case renewed legal efforts around the country on behalf of death-row inmates, and executions have been stopped in California, Maryland and Missouri.

Retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote the court's 2004 ruling in its last lethal injection case. Justices said that Alabama death-row inmate David Larry Nelson could pursue a last-ditch claim that his death by lethal injection would be unconstitutionally cruel because of his damaged veins. He argued that prison staff would have to cut into his flesh to get to a vein.

Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the pro-death penalty Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, said, "Hill's failure to follow the rules governing that process should not be rewarded by the opportunity to delay his well-deserved execution with a last-minute challenge in the form of a civil rights lawsuit." (Hill v. McDonough)

High Court Rules on Forfeiture Sales

Justices ruled Wednesday that states must work harder to inform homeowners that their homes will be sold for back taxes.

By a 5-3 vote, justices reversed an Arkansas Supreme Court's decision in the case of Gary Jones, a Little Rock man whose home was sold by the state because of delinquent taxes.

Chief Justice John Roberts, writing for the majority, said Arkansas officials should have done more when certified letters mailed to Mr. Jones's home were returned as unclaimed and when he failed to respond to a newspaper ad announcing the sale.

Justice Roberts said many states require authorities to post notices on the doors of the homes up for sale or to send letters via regular mail that don't require signatures and can be left at the address. States don't spare efforts to collect taxes, Justice Roberts wrote. So, he said, they also shouldn't spare efforts to track down owners of homes about to be sold off to pay delinquent taxes.

Justice Roberts said states must take "additional reasonable" steps to provide notice. But he declined to define what those steps should be. "In this case, the state is exerting extraordinary power -- taking and selling a house," the chief justice wrote. "It is not too much to insist that the state do a bit more to attempt to let [a homeowner] know about it when the notice letter addressed to him is returned unclaimed."

In the dissent, Justice Clarence Thomas said Arkansas officials had done more than enough to try to locate Mr. Jones, who was legally obligated to make sure tax authorities had his correct address on file. "The state cannot be charged to correct a problem of [Mr. Jones's] own creation and of which it was not aware," wrote Justice Thomas, who was joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Kennedy.

Justice Samuel Alito didn't participate in the decision because he was not yet a member of the court when the case was argued. (Jones v. Flowers)

Court Weighs Procedural Issue In Death Row Lawsuit (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Few issues test the Supreme Court's unity more than the death penalty, and the justices' deep disagreements were evident yesterday during oral argument on the rights of death row inmates to challenge lethal injection as a cruel and unusual punishment.

With questions and comments from the justices revealing an even split along liberal-conservative lines, the outcome could depend on Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the centrist who is the court's swing voter now that Sandra Day O'Connor has retired.

Kennedy was in no mood for joking as he weighed Florida death row inmate Clarence E. Hill's contention that the three-drug injection used by Florida, 36 other states and the federal system risks harsh but undetectable pain.

When his colleagues engaged in some light banter, as they often do during oral arguments, Kennedy interrupted: "This is a death case. It's not that amusing."

The case comes at a time when the three-drug lethal injection is under renewed legal attack. Death row inmates' attorneys have won stays of execution based on what they say is new medical information showing a risk of great pain if poorly trained personnel mishandle the anesthetic that is supposed to render inmates unconscious.

The anesthetic precedes a dose of a paralyzing agent; then comes potassium chloride, which burns the lining of the veins on its way to the heart. But if a prisoner is still conscious when the potassium chloride arrives, he will feel excruciating pain; paralyzed, he will be unable to show it, the lawyers note.

But the precise issue before the court is not whether lethal injection is unconstitutional. Rather, it is a related procedural question: Should courts treat a prisoner's assertion that a particular method of execution is unconstitutional as a federal civil rights lawsuit, as Hill argues, or as a petition for habeas corpus, as Florida says?

The question is critical, because Congress has put strict limits on habeas corpus claims but not on civil rights suits.

If the court agrees with Hill, death row inmates could engage states in time-consuming litigation over the particulars of their lethal-injection protocols, even if the prisoners, like Hill, have already used up their habeas corpus petitions.

But if the court accepts Florida's position that Hill's true purpose is to evade a death sentence through protracted litigation, then it will bar his claim as the equivalent of a belated habeas corpus suit -- thus affirming the states' wide discretion in execution methods.

D. Todd Doss, Hill's attorney, insisted that a victory for his client "would not leave open a total series of challenges." He accepted Justice David H. Souter's proposal to amend Hill's lawsuit "so everything can be resolved in this one case."

Kennedy did not seem entirely satisfied, noting that, if Hill wins, a state might risk a new lawsuit each time it changes its protocol, even if its goal is a less painful death. That might create "a disincentive for states to try to make the process less painful," Kennedy said.

Even members of the court sympathetic to Hill sought reassurances yesterday that he is not out to game the system, probing Doss on why he did not sue until shortly before Hill's Jan. 25 execution date.

"You did know there was a lethal-injection procedure for another prisoner, but you didn't challenge it then," said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg. "So why did you wait?"

Doss said he had no choice because the state refused to say precisely what would be done during the execution.

But Ginsburg was even tougher on Florida's assistant deputy attorney general, Carolyn M. Snurkowski, noting that nothing in the state's laws "binds" it to a promise of a humane execution.

When Snurkowski suggested that Hill's claim is weakened by the fact that he has not proposed an alternative method, Souter pounced: "Why does he have an obligation under the Eighth Amendment or any other ground to tell the state how to execute people?"

Snurkowski's inability to satisfy Souter irked Kennedy.

"You're not being forthcoming with your answer," he snapped.

Hill's failure to offer an alternative to Florida's lethal-injection protocol was key to the Bush administration's brief supporting Florida. But during the presentation of Kannon K. Shanmugam, an assistant to the solicitor general, Kennedy seconded Souter's point, observing that "if there are other methods that might be used, it seems to me the state has a minimum obligation to investigate those."

The case is Hill v. McDonough , No. 05-8794. A decision is expected by July.

Supreme Court Looks At Humaneness Of Lethal Injections (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, April 27, 2006

The Supreme Court on Wednesday seemed reluctant to place too many procedural barriers in the path of death row inmates who want to make last-minute challenges to a state's method of execution.

DOJ_NMG_0026700

Exploring for the first time the humaneness of lethal injections -- the method of choice for almost all states that use the death penalty -- the justices appeared reluctant to give states carte blanche to use any combination of death-dealing chemicals they choose.

At one point in oral arguments in Hill v. McDonough, Justice Anthony Kennedy suggested that states have "some minimal obligation" to ensure that the chemicals used in legal executions employ the "most humane method" available.

Justice John Paul Stevens, citing a brief filed in the case by three veterinarians, noted that the combination of drugs used by Florida would be prohibited for use in euthanizing dogs and cats.

The case before the Court was brought by Clarence Hill, who was convicted in the 1982 murder of a Pensacola, Fla., police officer during a bank robbery. Decades of appeals were intermittently successful in reversing the sentence, but each time the sentence was restored.

In 2000, Florida changed its method of execution from the electric chair to lethal injection. But Hill did not challenge the procedure until weeks before his scheduled execution date of Jan. 24, 2006. Florida courts denied the challenge, and four days before the execution date, Hill's lawyers went to federal court, invoking 42 U.S.C. §1983 and claiming that lethal injection would violate their client's civil rights.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals treated his 1983 claim as the equivalent of a habeas corpus petition and denied it as an improper second or successive petition under the 1996 law that Congress passed limiting habeas. Hours before the scheduled execution, Justice Kennedy granted a stay to allow the appeal over whether and how Hill could challenge the method of execution.

Hill's lawyer D. Todd Doss of Lake City, Fla., argued that the challenge should be allowed because the execution method was new in the state and questions about its humaneness only recently emerged. He also said the state left him "in the dark" as to precisely what combination of drugs would be used in the execution.

Several justices seemed worried that if an eleventh-hour §1983 suit is allowed, that device could be abused to delay executions every time the state adopts a new combination of chemicals. "I'd be willing to bet," said Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., that successive civil rights claims would be brought.

Doss said that would not be the case "if the sedative works" and the state's new formula is constitutional. Doss and other death penalty opponents say the current sequence of drugs used in executions could result in severe pain for inmates.

Florida Assistant Deputy Attorney General Carolyn Snurkowski ran into a buzz saw of harsh questioning when she argued that inmates who challenge a method of execution under §1983 should be required to suggest an alternative procedure.

Justices Kennedy, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg pressed her repeatedly on the legal source for her assertion. She apologized for seeming "disingenuous" but did not have an answer until Roberts bailed her out with a justification. If an inmate is not required to offer an alternative, Roberts said, the claim would amount to a habeas corpus challenge to the sentence itself.

But several justices seemed to believe that it was not unreasonable for an inmate to invoke the civil rights laws to challenge an execution method, no matter when it occurs in the appeals process.

First developed in Oklahoma in 1977, the three-drug injection method has been adopted in 37 of 38 death penalty states. Though it has been viewed as a more humane alternative to the electric chair and previous execution methods, Human Rights Watch last week issued a report asserting that in fact "there is mounting evidence that prisoners may have experienced excruciating pain during their executions."

A separate case directly testing the constitutionality of lethal injections is pending before the Court in Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen. A death row inmate is appealing a decision last October by the Tennessee Supreme Court that upheld lethal injections as constitutional.

McDermott Files Appeal In Taped Call Case (AP-Y2)

By Matthew Daly

AP2, April 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026701

Rep. Jim McDermott (news, bio, voting record) on Wednesday asked a full nine-member appeals court to hear an appeal of a case involving an illegally taped telephone call that was leaked to reporters nearly a decade ago.

A three-judge appeals court panel ruled last month that McDermott, D-Wash., violated federal law by giving the news media a tape recording of a 1996 call involving then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga.

The 2-1 opinion, by judges from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, who was heard on the 1996 call. Boehner was then a Gingrich lieutenant and is now House majority leader.

The appeals court ordered McDermott to pay Boehner about $700,000 for leaking the taped conversation. The figure includes $60,000 in damages and more than $600,000 in legal costs.

In court papers filed Wednesday, McDermott asked all nine members of the appeals court to hear the case, saying it involved a crucial First Amendment issue.

"The First Amendment cannot be subverted if we are to remain a free nation," McDermott said in a statement.

McDermott's petition said the full court should hear arguments in the case "because the divided panel decided a constitutional issue of exceptional importance in a manner inconsistent with on-point Supreme Court precedent."

He called the March 28 ruling "both unsound in principle and unworkable in practice," adding that it "will chill the disclosure of truthful information on matters of public concern. Clear and authoritative legal guidance here is imperative, especially for the media, which routinely receive information in all sorts of ways, from all sorts of sources."

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Boehner, said McDermott's case was weak.

"Everyone expects political adversaries to disagree, but unfortunately Jim McDermott took it a step too far, and he broke federal law in pursuit of his political opponents."

A Florida couple last year pleaded guilty to illegally taping portions of the call, and said they provided the tape to McDermott, who has admitted disclosing the tape.

Rove testifies

Top White House aide Karl Rove made his fifth grand jury appearance in the Valerie Plame affair yesterday, undergoing several hours of questioning about a new issue that has come to light since the last time he testified, the Associated Press reports.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald declined to comment at the conclusion of the grand jury session. Mr. Rove appeared at ease as he left the U.S. courthouse, joking to journalists to "move to the back" as the White House aide, his attorney and several reporters entered an elevator to leave the building.

Wednesday's session is believed to be only the second time Mr. Fitzgerald has met with a new grand jury examining questions left unanswered in the leaking of Mrs. Plame's name. The only other time Mr. Fitzgerald was seen going before the new panel was Dec. 7.

The previous grand jury looking into the CIA leak expired Oct. 28, the day it indicted Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI. The only new issue in the CIA leak probe known to involve Mr. Rove is a contact his attorney, Robert Luskin, had with Time magazine reporter Viveca Novak.

Mr. Rove "testified voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance," Mr. Luskin said in a statement. "Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges."

According to Mr. Luskin, the prosecutor has advised that Mr. Rove is not a target of the investigation.

York County To Pay $16 Million To Settle Dispute Over INS Housing (AP)

By PATRICK WALTERS, The Associated Press

AP, April 27, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — York County will pay the federal government $16 million to settle a dispute over how much its prison charged to house immigration detainees.

The Department of Justice alleged that the county knowingly understated the overall number of inmates at the prison, resulting in a higher rate being charged for federal immigration detainees being housed there between October 1999 and March 2003.

The county, however, does not admit any wrongdoing under the settlement reached Wednesday.

"We disagree with their characterization concerning that agreement," said Michael Flannelly, York County solicitor, adding that the county settled to avoid expensive litigation. "Given the level of risk that we were facing, we believe it's an appropriate settlement."

In 2000, the now-defunct U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service agreed to increase the rate to $60 a day for each federal detainee based on York's statement of prison operating costs and the inmate population.

But York reported that the average daily population of the prison was 996 inmates for the applicable period, rather than the 1,544 it reported to the state, according to the U.S. government.

The difference in those figures led to the U.S. government being charged an inflated rate for detainees at York, one of the nation's largest immigration detention centers, federal officials said.

Flannelly said, however, that while some of the information provided by Warden Thomas H. Hogan "may have been inaccurate as a technical matter," the $60 figure was a fair price and the immigration service got what it paid for.

Charles Miller, a Justice Department spokesman, said he considered the legal matter closed.

The county expects to pay the money over the next six years and the extra cost is not expected to lead to any tax increase, Flannelly said. He said the federal government is currently between $3.5 million and $4 million behind in its payments, and that money could be put toward what the county owes.

Now that the dispute is resolved, the county also plans to ask for an increase in the current per diem that would help pay much of the remaining amount owed, Flannelly said.

Miller said he could not comment on how much the U.S. government may owe in back fees or what the new per diem rate would be.

A $20 million prison addition several years ago gave the federal government one of its largest prison detention centers in the country, complete with immigration courtrooms and office space for staff members of the since-renamed agency.

But a 2001 audit by the federal government said the prison charged too much to house detainees and urged the immigration service to seek a better deal.

Contractor To Pay For Allegedly Misrepresenting Size Status (GOVEXEC)

By Michael Hardy

Government Executive, April 27, 2006

Insight Enterprises has agreed to pay the government $1 million to settle claims that its subsidiary, Insight Public Sector, fraudulently misrepresented itself as a small business to get a federal contract.

Insight, an information technology solutions provider based in Tempe, Ariz., admitted no wrongdoing in agreeing to the settlement. Lloyd Chapman, president of the American Small Business League, initially pursued the case against Insight in a Small Business Administration complaint.

Chapman believes that large companies often represent themselves as small businesses and that SBA and the General Services Administration rarely take action.

Insight's troubles arose after it acquired Comark and Comark Government and Education Services in 2002. CGES, which is now Insight Public Sector, had won a place on the GSA schedule as a small business in 1996. After investigating, the Justice Department and SBA contended that CGES had not been a small business in 1996 and had later received preference on some orders through the GSA schedule because of its reported size status.

The company disputes that claim, but agreed to settle to avoid the risk and expense of litigation, said Richard Fennessy, Insight's president and chief executive officer, in a statement issued late last month.

Chapman said he had hoped that former SBA Administrator Hector Barreto, who resigned yesterday, would be followed by a reformer willing to tackle the problem of fraud in small-business contracting. However, the Bush administration announced yesterday that the nominee to follow Barreto is Steven Preston, executive vice president of strategic services at ServiceMaster.

Chapman said Preston is an unknown quantity.

"I predict that we will not see Mr. Preston do anything to address the 11 federal investigations that have found billions of dollars in small-business contracts have been diverted to large firms as a result of fraud, abuse and lack of oversight," Chapman said in a written statement. "If Preston is approved, he will likely foster policies that will act as barriers to small firms doing business with the federal government and continue to allow awards to Fortune 1000 companies to be reported as small-business contracts."

Some Archives Files Wrongly Kept Secret (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

The CIA and other agencies wrongly kept secret about a third of the records they pulled from public shelves at the National Archives during reclassification efforts that were far more extensive than previously disclosed, according to an audit released yesterday.

Auditors for the Archives who reviewed a representative sample of thousands of formerly public records found that 24 percent were pulled despite being "clearly inappropriate" for reclassification, and another 12 percent were "questionable" as candidates for reclassification.

"In short, more than one of every three documents removed from the open shelves and barred to researchers should not have been tampered with," said Allen Weinstein, the archivist of the United States, who ordered the audit and imposed a moratorium on the reclassification efforts last month.

The moratorium and audit represented an about-face for the Archives, which in 2001 and 2002 entered into secret pacts with the CIA and Air Force in which Archives officials agreed to help hide the multiyear reclassification efforts.

Weinstein, who joined the agency last year, announced last week that the Archives would no longer enter into such agreements. Yesterday, he lifted the moratorium on reclassification efforts and announced new procedures that he said would ensure that withdrawals of records are rare and that the public would be notified when they occur. The Archives also plans to launch a pilot National Declassification Initiative to bring new standards and more accountability to executive branch declassification efforts.

Even as he pledged increased transparency, Weinstein said that he could not disclose examples of the documents that agencies inappropriately pulled from public view, referring the question to the specific agencies.

Independent historian Matthew M. Aid uncovered the reclassification efforts last summer when his requests for documents formerly available at the Archives were delayed or denied. The program dates to the Clinton administration, when the CIA and other agencies began recalling documents they believed were improperly released under a 1995 executive order requiring declassification of many historical records at least 25 years old.

In February, the Archives estimated that about 9,500 records totaling more than 55,000 pages had been withdrawn and reclassified since 1999. The new audit shows the real haul was much larger -- at least 25,515 records were removed by five different agencies, including the CIA, Air Force, Department of Energy, the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Archives.

J. William Leonard, director of the Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, said 64 percent of audited records did contain information that met standards for continuing classification. In some cases, it was the name of a CIA agent in a decades-old document that otherwise could have remained public, he said. In other cases, records had been published elsewhere, and in still other cases withdrawing a document might counterproductively draw attention to it, he said.

Auditors also found that the CIA withdrew a "considerable number" of records it knew should be unclassified "in order to obfuscate" other records it was trying to protect.

"We hold people accountable, and rightfully so, when they engage in unauthorized disclosures of information," said Leonard, who led the audit. "But we also have that affirmative responsibility, each and every one of us, to challenge inappropriate classification decisions. And it's not done. It's simply not done with any degree of regularity in this government."

Aid praised Weinstein for ordering the audit but said lifting the moratorium before finalizing the new procedures was a mistake. "The decision to let these people go back and do the reclassification again makes no sense to me whatsoever," he said.

Steven Aftergood, director of the Federation of American Scientists' Project on Government Secrecy, said, "It's too early to say whether this will solve the problem, but it brings the matter out into the open where it belongs."

National Archives Says Records Were Wrongly Classified (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — An audit by the National Archives of more than 25,000 historical documents withdrawn from public access since 1999 found that more than a third did not contain sensitive information justifying classification, archives officials announced Wednesday.

They said the removal of the remaining two-thirds was technically justified, though many had already been published or contained old secrets with little practical import.

Even withdrawing those documents that included truly significant secrets may have done more harm than good by calling new attention to the sensitivity of records that researchers had read and photocopied for years, the officials said.

"The irony is that some of these reviews have actually exacerbated any possible damage to national security," said J. William Leonard, head of the archives' Information Security Oversight Office and the government's overseer of classification of records.

Calling the exposure of the hidden effort to reclassify records a "turning-point moment," Allen Weinstein, the head of the National Archives, announced a new effort to set consistent standards for deciding what records should be protected.

The pilot National Declassification Initiative, overseen by the archives, will seek to reduce what Mr. Weinstein called an "unconscionable backlog" of historical records not yet released and to avoid unnecessary classification in the future.

"We're in the access business, not the classification business," Mr. Weinstein said. He said all the agencies that had withdrawn records, including the Air Force and the Central Intelligence Agency, had agreed to drop the practice of secretly reclassifying documents and to operate under new standards of transparency.

Paul Gimigliano, a C.I.A. spokesman, said the reclassification of documents had been necessary because other agencies had released C.I.A. intelligence without allowing the spy agency to review it.

"Once classified material is made accessible to the public, there are few good options to protect that information," Mr. Gimigliano said Wednesday. "That said, the C.I.A. has worked very closely with the archives to improve the process and ensure that the public has maximum access to properly declassified records."

In announcing the results of the audit, both Mr. Weinstein and Mr. Leonard said it raised unsettling questions about the overall quality of decisions by the three million Americans who hold security clearances about what should be secret. "To be effective, the classification process is a tool that must be wielded with precision," Mr. Leonard said.

The audit found that 25,315 documents were withdrawn from public access, far more than the 9,000 they estimated in February, and that 64 percent met the minimal criteria for classification. The Air Force was responsible for the largest share — 17,702 — followed by the C.I.A., the Department of Energy, the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the presidential libraries, which are part of the National Archives system.

The auditors discovered that C.I.A. reviewers deliberately classified some "purely unclassified" documents simply to obscure the removal of other documents they judged to be genuinely sensitive. In addition, the audit showed, some records that had always been unclassified were classified by C.I.A. reviewers — "often 50 years later" — because they contained a name of a C.I.A. official who had received a copy.

At the same time, the audit noted that more than one billion pages of previously secret government documents have been declassified since 1995, four times more than in the 15 years before that. It praised the C.I.A. for placing millions of pages of documents into a searchable computer system that is accessible to researchers at the archives.

The reclassification of documents began after some agencies found that their records had been improperly declassified in the mid-1990's in a process the audit admitted was "replete with errors." The review took place largely hidden from public view, and researchers found entire boxes of records missing from the shelves with only vague notations about "restricted status" as an explanation.

A few months ago, a number of historians led by Matthew M. Aid, a Washington writer on intelligence, discovered that documents they had copied at the archives long ago had been removed. In February, they confronted archives officials, who suspended all reclassifications and ordered the audit.

The withdrawal of documents was governed in part by secret agreements the National Archives signed with the C.I.A., in 2001, and the Air Force, in 2002, before Mr. Weinstein's tenure. Mr. Weinstein said Wednesday that such agreements were improper and should never have been signed.

Reaction to the audit and the planned overhaul of declassification from the affected government agencies, as well as from historians who had complained about the reclassification, was generally positive.

Mr. Aid, the historian who first uncovered the reclassifications, said he found the audit professional and its results "shocking."

"The various reclassification programs were, in my opinion, a massive waste of time and the taxpayers' money in a time of war, and did not enhance or improve U.S. national security at all," Mr. Aid said.

An Air Force spokeswoman, First Lt. Christy A. Stravolo, said: "This audit was a good thing. In the long run, it will improve the consistency of declassification processes across the board."

Archives: 1 In 3 Records Wrongly Resealed (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, April 26, 2006

The government improperly sealed hundreds of previously public CIA, Pentagon and other records by reclassifying them as secret on questionable grounds, an internal review said Wednesday.

The National Archives' audit of thousands of records withdrawn from public view since 1995 contends that one of every three was resealed without justification.

The investigation covered historical records held by the National Archives. But it comes amid broader debate on classifying records on national security grounds, which critics say is often done based on political expediency.

The Associated Press reported earlier this month that the National Archives agreed to seal previously public records — many of them more than 50 years old — despite concerns about whether it was justified.

On the other hand, Democrats have decried the timing of President Bush's 2003 decision to declassify sensitive intelligence and authorize its disclosure to rebut Iraq war critics. In recent weeks, the CIA has fired an employee accused of sharing classified information with news media.

"The ability and authority to classify national security information is a critical tool at the disposal of the government and its leaders," said William Leonard, head of the Archives' information security oversight office, in a briefing with reporters.

Such a system, Leonard said, is only effective if the 3 million federal workers who decide whether to seal records on national security grounds each day follow clear standards and are kept honest.

While the audit found numerous instances of improper reclassification, the National Archives declined to release details of what those documents contained, saying it was still working with the agencies to make them public again.

According to the audit:

_At least 32,315 publicly available records were reclassified since 1995, primarily by the U.S. Air Force (17,702), CIA (3,147) and Energy Department (2,164). Based on a sampling of 1,353 of those documents, 24 percent were resealed on clearly inappropriate grounds, while another 12 percent were questionable.

_Poor oversight by the agencies and the National Archives was to blame, primarily due to a lack of clear standards and protocol for reclassification.

_In many cases where a previously public document was resealed on national security grounds, the decision didn't make sense because the material had been published elsewhere.

National Archivist Allen Weinstein said at the news briefing that he was implementing new procedures to curtail abuses and ensure that resealing of documents is rare. The procedures require that the public be informed on a regular basis when records are withdrawn from public access.

The archives also will boost training, seek more federal funding to speed declassification and launch a longer-term study of how it handles materials that are deemed classified.

The archives' secret agreements with government agencies were made public earlier this month in response to a 3-year-old Freedom of Information Act request by The Associated Press. They provided new details on the efforts of the nation's chief historical repository to hide the fact that U.S. intelligence was secretly trying to reclassify approximately 55,500 pages of previously public documents.

The revelation drew widespread anger on Capitol Hill, and the agreement was even disowned by a former head of the archives. John Carlin, a former Kansas governor who served as chief archivist from 1995 to 2004, said the agreement was kept secret even from him.

"I was shocked by the content, particularly the language that it was in the best interest of the National Archives to keep the public in the dark," he said in a statement last week. "I spent most of my tenure stating that NARA is a public trust — this (agreement) undermines that trust."

Archives officials have been criticized for keeping the agreements secret. But internal NARA reports obtained by the AP under the Freedom of Information Act show archivists were concerned about the reclassification scheme as early as January 2003. As boxes of documents were pulled from shelves, historians and other researchers who regularly use archival materials were beginning to notice their absence.

"Researchers continue to question why records, some of which have been open for years, are not readily available for research in 2003," archivists said in a January 2003 report. "The exceptional efforts of the (staff) ... have worked to placate most of the impacted researchers, and complaints are amazingly few in number."

Two years later, NARA officials appeared frustrated by the reclassification effort.

"The amount of disruption to timely reference service wreaked by ... declassification (sic!) teams is growing," a NARA official said in an April 2005 report. "The Air Force team seems particularly bent on expanding their mandate to series of records well beyond recognized rationality considering the sort of information they are allegedly seeking to identify."

Lorillard Seeks To Reverse Anti-Smoking Ads Decision (DOW)

Dow Jones, April 27, 2006

WILMINGTON, Del. -(Dow Jones)- Lorillard Tobacco Co. Wednesday asked the Delaware Supreme Court to overturn a ruling that the "truth" series of anti- smoking ads does not "vilify" the tobacco industry.

The maker of Newport, Kent, True and Old Gold cigarette brands says the ad campaign, which is targeted at children and teenagers, violates the bargain tobacco companies made in 1998 to settle lawsuits from 46 state attorneys general, an agreement that called for the industry to pay for anti-smoking ads.

Lorillard wants to strip funding from American Legacy Foundation, the non- profit organization behind the "truth" ads and the recipient of $1.5 billion in funds under the settlement. According to the company, the ads breach restrictions against vilification and personal attacks contained in the settlement.

"We are pursuing this lawsuit because we want to get what we bargained for," Ronald Milstein, general counsel for Lorillard, a unit of the Loews Corp. (LTR) (LTR), told Dow Jones Newswires in an interview after the hearing.

American Legacy says that the ads have to be edgy to reach the defiant youngsters most at risk of smoking but that the campaign is tailored to avoid personal attacks and vilification, which it defines as abusive and unfair portrayals of tobacco companies.

Last year, a Delaware judge sided with American Legacy and against Lorillard in a legal battle over the "truth" ads.

Lorillard appealed the decision, and the Delaware Supreme Court is expected to rule later this year on whether American Legacy's "truth" ad campaign crossed the line by tackling evils in tobacco industry profiteering along with the evils of smoking.

Wednesday, a five-judge panel in Delaware viewed some "truth" ads, including a commercial showing young people piling body bags outside the headquarters of an unidentified tobacco company to illustrate the daily death toll from smoking.

That ad breached the deal, said John Parkins, attorney for Lorillard.

Another ad, which showed passers-by reacting to what seemed to be an abandoned, crying infant in a baby carriage, did not transgress, he said.

"They can run an effective, hard-hitting campaign without vilifying or personally attacking tobacco companies," Parkins said.

The dispute in Delaware is focused on the meaning of a very few words in the settlement in which tobacco companies agreed to fund anti-smoking ads, a settlement that created American Legacy.

But it's a fight that the foundation says could mean an end to the only anti- smoking ad campaign not controlled by cigarette makers.

"If they (Lorillard) were to have an all-out win in this court, that would basically shut us down," American Legacy Chief Executive Cheryl Healton told Dow Jones Newswires in an interview before Wednesday's debate before the Delaware Supreme Court.

The foundation points to academic studies that show the "truth" campaigns accomplish their goal of preventing youth smoking. Industry-funded ads are tailored to portray smoking as an adults-only activity and are thus more likely to make cigarettes attractive to rebellious teens, American Legacy's CEO said.

Healton said tobacco companies know the "truth" ads are costing them customers. Instead of dealing with American Legacy, she said, Lorillard is asking the Delaware court for a ruling that will let cigarette makers "start over with some well-behaved entity that won't cut their market share."

Lorillard's top lawyer says tobacco companies are not out to kill anti-smoking ad campaigns but they do not want to pay for ads that show them as profiteers at the expense of public health.

"Ads do not cause people to want to smoke," Milstein said.

Wednesday's arguments came just days after Delaware and a number of other states sued Lorillard and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. for allegedly shortchanging them in this year's settlement payments.

Lorillard and R.J. Reynolds say they have placed more than $750 million in escrow pending a resolution of how much they owe in 2006 on the settlement.

Vermont Attorney General William H. Sorrell, who also filed a suit over the 2006 shortfall, was in the Dover, Del., courtroom Wednesday as a member of American Legacy's board.

"We need to be able to continue an ad campaign that speaks to kids," Sorrell said in an interview. However, he said, American Legacy screens ads carefully to make sure they don't violate the covenant against personal attacks or abusive characterization.

"We've taken it very, very seriously that we can't throw just anything out there," Sorrell said. "That word vilification is there for a reason."

The Delaware Supreme Court arguments also come as American Legacy awaits a ruling from a federal judge in Washington, D.C., in the U.S. Department of Justice's case against tobacco companies. The Justice Department has recommended that $4 billion of any settlement in the case be earmarked for American Legacy, to expand its award-winning advertising effort.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Supreme Court To Decide Whether It's OK To Require ID To Vote (AP)

By DAVID EGGERT, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, April 27, 2006

LANSING, Mich. (AP) -- The state Supreme Court agreed Wednesday to decide whether Michigan can require voters to show photo ID, entering a decade-long political fray over issues such as election fraud and voter intimidation.

The court voted 5-2 to issue an advisory opinion on the constitutionality of a 1997 state law requiring voters to show photo identification to get a ballot. A court spokeswoman said the ruling will be binding, though it could be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Former Attorney General Frank Kelley, a Democrat, ruled nine years ago that the law violated the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which guarantees U.S. citizens the right to vote.

Opponents of the law say the requirement would keep poor people, non-drivers and others away from the polls. But supporters say it's needed to prevent election fraud.

The U.S. Justice Department, for example, has been investigating allegations that Detroit votes were cast last year in the names of dead people.

In February, the Republican-controlled state House passed a resolution asking the Supreme Court for an opinion after the 1997 law was amended to make an array of election-related changes. Five Republican nominees on the court agreed with the request, while two Democratic nominees opposed it.

"We can ensure the sanctity of the voting process," House Speaker Craig DeRoche, R-Novi, said of requiring ID to vote.

The high court asked Republican Attorney General Mike Cox to submit separate briefs within 84 days -- one arguing that the law is constitutional and the other arguing it is unconstitutional. The court also invited the state Bureau of Elections, Michigan Democratic Party and Michigan Republican Party to file arguments. It will hear oral arguments later.

Kelley appeared before the Attorney General Opinion Review Board last November to argue that his opinion should be left standing.

The board was considering a July request from state Rep. Chris Ward, R-Brighton, that Cox issue a new opinion on the law. A Cox spokesman said Wednesday that Cox will not issue a legal ruling because the matter is now pending before the Supreme Court.

Jason Moon, spokesman for the state Democratic Party, said requiring a photo ID is an illegal poll tax. But Ward has said would-be voters who don't have an ID could get a state-issued card free of charge.

Marcia McBrien, spokeswoman for the Michigan Supreme Court, said the court will decide whether the state law is constitutional on its face. She added that parties could challenge the state law in federal court.

Court rulings have been mixed regarding voter ID requirements.

Earlier this month, a federal judge upheld an Indiana law requiring voters to present photo identification, saying it places reasonable restrictions on casting a ballot.

But last year, a federal judge held that a Georgia law amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax and issued a temporary injunction blocking enforcement while the government appealed.

In January, the Republican-led Legislature amended the law to provide free photo IDs to any Georgian who needed one, and the U.S. Department of Justice signed off on the law last week.

Marriage Battle Gears Up For Fall (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

DOJ_NMG_0026709

RICHMOND -- At the Shad Planking in Wakefield, the traditional kickoff to Virginia's political campaign season, activists passed around chunks of pearl-white wedding cake and handed out yellow and black stickers that read, "Vote Yes 4 Marriage."

Days earlier, outside a post office in Fredericksburg, another group stood with clipboards and fliers and held up pumpkin-orange signs written in block letters to promote their cause. It was tax day, and one man held a sign that said, "No Taxation With Discrimination."

These are the beginnings of a statewide political campaign not for an individual candidate but for an idea. The groups represent the two sides of the debate over the proposed amendment to the Virginia Bill of Rights that would ban same-sex marriages and civil unions and will be on the ballot statewide Nov. 7.

"The campaign is in its infancy . . . we're finding that a lot of people don't even know about the constitutional amendment," said Doug Pfaff, a landscape designer from Fredericksburg who was among about 20 people opposed to the amendment who rallied last week along Princess Anne Street downtown. "Our job between now and November is trying to not only get people educated, but get them mobilized."

More than six months before Election Day, supporters and opponents have formed coalitions they hope will raise hundreds of thousands of dollars and lure scores of volunteers to their voter outreach efforts.

"This is a campaign that has similar attributes to a campaign as if we were electing a candidate," Chris Freund, director of communications for the Family Foundation, told a group of black ministers last week. The foundation is helping to lead the effort to pass the amendment. "Except here, we're electing marriage. We're voting on marriage."

Organizers on both sides said they hope to raise enough money to fill the airwaves with radio and television ads. And they vowed to send volunteers to as many county fairs, clambakes and cookouts as needed to get the vote out.

Since the adoption of the modern constitution of Virginia in 1971, the document has been altered more than 40 times, but proposed amendments have rarely engendered passionate campaigns. The last time the state's 230-year-old Bill of Rights was amended was 1996, with a new section that addressed the rights of crime victims.

"This will certainly be unique," said A.E. Dick Howard, a University of Virginia law professor who helped draft the state's modern constitution. "In most cases the amendments are so . . . technical that the first time people have heard of them is at the voting booth."

Nineteen states have passed constitutional amendments barring same-sex marriage, and six others will place the issue before voters this year. No such amendment put to voters has been defeated, but the issue continues to roil statehouses across the country. In Maryland, lawmakers debated the topic this year after a circuit court judge found the state's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriages to be unconstitutional.

Opponents of the marriage amendment will try to convince voters that the measure is about more than "electing marriage" and might also affect unwed heterosexual couples because it says the state should not recognize "a legal status for relationships of unmarried individuals." Organizers said that although they will tell voters that they should not "write discrimination" into the state constitution and that gay couples deserve civil benefits, they will largely seek to raise the specter that the amendment could harm some heterosexual couples.

"Once people understand that this is about more than just marriage, their support for it plummets," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the Commonwealth Coalition, which is fighting the ballot question.

Proponents say the amendment will protect Virginia from judges who might interpret the constitution to allow such unions. And they say there is no evidence that the amendment will void contracts between unwed heterosexual couples, as opponents have warned it will.

"Our job is to make sure that the misinformation doesn't stick," said Del. Robert G. Marshall (R-Prince William), chief sponsor of the constitutional amendment. He predicted that opponents will have a difficult time grabbing voters' attention with what he termed a complicated legal argument.

Meanwhile, proponents have aimed their message at church pastors across the state. At Saturday's meeting with the black ministers, Freund handed out DVDs titled "Why not Gay Marriage?" He also announced a "Marriage Protection Sunday" on Nov. 5, when proponents will urge pastors across the state to get their flocks to vote yes on the amendment.

The marriage amendment will be on the ballot the same day U.S. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) hopes to win reelection. In 2004, when 11 states passed similar measures, political observers said the amendments helped drive conservative Republicans to the polls and to President Bush, particularly in swing states such as Ohio. Allen includes support for the amendment in his stump speeches, and a spokesman predicted that the senator's position will help him on Election Day.

"We think Senator Allen is on the same side as the majority of Virginians," said campaign consultant Dick Wadhams.

Aides for the two Democrats vying to defeat Allen, former high-tech lobbyist Harris Miller and former Navy secretary James Webb, said their candidates oppose the amendment. Taylor West, press secretary for Miller, called the ballot question a "cynical attempt to divide Virginians" and said her candidate will focus on "the real issues" that affect voters, such as health care and jobs.

Study Assesses How Many Gays Marry If Legal (AP)

By David Crary, Ap National Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A new study attempts to gauge the percentage of gays and lesbians who have chosen to marry in places where that option is legal, with estimates ranging from as little as 2 percent to more than 16 percent, depending on the location.

A co-author of the report, released Wednesday, said both sides in the gay marriage debate may take heart from the findings.

The Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, which opposes gay marriage, reviewed data from the Netherlands, Belgium, Canada and Massachusetts, all of which allow same-sex partners to wed.

In each case, the study offered a range of estimates of the percentage of gays who had married, based on varying approximations - from 1 percent to 5 percent - of how many gays were in the general population.

In the Netherlands, where 8,127 same-sex couples married from April 1, 2001, through last December, the study said this represented between 2.6 percent and 6.3 percent of the country's gays and lesbians.

The study estimated that between 2 percent and 5 percent of Belgium's gays and lesbians, and 5.9 percent to 16.7 percent of those in Massachusetts had married. Same-sex marriage became legal in Massachusetts in May 2004, and 7,341 gay and lesbians couples had wed there through last December.

The institute study said calculations for Canada were difficult because the country allowed nonresidents to marry, but it estimated that as many as 14.3 percent of the gays and lesbians in the western province of British Columbia had married.

The report does not draw any major conclusions, saying it is too early to assess long-term trends.

"Whether same-sex marriage will emerge as commonplace or normative among gays and lesbians, or fade as time and novelty passes, cannot yet be determined," it said.

However, Maggie Gallagher, president of the Institute for Marriage and co-author of the study, said interpretations of the findings might vary according to one's views on gay marriage.

One faction, she said, might conclude that opposition to gay marriage was an overreaction given that seemingly modest numbers of people were choosing it. Another faction, she said, might look at the same numbers and contend that they did not justify overturning the long-standing concept of marriage as exclusively heterosexual.

"That's why the debate is so contentious," Gallagher said. "In one view, if you treat gay couples any differently, that's akin to racism. There's another view that there's something special about the unions of husbands and wives."

Gary Gates, a specialist in gay demography at the UCLA School of Law's Williams Institute, was given an advance look at the study. He disagreed with Gallagher's suggestion that relatively few gays and lesbians were opting for marriage.

Looking specifically at the Massachusetts data, and noting the limited time period of 20 months, he contended that a sharply higher percentage of gays and lesbians were deciding marry than heterosexuals of marrying age.

"Numerically, same-sex couples will never comprise a major portion of the married population," Gates said in a telephone interview. "But gay people do seem to be really interested in getting married - it's kind of a compliment to the institution of marriage."

Activists Visit West Point On Gay Policy (AP-Y2)

By Michael Virtanen

AP2, April 26, 2006

Twenty-one gay rights activists were detained at the U.S. Military Academy and issued federal citations Wednesday while protesting the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy.

The academy was their last stop on a 20-stop, cross-country tour of conservative Christian and military colleges that protest organizers say discriminate against gay, bisexual and transgendered people.

Members of the protest group Soulforce Equality Riders have faced charges for protests at five of the campuses. Ten were handcuffed and charged with disorderly conduct after demonstrating April 14 at the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, Colo.

On Wednesday, about 50 protesters arrived on buses at the gate that separates the storied U.S. Military Academy from the village of Highland Falls. The 21 detained had entered campus grounds and were warned they risked federal charges if they continued to try to protest inside the post.

After several trips through the gate, they were cited by military police for entry to military property for unlawful purposes, a misdemeanor. Federal law prohibits protests on military installations.

"I felt it was definitely something I should be doing," said protester Chad Grandy, 20, of Mount Pleasant, Mich., who was among those ticketed. "To see government-sanctioned discrimination, it really bothers me."

The "don't ask, don't tell" policy for the U.S. military and its service academies, set by Congress and signed by President Clinton, allows gays to serve in the armed forces if they abstain from homosexual activity and do not disclose their sexual orientation.

The Death Of Multiculturalism (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

In 1994 multiculturalism was at its high-water mark, and Richard Bernstein wrote "Dictatorship of Virtue," describing its excesses: the campus speech codes, the forced sensitivity training, the purging of dead white males from curriculums, the people who had their careers ruined by dubious charges of racism, sexism and ethnocentrism.

Then two years later, the liberal writer Michael Tomasky published "Left for Dead," which argued that the progressive movement was being ruined by multicultural identity politics. Democrats have lost the ability to talk to Americans collectively, Tomasky wrote, and seem to be a collection of aggrieved out-groups: feminists, blacks, gays and so on.

At the time, Bernstein and Tomasky were lonely voices on the left, and the multiculturalists struck back. For example, Martin Duberman slammed Tomasky's book in The Nation, and defended multiculturalism:

"The radical redefinitions of gender and sexuality that are under discussion in feminist and queer circles contain a potentially transformative challenge to all 'regimes of the normal.' The work of theorists like Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Jeffrey Weeks, Marjorie Garber and Judith Butler represents a deliberate systemic affront to fixed modes of being and patterns of power. They offer brilliant (if not incontrovertible) postulates about such universal matters as the historicity and fluidity of sexual desire, the performative nature of gender, and the multiplicity of impulses, narratives and loyalties that lie within us all."

Duberman insisted that postmodern multicultural theorizing would transform politics, but today his gaseous review reads as if it came from a different era, like an embarrassing glimpse of leisure suits in an old home movie.

That's because over the past few years, multiculturalism has faded away. A different sort of liberalism is taking over the Democratic Party.

Multiculturalism is in decline for a number of reasons. First, the identity groups have ossified. The feminist organizations were hypocritical during the Clinton impeachment scandal, and both fevered and weak during the Roberts and Alito hearings. Meanwhile, the civil rights groups have become stale and uninteresting.

Second, the Democrats have come to understand that they need to pay less attention to minorities and more to the white working class if they ever want to become the majority party again. Third, the intellectual energy on the left is now with the economists. People who write about inequality are more vibrant than people who write about discrimination.

Fourth and most important, 9/11 happened. The attacks aroused feelings of national solidarity, or a longing for national solidarity, that discredited the multiculturalists' tribalism.

Tomasky is now back with an essay in The American Prospect in which he argues that it is time Democrats cohered around a big idea — not diversity, and not individual rights, but the idea of the common good. The Democrats' central themes, Tomasky advises, should be that we're all in this together; we are all part of a larger national project; we all need to make some shared sacrifices and look beyond our narrow self-interest. Tomasky is hoping for a candidate who will ignore the demands of the single-issue groups and argue that all Americans have a stake in reducing economic fragmentation and social division.

Coincidentally, two other liberal writers, John Halpin and Ruy Teixeira, have just finished a long study that comes out in exactly the same place. Surveying mountains of polling data, they conclude that the Democrats' chief problem is that people don't think they stand for anything. Halpin and Teixeira argue that the message voters respond to best is the notion of shared sacrifice for the common good. After years of individualism from right and left, they observe, people are ready for an appeal to citizenship.

Naturally, this approach has weaknesses. Unlike in 1964, most Americans no longer trust government to be the altruistic champion of the common good, even if they wish it could. And while writers and voters talk about the common good, politicians are wired to think about their team. Harry Reid and Chuck Schumer will never ask their people to make sacrifices, but until they do, the higher talk of common good will sound like bilge.

Nonetheless, the decline of multiculturalism and the rebirth of liberal American nationalism is a significant event. Democrats are purging the last vestiges of the New Left and returning to the older civic liberalism of the 1950's and early 1960's.

Goodbye, Jesse Jackson. Goodbye, Gloria Steinem. Hello, Harry Truman.

Committee Will Probe Oil Industry Tax Records (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

A Senate committee yesterday announced an investigation into taxes paid by major oil companies and asked the Internal Revenue Service for the companies' tax returns.

The Senate Finance Committee promised "a comprehensive review of the federal taxes paid" by the 15 largest oil and gas companies. The panel said it wants to inspect their tax returns for the past five years.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the committee's chairman, said the panel is concerned about high profits and executive compensation at oil companies.

With gasoline prices soaring and oil companies announcing record profits, "it's relevant to know what the real financial picture is for this industry," said Sen. Max Baucus (Mont.), the ranking Democrat on the committee.

It is highly unusual for the Senate committee to seek corporate tax records. The last time it was done was when the panel asked the IRS for the tax records of Enron Corp.

The committee announcement came as Congress showed increasing concern amid political fallout over high gasoline prices and oil industry profits. Lawmakers began moving on various fronts to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0026713

In their request, the senators noted not only the industry profits but also "an extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive." The compensation package given by Exxon Mobil Corp. to outgoing Chairman Lee Raymond is said to total $400 million when all pension payoffs and stock options are included.

Senate Panel Demands Oil Co. Tax Records (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, April 26, 2006

A Senate committee Wednesday announced an investigation into taxes paid by major oil companies and asked the Internal Revenue Service for the companies' tax returns.

The Senate Finance Committee promised "a comprehensive review of the federal taxes paid" by the 15 largest oil and gas companies. The committee said it wanted to inspect their tax returns for the last five years.

Sen. Charles Grassley (news, bio, voting record), R-Iowa, the committee's chairman, said the panel was concerned about high profits and executive compensation at oil companies.

"I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man," said Grassley in a statement.

With gasoline prices soaring and oil companies announcing record profits, "it's relevant to know what the real financial picture is for this industry," Montana Sen. Max Baucus (news, bio, voting record), the ranking Democrat on the committee, said.

It's highly unusual for the Senate committee to seek corporate tax records. The last time it was done was when the panel asked the IRS for the tax records of Enron Corp.

The committee announcement came as Congress showed increasing concern amid political fallout over high gasoline prices and oil industry profits. Lawmakers began moving on various fronts to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars.

In a letter to the IRS, Grassley and Baucus said the tax records of the major oil companies are needed to conduct "a comprehensive review" of the companies' compliance with tax laws.

"As pressure mounts to address extraordinarily high gas prices that consumers are facing at the pump, we feel we should better understand the federal tax posture of the industry," the two senators wrote IRS Commissioner Mark Everson.

In their request, the senators noted not only the industry profits, but "an extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive, benefits which may have been subsidized in part by the taxpayers."

The retirement compensation package given by Exxon Mobil Corp. to outgoing Chairman Lee Raymond is said to total $400 million when all pension payoffs and stock options are included.

Anger over soaring gasoline prices and record oil profits is putting pressure on Congress to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars.

A House-Senate conference, negotiating a large tax bill, is considering a provision that would change accounting rules for oil inventories and require the five biggest oil companies to pay $4.3 billion more in taxes.

The measure passed the Senate but was viewed as essentially dead this week because of opposition from House GOP lawmakers. The White House opposed the idea, too, when it surfaced in November and threatened to veto the entire bill because of it.

Grassley said Wednesday that high fuel prices revived the inventory tax plan and it "is still being negotiated."

His House counterpart in the negotiations, Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, R-Calif., said the issue has not been decided. He denied he had rejected it.

Additionally, there is broad bipartisan support for scuttling other breaks given to oil companies only eight months ago when President Bush signed an energy bill.

Bush on Wednesday urged Congress to remove those tax provisions, worth $2 billion over 10 years. He said people should not pay for such subsidies when the industry is wallowing in cash.

Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, promised to press hard to repeal the subsidies. Domenici, R-N.M., said he cannot support tax breaks for oil companies "while some American families are searching their budgets for the extra cash they need to fill their gas tanks."

DOJ_NMG_0026714

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said he intended to offer legislation repealing the tax breaks. They included subsidies for exploration in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico and in geologically or politically difficult regions of the world, as well as royalty relief for certain oil and gas exploration.

Executives of the major oil companies said at a recent hearing they do not need those tax breaks.

"They feel they are not necessary. We are not involved in trying to hold them in place," Red Cavaney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, said Wednesday at a news conference.

Cavaney criticized the proposed changes on oil inventory accounting, calling them "equivalent to a windfall profits tax" for the five largest U.S. oil companies.

The Senate-passed plan would change accounting rules for oil kept in inventory. The changes would raise $4.3 billion in additional taxes from the companies over five years, according to a congressional analysis.

Cavaney said it was unfair to single out the five companies — Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron, BP, Shell and ConocoPhillips — for an accounting practice widely used both in and outside the oil industry.

Congressional Democrats see the uproar over the surge in gasoline costs as a chance to renew their push for a windfall profits tax.

"When Exxon Mobil can realize billions of dollars of profits at the expense of millions of American families, it's time to step up" and tax more of those earnings, said Sen. Richard Durbin (news, bio, voting record), D-Ill.

A few Republicans, including Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, have said a windfall profits tax ought to be examined, but most GOP lawmakers — and Bush — strongly oppose it.

It "failed miserably" when it was tried in the early 1980s and there is no reason to try it again, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, told reporters.

US Senate Seeks Oil Co. Tax Returns As Gasoline Rises (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jim Efstathiou Jr.

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate is seeking tax returns from Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp. and others among the 15 largest oil and gas companies in the U.S. to ensure they are paying the full amount due on record profits.

In a letter today to Internal Revenue Service Commissioner Mark Everson, Senator Charles Grassley, the Republican chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and Senator Max Baucus, the committee's ranking Democrat, said they need the information to ``better understand the federal tax posture of the industry."

The request is for federal corporate tax returns for the last five years of the 15 largest companies based on sales. President George W. Bush and Republicans in Congress face growing pressure from voters with crude oil and gasoline near all-time highs. A CNN poll released this week found 69 percent of U.S. adults say higher fuel costs are causing financial hardship.

``The whole country is trying to figure out what should be done about record high gasoline prices at a time of record oil company profits," Baucus said in a statement. Congress needs to know ``what the real financial picture is for this industry, because the financial picture for American consumers is pretty bleak."

Profit for Irving, Texas-based Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, climbed last year to $36.1 billion, a record for any U.S. company. The combined 2005 earnings of Exxon Mobil, BP Plc, Royal Dutch Shell Plc, Chevron and ConocoPhillips, topped $111 billion.

Reducing Incentives?

Bush, in a speech on energy issues yesterday in Washington, said the American people expect oil companies to plough more of their profits into investments in refineries and production projects that might eventually ease prices. He also said Congress should roll back incentives to the oil industry that will cost the U.S. about $2 billion over 10 years.

While Grassley's committee has scrapped a proposal to boost oil company taxes by $5 billion through an accounting rule change, Democratic Senator Byron Dorgan of North Dakota is proposing a 50 percent excise tax on profits from oil sold at more than $40 a barrel.

DOJ_NMG_0026715

Republican Senator Arlen Specter said Congress should consider taxing the ``windfall profits" reaped by oil companies as a result of surging crude oil prices. Specter, of Pennsylvania, earlier this month introduced legislation to strengthen antitrust enforcement of the oil and natural gas industry to counter the consolidation of production and refining operations.

Soaring Prices

The average U.S. pump price for regular gasoline rose to its highest since Oct. 3, climbing 13.1 cents to $2.914 a gallon in the week ended April 24, the U.S. Energy Department said. Crude oil, which accounts for about 60 percent of the price of gasoline, fell 95 cents, or 1.3 percent, to close at $71.90 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Prices are 33 percent higher than a year ago.

The request for information refers to record industry profits and recent press reports of ``an extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive." Lee Raymond, who retired at the end of last year as chairman of Exxon Mobil, will receive stock and benefits worth $357 million.

The package, which Raymond said was justified by his performance, includes a $98.4 million lump-sum payment of pension benefits and the year-end valuation of the stock and stock options accumulated in more than 40 years with the company.

``We're seeing record profits and significant executive compensation in the oil and gas industry," Grassley said in a statement. ``We all know there can be a slip between cup and lip on corporate profits made and taxes paid. I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man."

The 15 largest oil companies aren't identified in the request.

US Senate Seeks Tax Records Of Oil Companies (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

The leaders of a Senate committee demanded the tax records of the 15 largest US oil and gas companies on Wednesday, opening a new front in the politically charged battle over high petrol prices.

The unusual demand for sensitive financial information underscores the pressure among politicians to show they are responding to record fuel prices. A CNN poll this week found that 69 per cent of adults said high fuel prices had caused financial hardship.

Chuck Grassley, Republican chairman of the finance committee, and Max Baucus, his Democratic counterpart, asked the Internal Revenue Service to provide the tax records of the oil and gas giants for the last five years, so they could “better understand the federal tax posture of the industry”. A committee aide said the committee rarely makes such requests, but had done so occasionally, including in the case of Enron, the bankrupt energy trader.

A spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the US industry, said the review of documents was within the committee’s power, but added, “I don’t think there is anything in there that would have any bearing on gas prices. Gas prices are set by the law of supply and demand.”

The oil industry has been on the defensive in recent days. President George W. Bush has ordered the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department to investigate whether oil companies have been overcharging consumers and Republican leaders of Congress have pledged close scrutiny of the industry and its profits.

But Red Caverney, API president, said 30 previous investigations over the past 20 years had cleared the industry of any wrongdoing. Despite a jump in companies’ profits, The API said that as a percentage of sales the industry’s profits were in line with those of other sectors. At 5.9 cents in the dollar, the figure for profits compared with sales for the oil companies is only slightly higher than the average of 5.6 cents for US industry as a whole.

But in their letter, the senators said the were concerned that the record profits -- and a highly publicized $400m retirement package for Lee Raymond, former Exxon Mobil chief executive -- “may have been subsidised in part by the taxpayers”.

Gonzales: Belt-tightening Must Accompany Gas Price Probe (AP)

By PHIL DAVIS, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026716

TAMPA, Fla. - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal and state investigations aren't a substitute for consumer belt-tightening to combat soaring gas prices across the nation.

"If the gas companies are colluding together or committing fraud, we have an obligation to investigate that," Gonzales said Wednesday during a visit to Florida to kickoff an anti-gang program. "Obviously, this is not something that can be solved solely by law enforcement efforts. It requires, perhaps, a change in behavior by consumers. There are things we can do at a federal level, but also it's going to require a collective effort."

Gonzales declined to comment on what evidence, if any, his agency has of price fixing in the gasoline market.

President Bush is trying to calm Americans' outrage over soaring gas prices by ordering the Department of Justice to investigate whether the price of gasoline is being illegally manipulated. Gas prices are hovering near $3 a gallon and polls give Bush low marks in handling the crisis.

On Monday, Gonzales shifted some of the focus to local authorities with a letter asking all 50 state attorneys general to be vigilant for price gouging. State authorities have primary authority in policing gouging.

"We're all working together looking into this," Gonzales said.

The attorney general came to Tampa to announce a $2.5 million anti-gang grant for local law enforcement and education efforts.

Tampa is one of six areas selected in the $15 million national gang initiative. The other areas, each getting $2.5 million, are Los Angeles, Cleveland, Dallas-Fort Worth, Milwaukee and the "222 corridor" near Philadelphia.

Gonzales and his entourage visited the scene of a recent double homicide, a high school and a neighborhood community center in a daylong tour of Tampa. He said the grant money will be split between education, law enforcement and rehabilitation efforts.

"We're not a gang city like south Los Angeles, but gangs are starting to get a foothold here," Hillsborough County Sheriff David Gee said. "If we don't get out in front of it, we will have a problem."

ConocoPhillips Posts 13% Profit Increase (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

ConocoPhillips said yesterday that its first-quarter profit rose 13 percent on stronger results from exploration and production of oil and gas.

Net income increased to $3.29 billion, or $2.34 a share, from $2.91 billion, or $2.05 a share, in the year-earlier period. Those results were in line with analysts' expectations, according to Thomson Financial.

Revenue at ConocoPhillips grew to $47.9 billion in the first quarter from $38.9 billion last year. The company said higher oil prices were partly tempered by lower natural gas prices compared with the fourth quarter.

The company's shares fell $1.10, or 1.6 percent, to close at $67.15.

ConocoPhillips, which is based in Houston, is the first of the three largest United States oil companies to report results this week. Exxon Mobil will report today and Chevron tomorrow. The three are expected to report a total of more than $16 billion in first-quarter profit. James J. Mulva, chief executive at ConocoPhillips, said in a conference call with analysts and investors that the company would spend about $18 billion this year in capital investments, up from the $10 billion announced in December.

A detailed breakout of the spending was not disclosed. But the increase, the company said, comes in part from the recent acquisitions of the natural gas producer Burlington Resources and a German refinery. Additionally, the company will earmark $1 billion for loans to affiliates, and complete its planned 20 percent purchase of Lukoil of Russia.

"This company has more investment opportunity on its plate than resources to fund them,'' said Fadel Gheit, an analyst for Oppenheimer & Company. "Everybody else has the problem of too much cash."

Analysts asked during the call how ConocoPhillips would handle the Venezuelan government's plans to increase government control of some of that nation's most lucrative oil projects.

DOJ_NMG_0026717

Mr. Mulva said he planned to meet with Venezuela's oil minister, Rafael RamírezÖ, within in a few weeks. "That's a big concern because they do have a lot investment opportunities there," said Gene Gillespie, analyst with Howard Weil Inc., in an interview. "Unfortunately, they could be unfulfilled."

Critics Of Oil Profits Rebutted (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

The US oil industry struck back on Wednesday at criticisms over rising profits and soaring fuel costs, warning that a windfall tax on profits would lead to lower domestic production and higher imports.

With the political temperature rising over higher fuel costs, President George W. Bush has ordered a Federal Trade Commission and Justice Department inquiry into whether oil companies have been overcharging consumers.

Red Caverney, the president of the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the US industry, said that 30 previous investigations over the past 20 years had cleared the industry of any wrongdoing. Despite the jump in companies' profits, the API said that as a percentage of sales the industry's profits were in line with other sectors. At 5.9 cents in the dollar, the figure for profits compared to sales for the oil companies is only slightly higher than the average of 5.6 cents for US industry as a whole.

In addition, while the price of refined petroleum products have risen by 70 per cent since 1982, the price of pharmaceuticals has climbed by 209 per cent and the price of concrete by 100 per cent.

In January Exxon Mobil Corp reported profits of $36.13bn - the highest corporate profits in US history. The Democrats in Congress have called for the closing of tax breaks for the industry that would raise around $5bn over five years.

"Windfall taxes were tried between 1980 and 1986 and it increased out dependence on foreign oil and reduced domestic production, " Mr Caverney said. "There is nothing good that comes of it."

Oil Firms Cast As Villains (LAT)

By Elizabeth Douglass

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

Oil company earnings have never been sweeter. Stock prices are up. Shareholders are pocketing ever-bigger dividends. By nearly every measure, the petroleum industry is in its heyday.

But in the realm of public opinion, things could hardly be worse.

Motorists paying up to $3.50 a gallon for gasoline castigate oil companies and their executives with a growing list of high-octane epithets: Greedy. Un-American. The new robber barons.

On Wednesday, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) invoked the harshest image yet. "I think they have the least PR sensitivity of any group outside of satanic cults," he said.

Responding to public outrage, the Senate Finance Committee on Wednesday asked the Internal Revenue Service to hand over the tax returns of the 15 largest oil and gas companies, saying they were concerned about excessive profit and outsize executive pay.

The news got even better — or worse — for the industry Wednesday with the news that Wall Street analysts expect the three largest oil and gas companies to report combined quarterly earnings of more than $16 billion, a 24% increase from last year.

Instead of celebrating their windfall, oil companies are battling demands for a tax on "windfall" profits, President Bush's call for an investigation into allegations of price gouging and mounting consumer resentment.

Oil executives have launched their own offensive to win American hearts and minds. In full-page advertisements and media interviews, they argue that the millions of Americans who own shares in oil concerns are winners too. Exxon Mobil, the world's biggest company with $1 billion a day in sales, insisted Wednesday that it was too small to influence the global oil market.

"As big as we are, we are only 3% of the crude oil production in the world," said spokesman Mark Boudreaux.

Any public relations blitzkrieg may fail to appease angry motorists who continue to feel pain at the pump.

Ron Perkins, a Blythe, Calif., resident who drives more than 23 miles to his prison guard job, said he saw a station's price jump 10 cents to $3.49 a gallon Wednesday. "It stinks … and their profit margin is outlandish," he said. "They're kicking consumers when we're down."

Oil companies are flush because the price they get for each barrel of crude is rising much faster than the cost to extract it. In refining, profit margins are rising because the wholesale and retail prices for gasoline and diesel are far outpacing the additional costs of the resource they process.

In the end, the major oil companies can take solace in the fact that dozens of price-fixing investigations into the industry have come to naught and that public hatred does not amount to a criminal conviction.

Big Oil's top executives have appeared before congressional committees twice since the summer — once to explain the high prices that followed Hurricane Katrina and again in March to explain their record-setting 2005 earnings. Those included Exxon Mobil's $36.1-billion profit, the biggest ever at a U.S. company.

Exxon Mobil further inflamed the furor by awarding longtime Chairman and Chief Executive Lee Raymond, who retired at the end of last year, a 2005 pay package worth more than $400 million.

Today, oil futures are hovering above $72 a barrel, and retail gasoline nationwide is approaching last year's post-hurricane peak of more than $3 a gallon. On Wednesday, the average cost of self-serve regular in California set another record high of $3.15 a gallon, according to AAA.

Exxon Mobil, based in Irving, Texas, is expected to post first-quarter earnings topping $9 billion. Industry analysts expect the company's full-year income to surpass the record set in 2005.

Analysts expect San Ramon, Calif.-based Chevron Corp., the nation's second-largest oil company, to report first-quarter net income of $4.1 billion on Friday. No. 3 ConocoPhillips of Houston on Wednesday reported profit of $3.3 billion.

Michael Smith, a communications professor at La Salle University in Philadelphia, said the earnings could have "investors doing cartwheels…. For them, this is really good news," he said. "For everybody else, and for consumers especially, it's going to be another sign of greedy oil companies taking advantage of the little guys."

Boudreaux, the Exxon Mobil spokesman, acknowledged that "there are a lot of questions out there about what we do with our earnings and how we invest them."

He said the company hopes its current advertising and public relations efforts will help quell the outrage and "do a better job of helping people understand what goes behind providing the energy that they use…. This is a commodity business. It's cyclical, and there are ups and there will be downs in the cycle. We have to look through the highs and lows.

"Obviously, some consumers are upset with energy companies … because gasoline prices are high. We understand that," he said. "We have a strong image with those people who understand our business and with investors."

Exxon Mobil and its peers are banding together to defend their riches.

After last year's hurricanes, the American Petroleum Institute, the primary public voice for oil companies, launched a campaign to improve the industry's image.

Red Cavaney, the group's president, said the Institute was spending millions of dollars — he wouldn't specify — on advertising and to target opinion makers and state and federal officials to dissuade them from enacting legislation harmful to oil companies.

"We'd obviously like people to like us," Cavaney said. "But it's a matter of priority…. It doesn't help to have a good image if you can't get it done sufficiently to get enough votes to swing the policy."

Tom Brown, senior consultant with Power Decisions Group Inc. of San Francisco, which helps companies polish their brands and images, said the oil majors could be fighting a losing battle.

Their message is a "stockholder message: 'Hey, we're good guys, and all this is good for you.' "

But that, he said, is evading the issue. Nothing the industry says can erase what people see at the pump: more than $3 a gallon and climbing.

Second Thoughts In Congress On Oil Tax Breaks (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — As anxiety spread in Congress on Wednesday over soaring oil prices, lawmakers in both parties said they were ready to take a tough look at oil and gas incentives they passed as recently as eight months ago.

Citing record industry profits and huge executive pay packages, the top Republican and top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee asked the Internal Revenue Service to turn over tax returns for the nation's 15 biggest oil and gas companies.

Leading Republicans echoed President Bush's call Tuesday to trim about $2 billion in tax breaks Congress passed as part of the energy bill last August. Several prominent Democrats, not to be outdone, pushed for repealing oil and gas tax breaks worth more than $10 billion over the next five years.

"Nobody has any sympathy for oil companies on Capitol Hill right now," said Representative Jack Kingston, Republican of Georgia and vice chairman of the House Republican Conference. "You talk to someone driving to work in an F-150 pickup and paying $75 to fill up his tank, and everybody's on his side."

Both parties jockeyed for political advantage even as they were grasping for ideas. Most experts contend that the government has few options that would quickly reduce gasoline prices, and competing party agendas could block Congressional agreement on any meaningful legislation.

Lawmakers have introduced more than 30 energy bills in the last several months. But they reflect often-conflicting goals of reducing prices, increasing production and soothing consumer anger about oil industry profits.

Democrats called for a 60-day halt on collecting federal gasoline taxes, which are 18.4 cents a gallon, but they were openly split about the more radical step of imposing a windfall profits tax on major oil companies. For their part, many Republicans are torn between wanting to show their sympathy for consumers and maintaining their long standing support for the oil industry.

"Nobody's happy with gasoline prices being where they are," said Representative Joe L. Barton, Republican of Texas and chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who last year championed scores of new tax breaks for the industry.

Congressional Republican leaders are negotiating with White House officials over a bill to expand on Mr. Bush's proposals for alternative fuels and conservation, but disarray among lawmakers was evident across Capitol Hill.

The energy industry is also politically divided. Most big integrated oil companies, like Exxon Mobil and Chevron, have shown no interest in defending the $2.7 billion in tax breaks in last year's energy bill.

But the hundreds of smaller independent producers want to preserve as many incentives as possible. In singling out tax and spending incentives to be eliminated, Mr. Bush did not criticize a new expansion of tax write-offs for smaller oil refineries.

"The big companies don't want them, don't need them and are not asking for them," said J. Robinson West, chairman of PFC Energy, an oil industry consulting firm. But the smaller independents, he said, "are not going to give up easily."

The Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation estimated Tuesday that oil and gas companies would receive about $10 billion in tax breaks over the next five years that are specifically aimed at their industry.

Most of those tax breaks have been around for many years. They allow energy companies to take substantial write-offs on their investments in new equipment and hefty "depletion allowances" as companies use up the oil and gas in a particular field.

Neither Mr. Bush nor Republican leaders in Congress have suggested an attack on the industry's main tax breaks. Nor are they proposing to trim back tax incentives written primarily for industry in general that also benefit major oil companies.

One obscure tax cut, for example, included in a 2004 law to promote domestic manufacturing, is expected to save energy companies at least $3.6 billion over the next decade. ConocoPhillips, which earned $13.5 billion in 2005, saved $106 million last year on that provision, which reduces the corporate tax rate on profits on goods produced in the United States.

President Bush and Congressional leaders are focusing on about $2 billion in tax breaks in last year's energy bill. Among other things, those tax breaks let companies write off in just two years the geology studies associated with exploration. For decades, the courts and the I.R.S. have said that these are capital investments that can be written off only slowly, as oil is produced from the fields.

Mr. Bush also called for repealing several hundred million dollars in subsidies, also in the energy bill, for an industry-run deepwater drilling research center in Sugar Land, Tex. That project's biggest champion was Representative Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader whose district includes Sugar Land.

Many Democrats had opposed the new tax breaks all along, and Senate Democrats pushed for a provision that would trim them in a broader tax bill that the Senate passed last fall. But that provision was not approved by the House.

On Wednesday, leading Republicans made it clear they were now willing and even eager to eliminate some of those tax breaks.

"I am happy to repeal tax breaks for the development of oil in foreign countries," said Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico and chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. "I cannot support the concept of tax breaks for oil companies while some American families are searching their budgets for the extra cash they need to fill their gas tanks."

But Republican lawmakers want to combine their seemingly tough new stance with measures to increase production. High on the list is a new attempt to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to exploration.

Democrats are focusing more on taking things away from the industry. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts proposed legislation this week to repeal all tax breaks for oil drilling and production — about $10 billion over the next five years.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, proposed a measure to force energy companies to pay royalties to the government on all oil and gas they produce on federal leases in the Gulf of Mexico, if the price of crude oil is above $55 a barrel. Some energy companies are now allowed "royalty relief" expected to total about $7 billion over the next five years.

The mounting suspicion of oil companies was apparent in a letter to the I.R.S. from Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Finance Committee, and Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the committee's senior Democrat. They demanded that the I.R.S. let them review the past five years of tax returns filed by the nation's 15 biggest oil companies.

The senators pointedly noted an "extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive" — an allusion to Lee R. Raymond, former chairman of Exxon Mobil, who received $398 million in compensation on retiring last year.

"We're seeing record profits and significant executive compensation in the oil and gas industry," Mr. Grassley said. "I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man."

Red Caveney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the large oil companies, said his group would not fight to retain the newest tax breaks.

"We understand the frustration that consumers have expressed about energy prices," Mr. Caveney told reporters on Wednesday.

Senate Committee Looks At Increasing Renewable Fuels (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - A day after President Bush touted the increased use of renewable fuels to help offset rising gas prices, a Senate committee looked at ways to promote the use of such fuels.

"I am pleased the alarm bell has gone off and the American people are taking a hard look at the way we consume fuel in this country and around the world," said Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., at a Senate Agriculture Committee hearing Wednesday.

The committee chairman, Georgia Republican Saxby Chambliss, said that the energy bill passed by Congress last year has helped spur the renewable fuels industry by creating a national renewable fuel standard, and by extending the biodiesel tax credit.

Jay Debertin, executive vice president of CHS Inc., an Inver Grove Heights, Minn., farmers cooperative, said Congress can help continue the growth by providing tax incentives and improving infrastructure to ship the fuel, among other things.

"The renewable fuels industry is still a very young and growing industry," he said.

Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, the group Bush addressed on Tuesday, noted that demand for corn-based ethanol is on the rise. He said he was confident that the industry will be able to meet demand.

Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., touted the benefits of E85 fuel, which blends 15 percent gasoline with 85 percent ethanol. At some stations in Missouri, he said., E85 is selling for 50 cents less than regular unleaded gas.

"Renewable fuels are already moderating the price of gasoline as more ethanol and biodiesel plants come online," Talent said.

DOJ_NMG_0026721

But Sen. Mark Dayton, a Minnesota Democrat and longtime backer of E85, said he was troubled that recent prices of E85 are not even lower. Dayton, who drives a vehicle with an E85 "flex fuel" engine, said he saw E85 selling for 40 cents cheaper than unleaded gasoline during a trip to Minnesota.

Dayton said that E85 needs to be priced more competitively because a car can't go as far on a gallon of E85 as it can on gasoline.

"It's not based on the cost; frankly, it's as much profiteering, somewhere along the line, as I fear is happening with gasoline," Dayton said. "And I think it's going to be the destruction of the industry."

On Tuesday, Chrysler's chief executive announced that by 2008, the company would offer 500,000 alternative-fuel vehicles that run on E85 and clean diesel - representing one quarter of its production.

Only about 685 fueling stations across the country offer ethanol blends out of 165,000 stations nationally - less than 1 percent of stations, according to the National Ethanol Vehicle Coalition. Most pumps are concentrated in Iowa, Illinois and Minnesota.

"We have a real chicken-and-egg problem," Roberts said, arguing that people are reluctant to buy flex fuel cars if stations don't sell it, and stations won't want to offer it without enough cars that use it.

With Oil At $70 A Barrel, Firms Try Coal, Shale, Even Turkeys (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK - At more than $70 a barrel, the price of oil is causing angst for millions of Americans. But for some others it's an opportunity to move the United States beyond conventional oil:

• In Carthage, Mo., a company is turning the inedible parts of Butterball turkeys into up to 350 barrels of biodiesel per day.

• In Gilberton, Pa., businessman John Rich is planning to convert huge piles of low-quality coal into diesel. The state has promised to buy the production of 5,000 barrels per day, once it starts.

• In Utah and Colorado, four companies are preparing environmental assessments to show the feasibility of producing oil from shale.

With gas now becoming as pricey as a gallon of milk in some places, the economics of energy production is changing. Processes that didn't make any sense in the good old days of $30-a-0barrel oil are now being pulled out of filing cabinets. From the tundra of Alaska to the depths of the Gulf of Mexico, energy dreamers are trying to tap into new frontiers.

Prospects for alternative energy got a boost this week when President Bush spoke to the Renewable Energy Association. "What we are seeing is more creativity," says John McLennan, a director of technical services at ASRC Energy Services E&T, Inc. in Salt Lake City.

The potential reserves in some cases are gigantic. The Bureau of Land Management has estimated the potential US recoverable oil shale reserves at 800 billion barrels of oil, three times the proven oil reserves of Saudi Arabia. In some cases, there is already a significant production: tar sands in Canada are currently producing about 1 million barrels of oil per day and expanding rapidly.

However, don't expect to see changes overnight. "As the oil price rises, it doesn't mean that we're all going to turn a switch on and be awash in alternative fuels," says Aaron Brady, an energy analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "There is no one technology that is the silver bullet that will overturn the dominance of petroleum, but a lot of efforts will become part of the mix that increases the supply of liquid fuels for the world."

Some of the most promising large-scale efforts are the tar sands of Canada. Mr. Brady says they are in the process of "ramping up quite rapidly" and could increase their output to several million barrels of oil per day. But he also points out that there are limits to their development. "There are shortages of natural gas [needed to heat the bitumen] and it's pretty low-quality oil, so you need refineries that can chew up this stuff."

Some of the attempts to produce new liquid fuels resemble those of the 1970s and '80s. That's the case with oil shale, rock that is infused with kerogen, a bituminous material that, when heated, may produce oil.

But, unlike the earlier era, there are now more water, air, and waste restrictions. In fact, a significant amount of the shale is in highly sensitive park lands. "There are too many eco groups ready to mobilize and the deposits are in very beautiful places," says Steven Schamel, a principal at GeoX Consulting and formerly a professor of chemical engineering at the University of Utah in Salt Lake City. "And, much of it is on arid lands, which are very tough to reclaim."

Despite the potential problems, the state of Utah says it would like to press ahead. "Our governor's position is strongly supportive of economic development," says John Baza of the Utah Department of Oil, Gas and Mining. "Something must break loose or oil prices won't ease much."

Currently, much of the work being done in the oil shale is on relatively small parcels of land. Shell Oil is reportedly working on a process that heats the shale to 700 degrees F for two to three years while it's in the ground. But, like much of the shale work, it's secret. "Shell claims to be producing oil, but I don't know anyone who knows for sure," says Mr. Schamel. Shell itself says it is in a "quiet" period prior to the sale of securities and cannot comment.

Many of the efforts maintain they can now produce fuel at a cost well under the current market price. That's the case in Gilberton, Pa. where Waste Management and Processors Inc. (WMPI) says it can make diesel fuel out of waste coal for $1 a gallon less than the current price. The WMPI effort utilizes technology developed in South Africa to produce fuel during the apartheid boycott. "As we scale up, we can drive down the cost even more," says Mr. Rich, the president of the company, which received a $100 million federal grant in 2003.

Yet scores of other efforts are finding ways to convert biomass to diesel. In Carthage, Mo., Changing World Technologies, Inc. has set up a plant adjacent to a Butterball turkey processing facility. Using heat, the company breaks the organic products down similar to how the earth produces oil, but in in two hours, not hundreds of thousands of years, says Julie Gross Gelfand, a company spokesman. "The beauty is that this can be expanded to any carbon-based material so stuff that used to go a landfill can be made into oil."

Industry's Cup Runneth Over (WT/AP)

By John Seewer, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio

few months ago, only a few investors knew about Andersons Inc. and its grain-storage and rail-car businesses. Even in its hometown of Maumee, Ohio, the company is better known for stores that feature microbrews, fresh breads and garden supplies.

But the company's recent entry into the burgeoning ethanol industry has sent its stock soaring. Investors are betting that new energy regulations and high gas prices could lead to an earnings bonanza for companies such as Andersons, ADM and Pacific Ethanol that produce the fuel additive made from fermented corn that allows cars to run more cleanly.

"Right now, making ethanol is almost like having a money machine," said Spencer Kelly, an ethanol analyst for the Oil Price Information Service in Rockville, Md. "Ethanol looks strong as long as gasoline prices stay strong and corn prices are low."

Andersons, founded by Harold Anderson in 1947, turned a grain mill into an agribusiness that had $1 billion in sales by 1995 and went public a year later. The company's move into ethanol production is a natural step given its network of grain elevators and its large rail fleet, which account for most of its profits.

Chairman Richard Anderson and former Chairman Thomas Anderson, two of the founder's sons, remain among the company's biggest shareholders. Richard Anderson's shares were worth $6.5 million two years ago and now are worth $28.5 million.

The surge of interest in ethanol was fueled in July when Congress passed an energy bill requiring the United States to use 7.5 billion gallons of renewable fuels by 2012. Ethanol producers now have the capacity to generate about 4.3 billion gallons.

U.S. refiners are clamoring for more ethanol also because of the phaseout of a natural-gas derivative called methyl tertiary-butyl ether, or MTBE, that allows gasoline to burn more cleanly but also has some health risks. Refiners are stopping use of MTBE because Congress refused to grant them protection from lawsuits.

Private investments in ethanol plants also have soared in the past year. Farmer-owned co-ops built most of the plants during the 1990s, but now only six of the 42 new or expanded ethanol plants under construction nationwide are farmer-owned, the Renewable Fuels Association trade group reports.

Those new plants will be able to produce 2 billion gallons each year.

Individual investors, though, can put money into only a few public companies making ethanol.

Shares of Decatur, Ill.-based Archer Daniels Midland Co., the nation's biggest ethanol maker, have been trading at 52-week highs in recent weeks. They gained another 26 cents yesterday to close at $36.93 on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of Pacific Ethanol, which plans to open its first plants this year, nearly doubled in January, the same month that President Bush touted ethanol in his State of the Union speech. Its shares fell 30 cents yesterday to close at $33.00 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Pacific Ethanol, based in Fresno, Calif., should be making a profit by next year, said Paul Resnik, an analyst with Dutton Associates, an equity research firm based in El Dorado Hills, Calif.

"Their first plant is still in the future, but the long-term strategy is sound," he said.

Andersons stock has been rising since 2001, when it traded below $8 a share. But the stock really took off in November, when it was trading at about $40 a share, after posting strong earnings from its rail-car operations and announcing plans for a second ethanol plant. Its shares gained an additional $7.33 yesterday to close at $115.03 on the Nasdaq.

Mr. Resnik also warned that alternative-energy company stocks are likely to be volatile.

"These stocks have moved a long way in a short time," he said.

The cost of ethanol's main ingredient, corn, can move up and down based on the weather's effect on the crop. A sharp increase in corn prices would translate to higher production costs for ethanol makers.

Analysts say a drop in oil prices also could cut into the profits of ethanol makers because ethanol's cost is tied directly to gas prices at the pump. A rush in demand for fuel-efficient cars or a decision to drop government incentives for ethanol also could spell trouble.

"There's too many factors out of their control," said Mark Hughes, an analyst with Lafayette Investments in Ashton, Md.

His firm sold its stake in Andersons at the end last month when shares jumped to $78. He noted that the company has yet to give any profit projections on its two ethanol plants under construction.

"I would take a pause and see how it goes," Mr. Hughes said. "I think the big move has been made already."

Andersons is investing about $250 million in two ethanol plants in Michigan and Indiana, which will be supplied with corn it already gets from farmers. The plant in Michigan should open in August.

Andersons said April 6 it planned to build a third ethanol plant next to one of its grain elevators in Dunkirk, Ind.

Heather Jones, an analyst with BB&T Capital Markets, predicted that Andersons will maintain "very nice margins for a sustained period." She lists it as a "buy" with a $96 price target.

"It looks like they will be profitable into the next year or year and a half," she said. "The economics of ethanol are incredibly compelling at this time."

Going A Short Way To Make A Point (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Ladies and gentlemen, start your engines.

Gas prices have gone above $3 a gallon again, and that means it's time for another round of congressional finger-pointing.

"Since George Bush and Dick Cheney took over as president and vice president, gas prices have doubled!" charged Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), standing at an Exxon station on Capitol Hill where regular unleaded hit $3.10. "They are too cozy with the oil industry."

She then hopped in a waiting Chrysler LHS (18 mpg) -- even though her Senate office was only a block away.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) used a Hyundai Elantra to take the one-block journey to and from the gas-station news conference. He posed in front of the fuel prices and gave them a thumbs-down. "Get tough on big oil!" he demanded of the Bush administration.

By comparison, Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) was a model of conservation. She told a staffer idling in a Jetta to leave without her, then ducked into a sushi restaurant for lunch before making the journey back to work.

At about the same time, House Republicans were meeting in the Capitol for their weekly caucus (Topic A: gas). The House driveway was jammed with cars, many idling, including eight Chevrolet Suburbans (14 mpg).

America may be addicted to oil, as President Bush puts it. But America is in the denial phase of this addiction -- as evidenced by the behavior of its lawmakers. They have proposed all kinds of solutions to high gas prices: taxes on oil companies, domestic oil drilling and releasing petroleum reserves. But they ignore the obvious: that Americans drive too much in too-big cars.

Senators were debating a war spending bill yesterday, but the subject invariably turned to gas prices. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) engaged his deputy, Dick Durbin (Ill.), in a riveting colloquy. "Is the senator aware that the L.A. Times headline reads today, 'Bush's Proposals Viewed as a Drop in the Bucket'?"

"I'm aware of that," Durbin replied.

Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) responded with an economics lesson. "Oil is worth what people pay for it," he argued.

Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) sounded the alarms. "We are one accident or one terrorist attack away from oil at $100 a barrel!"

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) made a plea for conservation. "We have to move quickly to increase our fuel efficiency," she urged.

But not too quickly. After lunchtime votes, senators emerged from the Capitol for the drive across the street to their offices.

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) hopped in a GMC Yukon (14 mpg). Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) climbed aboard a Nissan Pathfinder (15). Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) stepped into an eight-cylinder Ford Explorer (14). Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) disappeared into a Lincoln Town Car (17). Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) met up with an idling Chrysler minivan (18).

Next came Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.), greeted by a Ford Explorer XLT. On the Senate floor Tuesday, Menendez had complained that Bush "remains opposed to higher fuel-efficiency standards."

Also waiting: three Suburbans, a Nissan Armada V8, two Cadillacs and a Lexus. The greenest senator was Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), who was picked up by his hybrid Toyota Prius (60 mpg), at quadruple the fuel efficiency of his Indiana counterpart Evan Bayh (D), who was met by a Dodge Durango V8 (14).

As a political matter, Democrats clearly sense that they have the advantage on the high gas prices, judging from the number of speeches and news conferences. "The cost of Republican corruption when it comes to energy is hitting home very clearly for America's middle class," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) exulted yesterday morning.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) introduced an amendment to repeal oil-company tax breaks and distribute $500 tax rebates to consumers. It was quickly ruled out of order.

But Republicans were clearly feeling defensive. "We passed an energy bill last year, last July," House Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) pleaded at a morning news conference. "It changes CAFE [corporate average fuel economy] standards. It changes some of the things that we can do -- I'm sorry, changes not the CAFE standards, but changes some of the supply issues, boutique fuels, all these things."

Only Sen. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), who can speak freely because he is retiring, was willing to note the disconnect between rhetoric and action. "People say, understandably, 'Solve our energy problems right now, but don't make us do anything differently,' " he said on the Senate floor.

If the politics of gasoline favor Democrats at the moment, the insincerity is universal. A surreptitious look at the cars in the senators-only spots inside and outside the Senate office buildings found an Escort and a Sentra (super-rich Wisconsin Democrat Herb Kohl's spot had a Chevy Lumina), but far more Jaguars, Cadillacs and Lexuses and a fleet of SUVs made by Ford, Honda, BMW and Lexus.

A sampling of senators' and staff cars parked along Delaware Avenue NE found that those displaying Democratic campaign bumper stickers had a somewhat higher average fuel economy (23 mpg) than those displaying GOP stickers (18 mpg). A fuel-efficiency rating could not be found for the 1970s-era Volkswagen "Thing" owned by Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.).

Maybe, lawmakers are starting to learn. When GOP senators had a lunch Tuesday a couple of blocks from the Capitol, many took cars. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) emerged from the lunch looking for his ride when he spied The Washington Post's Shailagh Murray. Reconsidering, he set out on foot. "I need the exercise," he reasoned.

How Much Oil Is Really Down There? (WSJ)

By Daniel Yergin

The disclosure of "proved reserves" has been one of the great rituals of the reporting season for oil and gas companies, and one carefully monitored by investors. It's recently taken on even more significance with high and jittery prices, concerns about energy security and plain fear of running out. In a world of uncertainty, these disclosures seem to provide direct, quantitative information on the future oil "inventory" -- at least for companies reporting to the SEC -- and a basis on which investors can evaluate companies.

The reality is different. The current system mandated by the SEC for reporting "proved reserves" has become antique, and the information it provides to investors increasingly diverges from the actual resource position of many companies. Nor does it serve the original intent of disclosure -- energy security. The issue should not be confused with recent cases and settlements involving the practices of certain companies. The significant problem is generic and it is with the rules themselves, which need to be modernized if they are to regain their relevance. The current system is roughly analogous to a doctor restricted to making a diagnosis only on the basis of invasive surgery rather than with a CAT scan. * * *

Surprising as it might be, the current rules for reporting reserves -- what might be called the "1978 System" -- essentially insist on 1970s technology and methodologies. Back then there was no digital revolution, and the frontier for offshore development was 600 feet of water; today it is 12,000 feet. The rules do not recognize the vast technical progress over the last 30 years, and as a result, standard techniques used today by companies to set multibillion investment programs are not approved, or only partly approved, for use in describing proved reserves for disclosure purposes to investors.

In addition, the rules simply have not kept up with the globalization of the industry. They were devised for onshore operations in "Texlahoma," the "oil patch" of Texas, Louisiana and Oklahoma that was the center of industry activity in the '50s and '60s. Today more than 80% of the total of companies' proved reserves are outside the U.S.; and differences among the fiscal regimes in several countries make it harder, not easier, to compare domestic and international reserves. As perverse as it may sound, under the "production sharing agreements" that are common in many oil-producing countries, when the price goes up, proved reserves go down.

Major projects today dwarf those in the past, both in size and complexity. "Non-traditional projects" are drawing an increasing share of capital, but they are not adequately accommodated under the "1978 System." This includes a significant part of Canadian oil sands, gas-to-liquids and projects in what's called the "ultra-deep water." And yet these "non-traditional liquids" will account for as much as 45% of oil production capacity in North America by 2010. Nor does the current system fully account for the larger, commodity-driven liquefied natural gas business that will be critical to future U.S. natural gas supplies.

The current rules were laid out in response to the 1973 oil embargo that shook not only world politics and global economy, but also American confidence. How much oil was left in the U.S.? This was an urgent matter of energy security, and Congress told the SEC to implement a system for reporting on the resource base. The SEC in turn viewed its mandate through the lens of investor protection.

Though the word "audit" is customarily used for these evaluations, oil and gas reserves cannot be "audited" in the conventional sense of a warehouse inventory or a company's cash balances. Rather, "proved reserves" are an approximation about formations thousands and even tens of thousands of feet below ground. Their size, shape, content and production potential are estimated in a complex combination of direct evidence and expert interpretation from a variety of scientific disciplines and methodologies. Added to the science is economics; if it costs more to produce oil from a reservoir than one can sell it for profitably, then one cannot "book it" as a reserve. Reserves are "proved" if there is a 90% chance that ultimate recovery will exceed that level.

In the face of such complexity, the SEC adopted technical definitions developed by an independent group, the Society of Petroleum Engineers (SPE), the key technical and professional group whose members are experts from both the academy and industry. Specifically, in setting its own standards, the SEC relied on SPE definitions promulgated in 1965 and consultations in the 1970s. This became the basis of the "1978 System." And that is the system still in place today, despite the fact that the SPE has revised the definitions three times since in response to major advances in measuring reservoirs, and is in the process of doing so once again. For the most part, however, the SEC continues to rely on the technology and "best practices" of the '60s and '70s.

The rules describe proved reserves in terms of "reasonable certainty" -- but ties this to direct physical measurement for estimating the volume of oil or gas in a specific reservoir. That works for onshore or shallow-water wells, but is not effective for large offshore projects, where the reservoirs may lie below 7,000 feet of water and another 20,000 feet beneath the seabed, and where gathering the SEC-mandated direct physical data is immensely expensive, and also poses physical risks. Yet in the meantime, the industry has expanded the standard for "reasonable certainty" to include noninvasive means of measure and estimation. Think CAT scan. And very large amounts of money are invested on the basis of these methods.

The result is a disconnect between the mandated reserves disclosure and the reality of companies' plans, strategies and activities -- and how they are spending many billions of dollars. Owing to the current rules, much of what they are working on, though particularly relevant to their futures, cannot be counted. That divergence hardly helps investors understand the position of a company and its future prospects.

An example: One company judged that it had 658 million barrels of oil classified as proved, or reportable, under current SPE guidelines using a widely accepted technique called the "pressure gradient" method. Under SEC guidelines, based on the older technological approach, it could only disclose 261 million barrels of proved reserve. At $50 a barrel, this represents a $20 billion difference in future reserves. On the pure science, it is generally agreed that over the 20- or 30-year life of the field, it will bring to market a volume much closer to 650 million barrels.

The current system also insists on using year-end prices to calculate whether oil and gas reserves count as "economic" and thus as proved, rather than some kind of average. But this is no sure guide either to what happened during the year, or what will happen in the coming year -- or even what happened on that particular day. The price for Canadian heavy oil dipped at the very end of 2004, owing to particular short-term pricing conditions, and so a substantial amount of heavy Canadian oils lost their standing as proved because they were temporarily no longer profitable and thus two billion barrels had to be "debooked." Yet the price quickly bounced back, and those reserves once again counted as "proved."

Current estimates are that the oil and gas industry will spend some $6 trillion over the next 25 years to meet the future demand for oil and gas. The accuracy and reliability of reserves data are at the heart of the industry's capabilities and its funding of these projects. The real beneficiaries from reforming the system for disclosing proved reserves will be investors, of course -- and the consumers who are counting on the availability of future supplies. And as recent events remind us, it will also be important for energy security.

MediaNews Buys 4 McClatchy Papers (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- MediaNews Group Inc., publisher of the Denver Post and other newspapers, is buying four newspapers from McClatchy Co. for $1 billion in cash with backing from Hearst Corp.

The four papers -- the San Jose Mercury News, the Contra Costa (Calif.) Times, the Monterey (Calif.) County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press -- currently are owned by Knight Ridder Inc., which McClatchy is buying.

The deal announced late yesterday would strengthen MediaNews's presence in Northern California, where it already owns several papers in the San Francisco Bay area.

The four papers are among the 12 Knight Ridder properties that McClatchy has said it intends to sell since they do not meet McClatchy's acquisition criteria, which include being located in rapidly growing markets.

DOJ_NMG_0026727

MediaNews' interest in the newspapers had been widely known. The three Northern California papers would complement the company's existing holdings, which include the Oakland Tribune and the Marin Independent Journal. MediaNews owns a number of newspapers in geographic clusters, which helps reduce production and other costs and allows for group advertising sales.

"These were the newspapers that excited us the most about Knight Ridder," MediaNews Chief Executive Officer William Dean Singleton said, calling the deal "a wonderful opportunity at a fair price."

McClatchy would have faced antitrust difficulties owning the St. Paul, Minn., paper since it already owns the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis.

McClatchy said yesterday that the Justice Department told the company that it would seek additional information regarding the Minneapolis-St. Paul area, indicating that regulators did not see other antitrust concerns with the Knight Ridder takeover.

The agreement calls for MediaNews to acquire the San Jose Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times, which then would be folded into the California Newspaper Partnership, an entity in which it has a 54 percent stake.

The other two stakeholders in the partnership, industry leader Gannett Co. and the privately held Stephens Media Group, have agreed to contribute their share of paying for the two papers, according to a joint statement from McClatchy and MediaNews.

Separately, Hearst, publisher of the San Francisco Chronicle, will buy the Monterey County Herald in California and the St. Paul Pioneer Press and then transfer them to MediaNews in exchange for a stake in all newspapers that MediaNews owns outside the Bay Area.

Once the deal closes, MediaNews would become the fourth-largest newspaper company in the country in terms of circulation, with about 2.7 million daily circulation and 53 daily newspapers.

Justice Asks McClatchy About Twin Cities (STREET)

By Sandy Brown, TheStreet.com Staff Reporter

TheStreet, April 27, 2006

McClatchy got a Justice Department request for additional information on its planned acquisition of Knight-Ridder (KRI:NYSE - commentary - research - Cramer's Take).

The Sacramento-based newspaper company says the government wants information about papers in Minnesota.

McClatchy is owner of the Star Tribune in Minneapolis, and with the Knight-Ridder deal it gains control of the Pioneer Press in nearby St. Paul.

"The scope of the DOJ's request is limited to information concerning the Minneapolis -- St. Paul, Minnesota area. McClatchy has previously announced its intention to divest the St. Paul Pioneer Press newspaper, currently owned by Knight-Ridder Inc., to a third party," a company statement read.

It added that a second request extends the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Act.

Knight-Ridder, the publisher of the Philadelphia Inquirerand Miami Herald, agreed to sell itself to smaller rival McClatchy for $4.5 billion in cash and stock last month. McClatchy said it would try to sell 12 of the 32 papers involved in the deal.

"This represents a step forward in our effort to close our deal with Knight Ridder in a timely manner," said McClatchy lawyer Karole Morgan-Prager. "We are delighted that the Department of Justice review confirms our belief that there would be no antitrust concerns other than in the twin cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, where we intend to sell the Pioneer Press to remove any concern."

McClatchy shares traded down 7 cents to $44.71 on Wednesday.

MediaNews Acquiring Pioneer Press, Three Other Newspapers (STPPP)

By John Welbes

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, April 27, 2006

MediaNews Group Inc. is buying the St. Paul Pioneer Press in a complex transaction that involves the Hearst Corp., three other papers and a $1 billion price tag.

DOJ_NMG_0026728

The proposed deal, announced Wednesday by MediaNews and the McClatchy Co., the owner of the Minneapolis-based Star Tribune, would end more than five months of speculation about who eventually would own the Pioneer Press.

"I think this is a good outcome to a lousy situation," Par Ridder, the publisher of the Pioneer Press, told more than 150 employees who gathered for a late-afternoon meeting Wednesday.

The four newspapers, which also include the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, are owned by Knight Ridder. They are among the 12 "orphaned" Knight Ridder papers that McClatchy will resell after it closes its $6.5 billion deal for the Pioneer Press' parent company, likely by midsummer.

Regulators are taking a close look at how the shuffling of ownership will affect competition in the Twin Cities and in the California markets where MediaNews will gain considerable strength.

Employees, meanwhile, say they'd like more answers about their future.

William Dean Singleton, the CEO of MediaNews Group, said in an interview Wednesday that he plans to compete vigorously with the Star Tribune and will not seek any type of cooperative agreements with the Minneapolis paper. (MediaNews owns papers in Detroit and Denver that are part of joint operating agreements with rivals.)

He also said he plans to retain Ridder as publisher.

Singleton added that he likes the east metro market that the Pioneer Press serves and its long-term prospects.

The structure of the transaction doesn't require Singleton to honor existing labor contracts. Almost 90 percent of the newspaper's 960 workers are union members, and they received no answers at Wednesday's hastily called meeting.

"The part that makes me nervous is that nobody came right out and said that local contracts would be honored," said Bill Weyandt, who works in information technology at the newspaper.

Asked about the contracts, Singleton said "we will sit down with the local management team and let local management determine what their labor strategy should be," referring to Ridder's management team. "All of our labor strategies are done at the local level."

Ridder said he hasn't discussed labor strategy with Singleton and declined to comment.

Singleton said the Pioneer Press' "cost structure is high for a newspaper its size, but we knew that when we made the acquisitions."

As he looks at the newspaper's operations, he said, "there will be areas that need more investment, and we'll move resources around or add resources. I've read all these stories about the (Pioneer Press') profit margins being lower than everybody else's, but we knew that when we made the decision to buy."

Singleton also said he expects to continue the four newspapers' relationship with CareerBuilder, a national, online job search service.

Singleton will be in St. Paul today and plans to meet with the newspaper's employees.

Thom Fladung, editor of the Pioneer Press, said he wants to know more about Singleton's plan for the paper.

"I hope it will be what we're doing now," which is aggressive, local news coverage, Fladung said. "Because I think it works."

He said the paper needs to fill six to eight jobs in the newsroom, which would get the newsroom close to a total of 220 workers, a level he believes allows the paper to do its job.

Antitrust concerns remain with the Pioneer Press sale, as the McClatchy Co. is essentially picking who will run the rival for its largest paper, the Star Tribune.

On Wednesday, McClatchy said the U.S. Justice Department, which reviews sales with potential antitrust issues, requested information about the Twin Cities newspaper market. The request gives the Justice Department more time to review the proposed transaction, though the deal could still close by midsummer.

A task force set up by the St. Paul Area Chamber of Commerce to monitor the Pioneer Press' sale has been contacted by Justice Department officials, said Larry Dowell, president of the chamber. Advertisers in the area also have been contacted as part of the inquiry.

A California private equity group, the Yucaipa Cos., had bid for all 12 of the Knight Ridder papers up for resale. In addition, a group of local business people had hoped to make a bid for the Pioneer Press.

DOJ_NMG_0026729

The announcement Wednesday "just smacks so much of cartel-like behavior," said Linda Foley, president the Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America, which was partnering with Yucaipa in its "worker-friendly" bid for the 12 newspapers.

"It's pretty clear that this was something that was done in a back room somewhere, that it wasn't an open process," she said. "This goes contrary to what (McClatchy CEO) Gary Pruitt was saying a month ago," when he said it would be in his company's best interest to consider all bids for the 12 papers.

John Wodele, the spokesman for the local group that was never able to submit a bid for the Pioneer Press, said he hopes the new owner will respect the paper's long tradition in the community after the deal is done.

"I don't know if they'll get rich doing it," Wodele said, "but if they get rich doing it, I hope they'll have a product we can all be proud of."

In a release Wednesday, Pruitt said the "transaction highlights our ability to deliver quickly on our divestiture plan, and we are delighted with the sales price."

The sale of the Pioneer Press is also getting attention from Minnesota Attorney General Mike Hatch, who said he plans to ask McClatchy for more information about its terms for the deal with MediaNews.

"The concern is whether these are real agreements or just a lot of paper being exchanged to put a paper out of business," Hatch said.

The future of the Pioneer Press has drawn the attention of local leaders, who urged McClatchy to seek a buyer who would continue to offer a strong competitor in a two-newspaper market.

"My concern is that St. Paul continue to have a newspaper, and a strong one that's dedicated to real journalism," St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman said. "The history there (at MediaNews) is a mixed bag, but I think it's possible, and I'm hopeful."

The four papers are being sold for 11.5 times 2005 earnings before other expenses, a multiple that's in the range of other big newspaper deals of recent years, though higher than what some analysts had anticipated.

McClatchy is paying 10.2 times earnings for the entire Knight Ridder chain.

The price that MediaNews is paying for the Pioneer Press and the California papers "does say that he believes, and I believe, that St. Paul and the Bay Area papers have a bright future," Ridder said.

John Morton, head of Morton Research, a media consultancy in Silver Springs, Md., said he was "a little bit" surprised that the Pioneer Press was included in the four-paper package.

"You can't really see the strategy there except that he has shown, in the past, a weakness, you might say, for owning big-city newspapers," Morton said. "I suspect he thinks it's a feather in his cap to have St. Paul. The strategy there is not so clear-cut."

The deal is structured so that Hearst will acquire the Pioneer Press and the Monterey paper, and then "contribute" the papers back to MediaNews as part of an equity investment in other MediaNews papers outside the San Francisco area.

Hearst, which owns the San Francisco Chronicle, is acting as a source of equity for the purchase of the four newspapers, Singleton said. MediaNews, which is privately held, will issue private stock to Hearst as part of the deal. The Pioneer Press' pass through Hearst in the sale process will have no significance for the paper, he said.

Singleton, whose holdings include the Detroit News and Denver Post, has a mixed record with the newspapers he has acquired. In years past, he has shut down newspapers in Texas, including the Houston Post, and taken the Long Beach (Calif.) Press-Telegram through deep cost cutting after acquiring that paper in the late 1990s. In his more recent big-city acquisitions in Denver and Detroit, he has honored union contracts and kept the operations largely intact.

After hearing word of Wednesday's deal, Martin Demgen, acting executive officer for the Minnesota Newspaper Guild, which represents some 470 Pioneer Press workers, said the union is concerned.

"We can't be sure what it means because the sale isn't final," he said.

Complex Deal Ends Uncertainty (MINNST)

By David Phelps and Terry Fiedler, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, April 27, 2006

The $1 billion acquisition of the Pioneer Press also includes three California newspapers and puts the St. Paul paper under control of MediaNews. It's set to close this summer.

The complex $1 billion transaction that will put the St. Paul Pioneer Press in the hands of Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc. includes three California newspapers and turns prospective MediaNews rival Hearst into a partner in the deal.

The three-way transaction is expected to close this summer after the McClatchy Co., parent of the Star Tribune, completes its acquisition of the Pioneer Press' current owner, Knight Ridder Inc., for about $6.5 billion.

McClatchy said net proceeds of about $700 million from the MediaNews transaction will be used to help pay down its debt from the Knight Ridder acquisition.

As part of Wednesday's deal, Hearst Corp. agreed to temporarily purchase the Pioneer Press as well as the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and then contribute both papers to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews' non-San Francisco Bay-area assets.

MediaNews also agreed to buy two California newspapers, the San Jose Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times, from McClatchy in the deal.

The announcement capped a whirlwind spring for the St. Paul newspaper, the state's oldest.

It was put on the market along with 11 other Knight Ridder papers right after McClatchy bought the chain last month. Helping drive the sale of the Pioneer Press were antitrust concerns that regulators wouldn't be comfortable with two major papers under the ownership of one company in the Twin Cities market.

Employee rallies and a failed effort by the Newspaper Guild to broker a bid by California buyout firm Yucaipa Companies underscored the anxiety of workers about who their next owner would be. But in recent days, it appeared that MediaNews was the leading candidate to buy the paper.

MediaNews Chief Executive Dean Singleton said the acquisition "will expand our reach in California as well as enter a new and growing market in St. Paul."

MediaNews has 40 newspapers in nine states, radio stations in Texas and a TV station in Alaska. After the transaction closes, it will be the nation's fourth-largest newspaper company in daily circulation, at about 2.7 million.

McClatchy Chief Executive Gary Pruitt said that his Sacramento-based company was "delighted" with the purchase price and that the $1 billion sticker "demonstrates that these are strong newspapers with great value to companies whose strategies fit them."

Reaction in Minnesota

A St. Paul-based investor group, which also wanted to take a run at owning the Pioneer Press, expressed hope that MediaNews would be committed to quality journalism and not just the bottom line.

"Our hope was to make a little money at it, but our hope was also to do good journalism," said John Wodele, a member of the group, whose 10 investors were never publicly identified. "We hope the new owners understand the tradition of the Pioneer Press in Minnesota, the Twin Cities and western Wisconsin, and build on a long time of sometimes extraordinary journalism."

Minnesota Attorney General Mike Hatch said his office will be requesting details of the transaction from McClatchy, Hearst and MediaNews so that his staff can scrutinize the deal to make sure "it results in a viable competitor." He said: "My concern is this: I want to make sure in the end that whoever acquires the Pioneer Press is a true competitor that's viable and not acquiring it solely for the purpose of stripping it down."

Hearst role a surprise

The structure of the transaction, with the involvement of Hearst, was a surprise to most who had followed the deal's developments.

Hearst basically provides MediaNews with cash in exchange for equity by buying the Pioneer Press and the Monterey paper, and then turning the keys over to MediaNews. "Hearst is acting as a guarantor for MediaNews," Hearst spokesman Paul Luthringer said.

In the event that the Hearst equity transaction is not completed, MediaNews has agreed to buy the Pioneer Press and Monterey paper from Hearst.

David Cole, publisher of the industry newsletter News Inc., said the structure of the deal ensures MediaNews that Hearst will not raise objections on antitrust grounds because of MediaNews' concentration of properties in Northern California.

"As I've always said, Dean doesn't have competitors, just partners he hasn't done business with," Cole said.

MediaNews intends to contribute the San Jose Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times to the California Newspapers Partnership, owned 54.23 percent by MediaNews. Gannett Co. and Stephens Media, the remaining partners, have committed to contribute their share of the purchase price.

The purchase price represents a multiple of approximately 11.5 times 2005 earnings before interest, taxes and other charges, McClatchy reported.

Pruitt said the transaction "highlights our ability to deliver quickly on our divestiture plan, and we are delighted with the sales price." He said the 11.5 multiple is two "full turns" higher than the 9.5 multiple paid for all of Knight Ridder.

But Wall Street has been a little wary of the Knight Ridder deal, based on the size of debt that McClatchy will incur. Shares of McClatchy closed Wednesday at $44.71, two days after hitting a six-month low of $44.11. News of the MediaNews deal came after the markets closed.

McClatchy agreed in March to acquire Knight Ridder, which has 32 daily papers. McClatchy said it would keep the 20 Knight Ridder dailies in the fastest-growing markets and sell the other 12. The Pioneer Press sale also is taking place to address antitrust issues.

The California papers fit with MediaNews' strategy of clustering newspapers and sharing advertising and production resources. MediaNews already owns nine papers in the Bay Area.

The company's interest in the Pioneer Press doesn't fit that profile -- MediaNews owns no papers in the Upper Midwest. But the Pioneer Press is profitable: Analysts estimate that it had a 10 percent operating profit margin last year, or about $12 million profit on revenue of about $120 million. By comparison, the Star Tribune had operating earnings of about $90 million.

McClatchy hopes to raise more than $2.15 billion through the sale of the Knight Ridder papers that it will divest. McClatchy agreed to assume $2 billion in debt and pay about $4.5 billion in stock and cash for Knight Ridder.

McClatchy expects to close the Knight Ridder deal in July.

Times Sold To MediaNews (CCT)

By George Avalos And James Temple

The Contra Costa Times, April 27, 2006

The McClatchy Co. announced an agreement to sell the Times and three other newspapers for $1 billion to two parties.

Denver-based MediaNews, publisher of the Oakland Tribune and other East Bay papers, will purchase the Times and San Jose Mercury News.

In a visit to the Times newsroom in Walnut Creek, MediaNews CEO William Dean Singleton said that both of the papers will continue to operate independently. He did not anticipate layoffs as a result of the deal.

Singleton, a media mogul who has earned a reputation for slashing costs and jobs at some newspapers he acquires and increasing salaries and staffing at others, said the deal will provide MediaNews with a big piece of Bay Area market. Indeed, the combined circulation of the company's regional papers will exceed 700,000, compared to the San Francisco Chronicle's 419,000.

"We still have a competitor across the Bay that is very fierce in the Chronicle," Singleton said. "They're the big bad metro and we're the little guys chipping at their heels. I just hope we can chip a little harder now."

New York City-based Hearst Corp., owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, will buy the Monterey Herald and St. Paul Pioneer Press in St. Paul, Minn, as part of the transaction.

Hearst has agreed to "contribute" the St. Paul Pioneer Press and Monterey Herald to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews assets outside of the Bay Area. If the transacton isn't completed, for regulatory issues or otherwise, MediaNews has agreed to acquire the two newspapers from Hearst.

In either case, Singleton said MediaNews will continue to compete vigorously with the San Francisco Chronicle locally: "In the Bay Area, they are the enemy."

The four newspapers are owned by Knight-Ridder Inc., which McClatchy agreed to acquire in March. The parties expect to close the transaction soon after the close of McClatchy's purchase, which is expected this summer.

The sale of the Times became increasingly certain starting last October when several big shareholders rebelled at the lackluster stock performance of its parent, San Jose-based Knight Ridder, and eventually forced Knight Ridder to put itself on the block.

Sacramento-based McClatchy announced it had won the sparsely contested auction on March 12, in a stock and cash deal then worth $4.5 billion. The news was greeted with optimism by Times reporters and employees, given McClatchy's reputation for quality journalism and financial stability.

But the following day, the company announced plans to discard a dozen papers, including the Times and Mercury News, that did not fit McClatchy's strategy. McClatchy has been seeking buyers for the papers since the first deal was announced.

With the deal, which would include the Contra Costa Times, Valley Times, San Ramon Valley Times, East County Times, West County Times, and other East Bay publications, Denver-based MediaNews would be able to encircle the San Francisco Chronicle.

MediaNews would have more than 700,000 paid subscribers to about 419,000 for the Chronicle, enabling MediaNews to assault the Chronicle with an array of editorial, advertising, circulation and marketing resources.

Separately on Wednesday, McClatchy Corp. said that the U.S. Department of Justice is seeking additional information regarding its pending purchase of Knight-Ridder.The DOJ's request is limited to the St. Paul Pioneer-Press, but McClatchy said it extends the waiting period under antitrust law, giving the government additional time to review the transaction -- and potentially holding up any deal.

The DOJ inquiry follows an announcement last week by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer that his office is launching an antitrust review of the Knight Ridder sale to McClatchy Co.

McClatchy said it intends to respond promptly to the DOJ request.

"This represents a step forward in our effort to close our deal with Knight Ridder in a timely manner," said Karole Morgan-Prager, vice president and general counsel of McClatchy, in a prepared statement. "We are delighted that the Department of Justice review confirms our belief that there would be no antitrust concerns other than in the twin cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, where we intend to sell the Pioneer Press to remove any concern."

Soon after the divestiture was announced, Knight Ridder Chairman and CEO Tony Ridder expressed shock that McClatchy planned to jettison the papers. Gary Pruitt, the chairman and chief executive of the McClatchy Co., defended the decision, saying the papers did not fit into the company's strategy to focus on high-growth communities.

Reports quickly pegged MediaNews as a serious contender for the California publications, given its existing Bay Area presence and known strategy of clustering in geographic regions.

Other interested parties included Los Angeles-based investment firm Yucaipa Cos., which made a bid for all 12 papers in partnership with the Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America. Knight Ridder Chairman and Chief Executive Tony Ridder also reportedly began raising funds to buy the California papers, but dropped the effort at the urging of his lawyers and bankers.

Wall Street hasn't reacted kindly to McClatchy's deal. Late last month, Moody's Investors Service lowered McClatchy's credit rating the lowest investment-grade rating and threatened to drop it into junk-bond status. Since the deal was announced, McClatchy's stock has fallen 18.5 percent, which has sliced several hundred million off the value of the deal.

MediaNews had also expressed interest in the initial Knight-Ridder deal. It teamed up with several private equity firms and Singleton himself toured several papers including the Times. Several private equity bidders also failed to follow through on offers.

The only other actual bid came from a private equity group comprised of Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners, Hellman & Friedman, though its offer was reportedly lower.

Newspaper Guild Petitions To Revoke JOA In York, Pa. (E&P)

Editor & Publisher, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026733

NEW YORK The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America filed a petition with the U.S. Attorney General's office claiming that MediaNews Group violated the Newspaper Preservation Act with two York, Pa., daily papers.

The Guild, along with York/Adams County Central Labor Council and City Council President Cameron Texter, charge that MediaNews Group has "hidden the fact that it now is sole owner and publisher of both papers."

In 1989 the Justice Department approved a JOA between MediaNews, publisher of the York Dispatch, and Buckner News Alliance, publisher of the York Daily Record.

The union groups and city council president claim that "the two publishers engaged in deception in 2004 by reporting that they had swapped ownership of the two papers" when in fact MediaNews bought the Daily Record from Buckner while retaining the Dispatch.

The parties charge that MediaNews "failed to file an application for approval of material changes to the agreement or provide public notice."

Linda Foley, Newspaper Guild president, said in a statement: "The whole intent of joint operating agreements is to preserve vigorous news reporting and diversity of editorial opinions through maintaining newspaper competition -- not to provide a loophole for monopoly publishing."

Microsoft, EU Debate Access For Rivals (AP)

By Aoife White and Matt Moore, AP Business Writers

AP, April 27, 2006

Microsoft Complains That European Commission Forced It to Hand Over Trade Secrets to Rivals

LUXEMBOURG (AP) -- Microsoft Corp. complained Wednesday that the European Commission forced it to hand over trade secrets to rivals, effectively giving them a "free ride" on the work the software maker did to acquire new customers and develop new technologies.

But Anthony Whelan, the Commission's lawyer, said that the "super-dominant" software maker had managed to strangle its rivals' innovation and was unlikely to face "an attack of the clones" if it gave companies the information they needed to make their programs work more smoothly with the Windows operating system.

"Microsoft's alarmist claims about duplication have been made for your consideration only," he told the panel of 13 judges who are considering the company's challenge to the Commission's 2004 antitrust order and record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine.

The weeklong hearing was in its third day Wednesday, and the focus shifted from media player software to the EU regulators' order that Microsoft give interoperability information to makers of rival server operating systems.

Whelan said Novell Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc. were reduced to catering to network servers with "last century's technology" -- Windows NT -- because Microsoft withheld the code needed to allow them to work smoothly with PCs running the world's most-used desktop software.

"In network computing, the client is king and the client speaks Windows," he said.

Microsoft's refusal to supply server protocols from 1998 onward meant most servers had to use more time-consuming and costly techniques to supply software people wanted, keeping them a generation behind Microsoft's software, he said.

The company broke with standard practice in the technology industry by refusing to supply interoperability information, he said.

Microsoft insisted that the survival of its rivals and the emergence of new companies proved the competition was strong. The Commission argued the degree of interoperability Microsoft allowed was simply not viable for most customers and "effective competition" no longer existed.

Microsoft lawyer Ian Forrester said the Commission's order has been an attempt "to handicap the (market) leader in perpetuity" by forcing it to hand over trade secrets.

He said Microsoft's server software was compatible with products made by other companies, such as those from Novell and Sun and using Linux and UNIX-based servers.

"Microsoft spends an enormous amount of effort attempting to achieve interoperability," said Microsoft executive John Shewchuk.

Thomas Vinje, a lawyer for an industry group supporting the Commission -- the European Committee for Interoperable Systems -- said Microsoft was trying to blow its patent rights out of proportion and skirt the key issue of the company's monopoly power.

"This is a case about abuse of a dominant position, about refusing to provide information to vendors," he said.

Microsoft broke an informal agreement with EU advocates when it dragged up the recent dispute over the company's compliance with the order -- earning them a stern reprimand from Judge Bo Vesterdorf, who told Forrester to stick to the issue at stake.

Forrester claimed that Microsoft was being threatened with 2 million euro ($2.4 million) daily fines, backdated to Dec. 15, for not creating "a new copyright work" derived from Windows secret source code.

EU regulators asked Microsoft to supply a "complete and accurate" support manual for developers to help them make compatible software.

Last December, they charged Microsoft with not obeying the order after an independent monitor branded Microsoft's 12,650-page technical manual as "unfit at this stage for its intended purpose."

The world's largest software maker says it has the right to guard its valuable intellectual property, and maintains that it has worked strenuously to comply with the 2004 EU ruling.

It was handed down after a five-year investigation concluded that Microsoft had taken advantage of its position as the leading supplier of operating systems to damage rivals who offered server software and media player programs.

While a ruling on the challenge is not due for months, a decision backing the Commission could force Microsoft to change the way it does business in the future and endorse the EU's ability to hold back aggressive corporate behavior.

An appeal of any decision, however, is not certain since Microsoft would need strong legal arguments to protest the ruling to the EU's highest court, the European Court of Justice.

Microsoft Says EU Undermines Its Property (DOW)

Dow Jones, April 27, 2006

LUXEMBOURG -(Dow Jones)- Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) (MSFT) Wednesday attacked a European regulators' orders to help rivals write software that works smoothly with its Windows operating system, saying that they violate its intellectual property.

On the third day of a week-long court hearing, the software giant claimed the European Commission is giving rivals license to clone its products. The software industry and the future of technological innovation are at stake, the company's lawyers contended.

Microsoft (MSFT) is appealing a landmark antitrust punishment before a European court in Luxembourg. In 2004, the Commission found the company cripples rival software makers by withholding key "interoperability" information. The regulator also said Microsoft (MSFT) illegally bundles its Media Player program with Windows. On these two counts, the Commission fined the company a record EUR497 million and ordered it to change its some of its business practices.

During the first two days of hearings, Microsoft (MSFT) defended its bundled Media Player software, claiming the Commission made "serious errors" in its decision. Wednesday and Thursday, Microsoft (MSFT) is arguing that Windows isn't designed to hamper rivals' products.

The Commission's decision "is an attempt to alter how the marketplace works," said Microsoft (MSFT) lawyer Ian Forrester Wednesday. This is "an immense encroachment on Microsoft's (MSFT) interests."

Forrester said Microsoft's (MSFT) software is "widely known, widely used, and not at all secret." He added that the company still faces strong competition.

Microsoft (MSFT) engineer John Shewchuk gave a presentation designed to show that servers all over the globe work well with Windows. "Microsoft (MSFT) spends an enormous amount of effort achieving interoperability and providing interoperability" with systems all over the world.

Microsoft (MSFT) supporters backed up his testimony. Tom Kemp, CEO of Centrify Corporation, said his company made software that allowed different operating systems to communicate. "Seamless interoperability between disparate, heterogeneous systems and applications is possible and easy using Centrify's technology," Kemp said. In the afternoon session, rivals defended the Commission's 2004 decision. printed on paper, it would take up 12,650 pages. Thomas Vinje, a lawyer for the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, which includes Sun Microsystems Inc. (SUNW) (SUNW), International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) (IBM (IBM)), and Oracle Corp. (ORCL) (ORCL). said Microsoft (MSFT) was blowing its patent rights out of proportion.

"This morning's Microsoft (MSFT) presentation confirms the March 2004 conclusions of the Commission," Vinje said. "Microsoft (MSFT) determines if and how computer server systems will interoperate with Microsoft's (MSFT) desktop monopoly. So long as it is in Microsoft's (MSFT) business interest, it will provide necessary interoperability information."

In his presentation Commission lawyer Anthony Whelan attempted to demonstrate why Microsoft's (MSFT) technical information made it difficult or to expensive to achieve interoperability. He denied Microsoft's (MSFT) assertion that competitors wanted to copy or steal its intellectual property.

"There is no evidence Microsoft's (MSFT) competitors want to clone its product," Whelan said. He added they only wanted to make sure their products communicate with Windows.

Microsoft's (MSFT) direct rivals are keeping a low profile during the hearing to avoid a public confrontation with the company, lawyers familiar with the case say. IBM (IBM) and Oracle won't present information directly to the court, preferring to let Vinje speak for them.

Sun Microsystems (SUNW) propelled Microsoft's (MSFT) European antitrust case with a 1998 complaint about ill-defined instructions for making software work with Windows. Based on later complaints from RealNetworks Inc. (RNWK) (RNWK), the Commission expanded its case to include the Media Player charges. Sun Microsystems (SUNW) and RealNetworks (RNWK)aren't present at the Luxembourg hearing, however, since both companies settled their disputes with Microsoft (MSFT). Microsoft (MSFT) paid Sun Microsystems (SUNW) $1.95 billion in 2004 and RealNetworks (RNWK) received a $761 million payout last year.

With Microsoft's (MSFT) appeal pending, the Luxembourg court in December 2004 ordered Microsoft (MSFT) to comply immediately with the regulator's decision. Since then, the Commission has battled Microsoft (MSFT) over compliance issues.

Last summer, Microsoft (MSFT) released a version of Windows without Media Player, a product known as Windows N. Earlier this week Microsoft (MSFT) said limited demand for the product - it has sold only 1,787 copies - proves consumers want built-in music and video capabilities. The company's rivals claim limited demand for Windows N confirms Microsoft (MSFT) has created an invincible monopoly.

Over the past few months, the regulator has pressed Microsoft (MSFT) to comply with its interoperability orders. Microsoft (MSFT) has provided a set of protocols, also known as a road map, for rivals to use. But an independent software expert overseeing the company's compliance, U.K. computer scientist Neil Barrett, last year told the Commission that these protocols were "totally unusable."

The regulator is threatening to fine the company up to EUR2 million a day for not complying with its orders.

More Than A Letter Needed To Take House, Court Says (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — "An elementary and fundamental requirement of due process," the Supreme Court ruled many years ago, is that the government must provide "notice" and an opportunity to be heard before it seizes property.

On Wednesday, the court added teeth to that requirement, ruling that Arkansas violated a homeowner's right to due process when it sold his house for nonpayment of taxes after sending him two certified letters that came back "unclaimed."

Writing for a 5-to-3 majority, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said that "it is not too much to insist that the state do a bit more" before using its "extraordinary power" to take and sell a person's house.

The Constitution does not require "actual notice" like personally handing the letter to the homeowner, the chief justice observed. But he said that once the state became aware, as in this case, that an effort at notice had failed, it must take "additional reasonable steps to attempt to provide notice to the property owner before selling his property, if it is practicable to do so."

Justices Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and Anthony M. Kennedy dissented, the latter two signing a dissenting opinion by Justice Thomas. The state did all that was constitutionally required, Justice Thomas said, adding that it was the homeowner's responsibility to make sure that the authorities knew how to contact him. The court was imposing a "burdensome" and "impractical" requirement on the government, he said.

After a separation from his wife, the homeowner, Gary K. Jones, had moved out, continuing to pay the mortgage while his wife remained in the house. The mortgage company paid the property taxes. But once Mr. Jones paid off the mortgage, the taxes went unpaid.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote in the case, which was argued shortly before he joined the court in January. The decision, Jones v. Flowers, No. 04-1477, overturned a ruling by the Supreme Court of Arkansas.

For anyone watching the emergence of the Roberts court, the case provided intriguing tea leaves. It was the chief justice's fourth majority opinion, and the first to provoke any dissenting votes. That the dissenters included the court's two best-known conservatives was interesting, of course.

Equally intriguing was the choice by Justice Kennedy, seen by many as the justice most likely to assume the central position on the court previously held by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, to join Justices Thomas and Scalia in an almost paradigmatic case pitting an individual against the state.

While this was hardly the most high-profile case on the court's docket, no case that requires the justices to express their views on the meaning of constitutional due process is insignificant.

Further, the federal government raised the stakes by entering the case to argue that the notice Arkansas provided to Mr. Jones was adequate. Given that many federal agencies have authority to seize property, "the United States has a substantial interest in the question presented," the solicitor general's office told the court in a 29-page brief.

The most recent Supreme Court case to touch on a related issue was in 2002, when the court ruled, 5 to 4, that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had satisfied due process by mailing a notice to a prisoner that his property was about to be forfeited. The bureau was unaware at the time that the prisoner had not received its letter.

William H. Rehnquist, then the chief justice, wrote the majority opinion in that case, Dusenbery v. United States, joined by Justices Thomas, Scalia, Kennedy and O'Connor. The dissenters then, all of whom joined Chief Justice Roberts in the new case, were Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

In his majority opinion, Chief Justice Roberts acknowledged the Dusenbery case but said the "new wrinkle" was that in the new case the government was aware by the time it seized the property that it had failed to notify the owner.

Offering an analogy, the chief justice said that if the Arkansas tax commissioner had "prepared a stack of letters to mail to delinquent taxpayers, handed them to a postman and then watched as the departing postman accidentally dropped the letters down a storm drain, one would certainly expect the commission's office to prepare a new stack of letters and send them again" rather than "simply shrug his shoulders as the letters disappeared and say 'I tried.' "

Among the additional "reasonable steps" the chief justice said the state might have taken was to send the notice by regular mail, so that a signature was not required, or to post a notice on the front door.

In a second decision on Wednesday, the court set a new rule for people seeking to bring a lawsuit that accuses government officials of fomenting a criminal prosecution as retaliation for criticizing a government agency.

By a vote of 5 to 2, the court held that such a "retaliatory prosecution" suit could proceed only if the plaintiff could demonstrate an absence of probable cause for the prosecution.

The decision overturned a ruling by the federal appeals court here, which had not imposed that requirement in permitting a lawsuit against five postal inspectors to proceed.

DOJ_NMG_0026737

The plaintiff, William G. Moore Jr., had been engaged in a business dispute with the Postal Service. He contended in his suit that the postal inspectors had persuaded a federal prosecutor to bring criminal charges against him, charges that were dismissed after a federal district judge found a "complete lack of evidence."

Under the court's precedents, prosecutors themselves have absolute immunity for a decision to prosecute, meaning that such suits must be brought against the officials who influenced the prosecutor to bring the case.

In his majority opinion on Wednesday in Hartman v. Moore, No. 04-1495, Justice Souter said that showing an absence of probable cause was the most reliable way to make the necessary link "between the retaliatory animus of one person and the action of another."

Justices Ginsburg and Breyer dissented. Chief Justice Roberts, who was on the appeals court when the case was decided there, and Justice Alito, who was not on the Supreme Court when it was argued in January, did not vote.

America's Parks Feel Strain Of A Budget Crunch (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

ASHLAND, ORE. - In the eyes of Americans, nothing tops national parks as a popular government program. Not defense or education. Not Social Security or fighting crime, public opinion polls say. That's one reason President Bush declared this week to be "National Park Week."

But as the wear and tear of all that love takes its toll on nearly 400 park units around the country, and as Uncle Sam's expenses for war in Iraq, hurricane cleanup, and other activities continue to push the federal deficit ever higher, parks around the country are facing a budget crunch.

From Joshua Tree in the southern California desert to Acadia on the coast of Maine, national parks are tightening their budget belts - shortening some facility hours, increasing fees for camping and other activities, recruiting retirees and other unpaid volunteers to conduct education and interpretation programs, sharing archaeologists and other specialists, and seeking financial support from corporations.

"These are challenging times," says Elaine Sevy, deputy chief of communications for the National Park Service. "I'm not going to deny that."

Will this affect the park experience for vacationers this summer? Parks advocates and former park service employees say so, predicting reduced visitor services and increased fees.

"It very definitely is belt- tightening or more," says Bill Wade, chairman of the executive council of the Coalition of National Park Service Retirees and former superintendent of Shenandoah National Park in Virginia. "We are in the process right now of surveying some parks to find out how the quality of park experiences and protection of resources are likely to be impacted, this summer and beyond."

The Government Accountability Office (the investigative arm of Congress) recently visited 12 park units. Managers there told GAO officials that they do not have the financial resources to keep up with increasing costs, including congressionally authorized salary and benefits for employees, rising utility costs, maintenance needs, and required law enforcement levels, including back-country patrols.

"In response to daily operations allocation trends, increased costs, and new policy requirements, parks reported that they either eliminated or reduced some services," the GAO recently reported. "They also relied on other authorized funding sources and volunteers to pay for activities that have historically been paid for from the allocations for daily operations."

This worries park advocates.

"The GAO report confirms that America's national parks are losing ground, and straining to survive shrinking budgets," says Tom Kiernan, president of the National Parks Conservation Association (NPCA), an advocacy group in Washington.

A year ago, the Congressional Research Service estimated that the Park Service backlog in maintenance and resource protection totals from $4.5 billion to $9.7 billion - upkeep for some 8,000 miles of roads, 1,500 bridges, 400 dams, and 30,000 structures at 388 national park sites (parks, monuments, battlefields, historic sites, lakeshores, recreation areas, scenic rivers and trails, and the White House).

Then there's the cost of paying park rangers, keeping the lights on, running thousands of vehicles and hundreds of visitor centers, and the other necessities required to handle nearly 300 million visitors a year. As the NPCA sees it, there's a "chronic annual operating shortfall," exceeding $600 million a year.

Aside from the politics of who's responsible for such growing needs, the Park Service has to make do with the budget put forth by the president and approved by Congress.

What that means, says Ms. Sevy, is having each park superintendent work to keep operating costs at about 80 percent of his or her annual budget, leaving the rest for special projects like natural resource studies or restoration of trails.

"It's not a cut," says Sevy. "It's just to get them to manage their budgets more efficiently."

To advocacy groups, that sounds a lot like a budget cut - $100 million less in the fiscal year 2007 overall parks budget now being reviewed by Congress, as the NPCA sees it. In any case, Sevy acknowledges, "there's no way around" the need for some parks to reduce some services and hours of operation.

In Congress, 70 representatives and senators are sponsoring the bipartisan National Park Centennial Act. Using federal treasury money plus a voluntary check-off on income tax returns, the bill would increase funding for maintenance as well as natural and cultural preservation projects through 2016 - the 100th anniversary of the National Park Service.

The debate over national parks funding goes back several years to when US Park Police Chief Teresa Chambers was fired for talking with a reporter about staff reductions. Ms. Chambers' legal dispute with the federal government over her termination continues. But since then, the park service has directed its employees to be more open with the public over budget challenges.

More Lawlessness At EPA (WP)

BARELY A MONTH ago, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit issued a stinging rebuke to the Environmental Protection Agency's efforts to rewrite federal clean air law to weaken rules concerning power companies upgrading old coal-fired equipment. This week, a cross-ideological panel of the court unanimously accused the agency, once again, of defying federal environmental law -- this time concerning efforts to clean up the Anacostia River. The panel's strong, derisive language should send a message to the agency to take congressional enactments seriously, as written, not as the agency wishes Congress had written them.

Decades after the passage of the Clean Water Act, the Anacostia remains one of the dirtiest rivers in the country. To redress such problems, the law requires the EPA to identify pollutants and set what the law calls "total maximum daily loads" -- the daily dumping the river can take for each of these pollutants, measured at a level adequate to "implement the applicable water quality standards." The trouble for the Anacostia, and for a lot of dirty rivers, is that measuring the maximum load by the day requires expensive changes. Heavy rains can cause sewage to overflow into the river day, killing fish and blotting out sunlight necessary for plant life. Instead of forcing the D.C. government and the D.C. Water and Sewer Authority to create systems to prevent this, the EPA read the word "daily" to mean -- as it put it in one brief -- "non-daily" and measured the total maximum load for different pollutants on a seasonal and annual basis. This effectively allows big dumps now and then, as long as the total over time stays within specific limits.

This move was not, as was the power-plant rule, a crude effort by the Bush administration to rewrite the law to favor polluters. For one thing, the EPA seems to have adopted this reading of the statute long before the current administration; what's more, one federal court of appeals actually adopted it. That said, it is plainly erroneous, as was argued by the D.C. Circuit panel, which included controversial Bush-appointed Judges Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas B. Griffith. Wrote Judge David S. Tatel for the panel, " 'Daily' connotes 'every day.' Doctors making daily rounds would be of little use to their patients if they appeared seasonally or annually. And no one thinks of '[g]ive us this day our daily bread' as a prayer for sustenance on a seasonal or annual basis." Federal regulators shouldn't need such judicial reminders that the law means what it says.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Oakland Pot Growing Conviction Overturned But Ruling Means New Trial For Marijuana Advocate (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, April 27, 2006

(04-26) 13:48 PDT SAN FRANCISCO -- The federal marijuana cultivation convictions of noted pot advocate Ed Rosenthal were overturned by a federal appeals court today because of a juror's phone call to an attorney friend, who told her to follow the judge's instructions or she could get in trouble.

The juror's unauthorized contact on the eve of the verdict in January 2003 was an "improper influence" that denied Rosenthal a trial before an impartial jury, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said in a 3-0 ruling granting him a new trial.

"Jurors cannot fairly determine the outcome of a case if they believe they will face 'trouble' for a conclusion they reach as jurors," said the opinion by Judge Betty Fletcher. "The threat of punishment works a coercive influence on the jury's independence."

Rosenthal, a magazine columnist and author of books on marijuana-growing who is known as the "Guru of Ganja," was convicted of three felony charges in connection with plants he was growing in 2002 for patients served by the Harm Reduction Center, a San Francisco dispensary.

He faced a sentence of at least five years in prison under federal law, but U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer gave him only a day in jail, finding unusual circumstances. Breyer said Rosenthal had believed, mistakenly but reasonably, that he was not violating federal law because Oakland had named him an official agent in its drug program.

Rosenthal, who had already served his one-day sentence after his arrest, appealed his convictions. The Justice Department, which had sought a 6 1/2-year prison term, appealed the sentence. Because the convictions were overturned, the court did not rule on the government's appeal, but Fletcher said the panel was not inclined to change Rosenthal's sentence.

During the trial, Breyer refused to allow evidence about the intended medical use of the marijuana or about its possible legality under California's Proposition 215, a 1996 initiative that allowed patients to use the drug with their doctor's approval. Seven of the 12 jurors disavowed their guilty verdicts after the trial when they learned about the evidence that had been excluded -- that Rosenthal was growing marijuana for medical patients, and that he had been designated as an agent by the city of Oakland in its medical marijuana program.

Similar qualms about the jury's inability to consider the drug's medical use led to the pre-verdict phone call that was the basis of today's ruling.

In a sworn declaration, the juror said she had been troubled by the absence of evidence about medical marijuana and by the judge's instructions that jurors must consider only federal law. She said she telephoned a lawyer she knew and asked if she had to follow the instructions or if she had any leeway for independent thought.

She said the lawyer replied that she had to follow the instructions or she could "get into trouble." The juror said she shared the advice with another juror who shared her confusion.

9th Circuit Overturns Marijuana Cultivation Conviction Of 'Guru Of Ganja' (AP)

By David Kravets, The Associated Press

AP, April 27, 2006

A federal appeals court Wednesday overturned the pot-growing conviction of the self-proclaimed "Guru of Ganja," a marijuana advocate who has written books on how to grow pot and avoid getting caught.

The court cited jury misconduct in overturning Ed Rosenthal's conviction, but it otherwise upheld federal powers to charge marijuana growers.

Rosenthal was convicted in 2003 for cultivating hundreds of marijuana plants for a city of Oakland medical marijuana program. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced him to one day in prison, saying Rosenthal reasonably believed he was immune from prosecution because he was acting on behalf of city officials.

The government sought a two-year prison term and appealed. Rosenthal cross-appealed.

The case drew national attention, in part, because of Rosenthal's status as a leading author and proponent of marijuana. It also underscored the federal government's position that medical marijuana is illegal, it has no medical value and the will of California voters has no effect on nationwide drug laws.

A three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court, in overturning the verdict, said a juror had had inappropriate communication with an attorney.

"Juror A" had asked a friend who is an attorney whether she had to follow the law or could vote her conscience because she suspected Rosenthal was growing marijuana for medicinal uses. The attorney told her she must follow the judge's instructions to follow federal law or she would get in "trouble."

"We hold that here the communication was an improper influence upon Juror A's decision to acquit or convict," the appeals court wrote.

The court rejected Rosenthal's argument that he should have been allowed to tell jurors he was growing marijuana for the city for medicinal uses.

While the case was on appeal, and despite Rosenthal's claims, the Supreme Court ruled again that the federal government can prosecute medical marijuana growers and users despite California's medical marijuana law.

Rosenthal once wrote the "Ask Ed" column for High Times magazine and has written books with titles including "The Big Book of Buds" and "Ask Ed: Marijuana Law. Don't Get Busted."

Reached by phone Wednesday, he declined immediate comment on the ruling, saying he had not yet read the decision.

U.S. Attorney's spokesman Luke Macaulay said the office was considering whether to appeal or go ahead with a new trial.

BankAtlantic To Forfeit $10M To U.S. (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

BankAtlantic Agrees to Forfeit $10 Million to U.S. to Avoid Money-Laundering Charge

MIAMI (AP) -- BankAtlantic agreed Wednesday to forfeit $10 million to the U.S. government to avoid criminal charges that it permitted millions of dollars in suspected drug money to be laundered through its accounts over a nearly seven-year period.

Under an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department filed in federal court, prosecution against the Fort Lauderdale-based bank will be deferred for at least 12 months in return for the payment. The charges will be dismissed altogether if BankAtlantic continues taking action to remedy the situation.

The investigation, led by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and federal bank regulators, identified more than $50 million in suspicious transactions between July 1997 and April 2004, according to court documents.

BankAtlantic operates 79 branch offices in Florida. It is a subsidiary of BankAtlantic Bancorp Inc., a financial services holding company whose stock fell 2 cents Wednesday to close at $15.32 a share.

Alan B. Levan, BankAtlantic's chairman and CEO, said that since problems were found in 2004 "we have worked tirelessly" to improve compliance with anti-money laundering laws and regulations.

"We are happy to put these issues behind us," Levan said.

DEA agents working undercover as operatives for supposed Colombian drug lords found that drug money was being wire transferred to a handful of BankAtlantic accounts overseen by a specific branch manager. That led to the discovery of other BankAtlantic accounts being used to launder illicit drug proceeds.

"While a weak link at BankAtlantic let this money in, DEA is committed to following it where we often see it lead: right to the pockets of drug kingpins," said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy.

BankAtlantic admitted in the agreement that it did not identify and report the suspicious transactions as required by the Bank Secrecy Act. Court papers say there were numerous "red flags" about the transactions, such as a high volume of both incoming and outgoing wire transfers to unrelated people and corporations.

Although the unidentified branch manager was to blame for many of the problems, the investigation also revealed "serious and systemic" failures by BankAtlantic to comply with anti-money laundering laws over several years.

But the court agreement gives BankAtlantic credit for cooperating with the investigation, firing employees responsible for the problems and closing down accounts used for the suspicious transactions. The bank also created a new anti-money laundering and Bank Secrecy Act department to beef up compliance and improved audits, training and software used to detect such transactions.

US Drug Money Sting Leads To $10 Million Fine For BankAtlantic (DOW)

Dow Jones, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- An undercover money-laundering sting has netted an unusual catch - a medium-size bank - and Wednesday BankAtlantic Bancorp Inc. (BBX) agreed to pay federal officials a $10 million fine.

In its agreement with the U.S. Justice Department and bank regulators, BankAtlantic, based in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., agreed to ramp up its anti-money- laundering controls. If major changes are made in the next 12 months, law enforcement officials have agreed to drop the charges, but not the fine.

This arrangement is called a deferred prosecution agreement.

The $6 billion Fort Lauderdale-based thrift "accepted and acknowledged responsibility for its behavior," the Justice Department said in a press release. A BankAtlantic spokeswoman didn't return a call for comment.

In the agreement, the Justice Department and Drug Enforcement Agency alleged that BankAtlantic allowed millions of dollars to illegally flow through its accounts from 1997 through April 2004. This included "the deposit and transfer of more than $10 million in suspected drug proceeds originating from U.S. undercover law enforcement operations."

Court records show that undercover drug enforcement officials made deals with suspected drug traffickers to help deposit drug proceeds into U.S. banks. On multiple occasions, money couriers handed undercover agents bags or briefcases with between $150,000 and $500,000 in cash. The agents then deposited the money into a secret government account and were asked by the suspected drug traffickers to wire the money to accounts at BankAtlantic.

The Office of Thrift Supervision, which regulates BankAtlantic, issued a cease and desist order against the thrift Wednesday, requiring it to improve its anti- money- laundering protections.

This isn't the first time the Justice Department has sanctioned a bank for weak money-laundering controls.

In the last several years, the Justice Department has fined Riggs National Corp. $16 million and AmSouth Bancorp (ASO). (ASO) $40 million.

News In Brief From The San Francisco Bay Area (AP)

AP, April 26, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A man suspected of storing methamphetamine for the ringleaders of an alleged Hells Angels drug ring was found shot to death at Ocean Beach, police said.

Michael Demetrescu Sr., 46, was wanted on federal drug trafficking charges after agents raided 19 Hells Angels locations last week and found a pound of methamphetamine in the garage of Demetrescu's home in San Francisco, said police Inspector Joe Toomey.

Demetrescu told his girlfriend a day before his death that he planned to turn himself in, police said. His death is being treated as a suicide.

Investigators believe Demetrescu was storing drugs for his neighbor, Jason Peterson, 32, a top Hells Angels official who was arrested in the raids Thursday along with the San Francisco chapter president, 35-year-old Joseph Wilson.

A total of 12 people were arrested on suspicion of methamphetamine trafficking and other charges. All have denied the allegations.

Authorities said they found more than 100 pounds of cocaine, eight pounds of methamphetamine and numerous weapons including a grenade in the raids and earlier seizures.

SAN FRANCISCO Hells Angel Possible Suicide At Beach Fugitive In Drug Raids Had Bullet In Head, Gun At Side (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, April 26, 2006

A man sought after last week's federal raids targeting the Hells Angels motorcycle club in San Francisco was found shot to death Tuesday at Ocean Beach, a day after telling his girlfriend he was going to turn himself in, authorities said.

Authorities say Michael Demetrescu Sr., 46, was found about 8:15 a.m. in the sand dunes on Ocean Beach near the Great Highway and Kirkham and Lawton streets, a handgun by his side. He had been shot in the head.

Police say they suspect Demetrescu committed suicide but are awaiting the outcome of tests and a review of other evidence before making any conclusions.

Demetrescu had faced 40 years to life in prison if convicted of federal methamphetamine trafficking charges that had been lodged against him after the raids Thursday. The agents who conducted the raids said they had found a pound of methamphetamine in the garage of his home in the Dogpatch neighborhood.

Inspector Joe Toomey of the homicide detail said Demetrescu was last seen Monday night leaving the Hells Angels' clubhouse on Tennessee Street. After his body was found, his live-in girlfriend, Nancy Deemer, told police that Demetrescu had said he was going to turn himself in Tuesday, Toomey said.

"She didn't know where he was going to turn himself in or to whom," Toomey said. "She said he was a little depressed."

Demetrescu lived at 1199 Tennessee St. in a home that abuts the Hells Angels Frisco chapter clubhouse. Authorities who raided his residence allegedly found marijuana in addition to the methamphetamine.

DOJ_NMG_0026743

Federal agents suspected that Demetrescu stored drugs for Jason Peterson, 32, who lived in a unit that shares a wall with the Tennessee Street clubhouse.

Peterson, the sergeant at arms for the group, is in federal custody, as is the chapter's president, Joseph "Joey" Wilson, 35, of Visitacion Valley.

Demetrescu was not originally indicted, but was named as a defendant after agents allegedly found the methamphetamine.

Federal authorities used an undercover agent and eight months of wiretaps to build a case against the Hells Angels. They documented several drug deals -- including one for 100 pounds of cocaine -- allegedly orchestrated by Wilson and Peterson, according to a search warrant affidavit.

The two men and 10 associates were arraigned Friday before U.S. Magistrate James Larson. All denied the allegations. They are set to appear for hearings this week.

The defendants were involved in a well-organized, multimillion-dollar criminal enterprise involving methamphetamine, cocaine and marijuana, federal authorities said.

In the raids Thursday and in earlier seizures, agents found more than 100 pounds of cocaine, eight pounds of methamphetamine, $145,000 in cash and numerous weapons, including a grenade, authorities said.

FBI agents and local law enforcement raided 19 locations Thursday, knocking down doors in some cases to gain entry.

SAN FRANCISCO 15 Suspected Crack Dealers Arrested In Western Addition Roundup Will Cut Violent Crime There, Police Say (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, April 26, 2006

San Francisco police trying to gain control over crime in the Western Addition have secured warrants for at least two dozen suspected crack cocaine dealers and have arrested 15 of them, authorities said Tuesday.

Although none of those named in the warrants is wanted on murder charges, police said they were optimistic that taking crack dealers off the streets would reduce violent crime in the Western Addition.

At least 20 people have been slain in the neighborhood since the beginning of last year, and investigators suspect many of the killings were connected to the drug trade.

"We know of the nexus between drugs and homicides," said Deputy Chief Morris Tabak, who oversees police investigations and the narcotics detail.

The alleged crack dealers were identified during a two-month undercover investigation, Tabak said. Officers posing as customers made one to three purchases of crack in videotaped transactions from each of the alleged street dealers, investigators said.

All the suspects are accused of felony drug crimes, mainly crack cocaine dealing. Police were still seeking some suspects as of late Tuesday, but refused to say exactly how many.

Investigators said many of those arrested Tuesday were repeat offenders who were either out on bail or on probation. Their past convictions include gang violence and weapons possession charges, said Capt. Tim Hettrich of the narcotics unit.

"These people have committed robberies, they have shot people, they are terrorizing the neighborhood," Hettrich said.

Hettrich said most of the 15 suspects arrested Tuesday had been found on the street in the Western Addition. The arrest warrants carry bail amounts of $35,000 to $125,000, he said.

The sweep was conducted by the narcotics detail, with assistance from the gang task force, officers from Northern Station, and agents with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

"We target the areas where we have the violence," Hettrich said.

District Attorney Kamala Harris said her office had filed the drug charges against roughly two dozen suspects -- including the 15 under arrest -- as part of an overall crackdown on drug dealing and violent felons.

"It was a collaborative law enforcement effort," she said. "That's 15 bodies off the street who were dealing drugs and posing a threat to the neighborhood."

DOJ_NMG_0026744

"Good job -- we need more of it," said Supervisor Ross Mirkarimi, who represents the Western Addition. He has called loudly for police to do something about homicides there.

"There is a very plausible link between the drug dealing and the spikes of homicides and violence," Mirkarimi said. "The homicides where I have been to the scene have often been the results of drug deals gone bad or turf wars over those who are selling drugs."

Mirkarimi noted that the homicide rate has dropped recently. Two killings have happened in the neighborhood since Jan. 1, compared with six by this time last year.

"We've had a bit of a respite in the homicides, thank heavens to all the good work everybody is doing," Mirkarimi said. But given the trend of gang and drug activity, he said, "it's just a matter of time" before the rate rises again, unless more is done.

Powerhouse Gym Owner Pleads Guilty To Drug Charge (BHE)

By SERGIO CHAPA

Brownsville (TX) Herald, April 27, 2006

The owner of a Brownsville gym pleaded guilty to a federal drug trafficking charge Wednesday morning.

Powerhouse Gym owner Jose Alfredo DeLeon had maintained his innocence on the conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine charge until the Wednesday morning hearing where he told U.S. District Judge Andrew S. Hanen that he had a “cocaine habit.”

The 39-year-old man, who was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents in January, told Hanen that he last used cocaine three days before his arrest and requested to be placed in a drug treatment program.

The gym owner faces 10 years to life in prison after pleading guilty to selling bulk amounts of the dietary supplement inositol to cocaine traffickers and then instructing them how to use it to “cut” their shipments.

Prosecutor Terra Bay said in open court that federal agents found a hand-written ledger of inositol sales, a cocaine pharmacology book, scales, 25 pounds of marijuana and a small amount of cocaine inside DeLeon’s North Brownsville home.

Court records show that DeLeon is the next-to-the-last defendant to be arrested in a five-count, 16-person indictment that included convicted drug trafficker Juan Carlos Sanchez-Vasquez in January 2005.

Bay said in open court that DeLeon sold the dietary supplement to Sanchez-Vasquez as well as convicted drug traffickers Andres Garza and Rolando Curiel.

Federal court records show that Sanchez-Vasquez, Garza and Curiel each bribed former Sheriff Conrado Cantu to protect their drug trafficking organizations.

DeLeon is expected to be sentenced July 31.

New Rochelle Drug Trafficker Sentenced To 38 Months In Prison (JNE)

By TIMOTHY O'CONNOR

Journal News, April 26, 2006

A New Rochelle man was sentenced yesterday to more than three years in prison for cocaine trafficking.

Victor M. Frias-Valencia, 27, of 40 Park Place pleaded guilty in November in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport to possessing and intending to distribute a kilogram of cocaine.

Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration arrested Frias-Valencia in Greenwich on Sept. 29, 2004, after he struck a deal with a DEA informant to sell the cocaine, roughly 2.2 pounds, according to court documents and Frias-Valencia's plea.

Frias-Valencia showed the informant the cocaine that he had stashed in a cooler outside a Greenwich apartment building. The informant went back to his car to get money and signaled the DEA agents that the deal was happening.

DEA agents approached Frias-Valencia, who fled up the stairs and into an apartment. DEA agents entered the apartment after him and found the cooler in the bathroom, the cocaine on a roof outside the bathroom window. Frias-Valencia admitted to DEA agents the cocaine was his and he intended to sell it, according to court documents.

At the time of his arrest, Frias-Valencia was in the United States illegally. He was sentenced yesterday to 38 months in a federal prison. He will be deported to Mexico upon completion of his prison sentence, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said.

DOJ_NMG_0026745

As part of the plea agreement he signed Nov. 3 with federal prosecutors, Frias-Valencia agreed to forfeit the Lexus IS 300 he was in possession of at the time of his arrest. Frias-Valencia's lawyer did not return calls seeking comment.

Man Guilty Of Conspiracy In Cocaine Trafficking Case (AP/WPRI)

WPRI/AP, April 27, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) -- A jury finds a Massachusetts man guilty of conspiring to deal cocaine.

Domingo Gonzales was arrested last year after agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration raided a Providence house and interrupted a cocaine deal. Investigators say they found a handgun and 97 grams of cocaine in the car Gonzales arrived in.

He was arrested after DEA agents found him hiding under a pile of rubbish in the basement. Gonzales lives in Lawrence, Massachusetts. He was convicted of conspiring to distribute cocaine and possessing more than 500 grams of the drug.

He was acquitted of a gun charge. According to the U.S. Attorney's office, five other defendants in the case have already pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges.

City Man Gets 5 Years For Role In Opiates Ring (SNE)

By Douglas A. Moser

Salem News, April 27, 2006

BOSTON — A Peabody man will spend more than five years behind bars for his part in a ring that peddled highly addictive painkillers on Cape Ann.

Jose Melo of 20 Tracey St., Peabody, was sentenced to more than five years (63 months) for distribution yesterday. During an undercover drug raid in 2004, Melo was arrested along with a dozen others, most from Gloucester. He pleaded guilty last month to the charges in U.S. District Court. He was sentenced yesterday at the John Joseph Moakley Courthouse in South Boston.

Judge Rya Zobel ordered Melo to serve 63 months in prison and three years' supervision after release. After his sentence, she ordered Melo, who is not an American citizen, to leave the country. His defense attorney, Stephen Neyman, did not say what country Melo is from, saying only that Melo would return to the Azores islands, off the coast of Portugal.

Thirteen men — most of whom were from Gloucester — were arrested June 29, 2004, and the next day after an eight-month undercover operation from a Riverdale Park apartment involving Gloucester police, the Cape Ann Drug Task Force, Essex County sheriff's deputies and the federal Drug Enforcement Agency.

Deputies and the DEA said they purchased 1,096 80 milligram pills between October 2003 and June 2004. Two of the men sold the drugs from a Gloucester apartment, as well as at the Bugaboo Creek Steak House in Peabody and in the Northshore Mall.

All 13 were indicted by a grand jury in September 2004 for distribution and conspiracy to distribute oxycodone.

Oxycodone is a powerful opiate-based prescription pain reliever that carries a significant risk of addiction. In recent years, it has become a popular street drug.

Student, Teen Charged In Gun Case, Threat At Melvindale Charter School (DEN)

Detroit News, April 27, 2006

MELVINDALE -- A 16-year-old student at the Academy of Business and Technology and a 15-year old who formerly attended the school were charged Wednesday with carrying a concealed weapon and with making a terrorist threat in separate incidents at the school.

Melvindale police were at the school Tuesday investigating an e-mail in which someone threatened to shoot up the school when a student approached the officers and told them they saw a student with a gun, said Chief Rick Cadez.

When officers located the 16-year-old, a Detroit resident, he was carrying an unloaded .25-caliber hand gun, the chief said. Police were not able to learn where he got the gun, as his parents refused to allow police to interview him.

The gun was given to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) which will trace its ownership. The youth was turned over to Wayne County juvenile authorities. Wayne County Prosecutor Kym L. Worthy issued a warrant charging him with carrying a concealed weapon.

The threatening e-mail was traced to a 15-year-old from Taylor. He was charged with making a threat of terrorism, a felony that carries a 20-year maximum prison sentence. He is also being held by juvenile authorities.

Cadez said the incidents should not be seen as a reflection on the school.

"These were just a couple of dumb kids acting stupid," he said. Cadez said "I am going to notify our schools about what happened here so they can let kids know what the consequences can be for acting stupid."

Man Gets Probation For Having Bombs (GTT)

By Scott Harper

Georgetown (SC) Times, April 27, 2006

An Andrews man arrested last year for possessing homemade bombs will not go to jail after it was determined he had no criminal intentions.

Norman Weaver, 30, pled guilty to multiple counts of possession of a destructive device and was sentenced to 18 months probation Tuesday.

He was arrested in October after Georgetown County deputies went to his Big Dam Swamp home to investigate another matter.

Deputy Solicitor Matthew Modica told Judge Edward Cottingham while the officers were at the home they found eight bombs made of PCP pipe that were packed with black powder.

He said South Carolina Law Enforcement Division and federal ATF agents were called in to assist with the investigation. He said after the inquest, it was decided the matter did not warrant federal prosecution.Modica said Weaver's name did not appear on any intelligence watch lists and the ATF agents "did not believe he posed a threat."

However, Modica noted, "it is against the law in South Carolina to possess" such devices.

He also pointed out that the bombs could not have been exploded as they were at the time they were discovered. He said more work, including the adding of wicks, would have had to occur on the bombs before they could be detonated.

Weaver's attorney, Stephen Schmitz, said his client, who now lives in Beaufort, had a good, non-violent reason for having the bombs. He said Weaver travels the country as a Civil War reenactor and he made the devices five years ago to possibly use in one of the performances.

Schmitz said Weaver planned to blow up the bombs in the Edisto River but had not done it before they were found.

That story is different from the one Weaver reportedly told investigators when he was arrested. According to the Sheriff's Office, during Weaver's initial interview he said he bought a box of ammunition at a gun show and had no idea the bombs were in the box until he got home. He said he had planned to cut each of the pipes open with a saw to dispose of the powder.

The bombs were not the only things authorities confiscated. They also removed bullets and guns as well as two books — "The Complete Book of Witchcraft" and "The Magus: The Complete System of Occult Philosophy."

Although Modica said he now believes Weaver meant no harm, Cottingham said the Sheriff's Office did the right thing by pressing charges. He said after the Sept. 11 attacks on America no one can be too careful.

"I congratulate the Sheriff's Department for bringing this out," Cottingham said. He then sentenced Weaver to five years on each count but suspended the sentence to probation.

Search By ATF Called Politics (SANEWS)

By DEAN BOHN, THE SAGINAW NEWS

The Saginaw News, April 27, 2006

Time will tell if federal agents will return with arrest warrants after carting away numerous firearms from the home of an embattled Brady Township official whose husband is a convicted felon.

Federal law says felons cannot own firearms.

DOJ_NMG_0026747

While Clerk Melissa Alcorn is at odds with the township supervisor, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on Tuesday morning focused on her husband, Douglas A. Alcorn, 41, who served a month in jail and four years of probation, the first two on electronic tether.

He pleaded no contest in 1993 to a charge of second-degree child abuse. In return, prosecutors dismissed a count of first-degree child abuse, court records show.

Court documents show his first wife filed the charges two months into their marriage.

The Alcorns refused comment. William A. Temple, special agent in charge of the ATF's Detroit office who supervised the raid at Alcorn's home, also would not comment.

Arnold D. Dunchock of Corunna, an attorney for the Alcorns, said the firearms were in a gun safe in the home and Douglas Alcorn "did not have access to them."

"They were not arrested," Dunchock said. "If this is so terrible, why were they not taken away?"

However, Dunchock acknowledged, "this doesn't mean they might not be (arrested) in the future."

Dunchock said the family is incensed that agents "apprehended" Melissa Alcorn while she was driving home after dropping one of her four children off to school and conducted the search of their home in front of their other three children.

She has bickered for months with Brady Township Supervisor John Schoch, who faces a recall election Tuesday.

While Schoch blames Alcorn for orchestrating the recall, the timing of the raid prompted the Alcorns' attorney to complain about political motivations.

"This happened one week before the recall election," Dunchock said. "It's not like these were weapons of mass destruction. This (situation) was stable for years. Why now?

"It's obviously politically motivated. The family is being victimized, especially with the recall election on Tuesday."

Dunchock suggested that Schoch prompted the ATF search on the couple in retaliation for the recall effort, but Schoch said he knew nothing about the raid until it happened.

"They're slinging mud," Schoch said. "He's a felon, he's got guns in the house, and somehow they want to say all this is my fault."

The recall election follows months of arguing between Alcorn and Schoch. A Saginaw County Sheriff's Department report shows the Alcorns accused Police Chief Larry Briggs and Schoch of separately swiping their mail, including money from children's birthday cards and a government check.

Schoch and Briggs deny the claim, and no evidence of such offenses exists beyond the Alcorns' allegations, deputies concluded. Briggs was not present at the ATF raid.

A U.S. Army veteran, Douglas Alcorn makes and sells knives. The entrance to his 40-acre home at 14687 Fordney is framed with a "Fort Alcorn" sign above the driveway.

Behind his home he has a shooting range accentuated with a large pavilion. v

IMMIGRATION:

Attorney For Former Nazi Guard Seeks Review Of Ruling (AP)

By MIKE WILSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) A lawyer for a former Nazi concentration camp guard has asked a federal appeals court to review its ruling to revoke the man's U.S. citizenship.

Lisa Mattson, a lawyer for John Hansl, filed documents with the U.S. 8th Circuit Court of Appeals last week, seeking a review by the entire court.

A three-judge panel of the St. Louis-based court ruled March 7 that a U.S. District Court judge was correct in revoking the citizenship of Hansl, 81, who lives in Des Moines.

DOJ_NMG_0026748

The U.S. Department of Justice filed a complaint against Hansl in July 2003, claiming he hid his service with the Waffen SS when he applied for a visa to come the United States in 1955. He was granted a visa and became a U.S. citizen in 1960.

The case revolved around a 1953 law designed to control the flow of immigrants to the U.S. after World War II.

Mattson claimed the law required a person to have ``personally assisted'' in the persecution of others before they could be denied a visa.

U.S. District Court Judge Robert Pratt revoked Hansl's citizenship in April 2005, ruling that Hansl's conduct as a Nazi concentration camp guard left ``no room for factual dispute whether he personally advocated or assisted in persecution.''

In documents filed with the federal appeals court last week, Mattson argued that the decision by the appeals court panel did not take into account evidence by the government that would have shown Hansl was eligible for a visa.

The documents include justice department records on other post World War II visa applicants, and were turned over previously in a ``highly redacted form as to be meaningless,'' Mattson said.

By doing so, ``the government violated the defendant's due process right to a fundamentally fair hearing,'' she said.

She said the documents would show that it was national immigration policy to issue visas to former concentration camp guards unless they were directly involved in committing atrocities.

Mattson said Hansl does not deny that he was a guard at the Sachsenhausen and Natzweiler concentration camps but does not believe he personally assisted in the persecution of others.

Mattson said submitting the redacted evidence ``unfairly shaded and misdirected the court's focus.''

The government later came forward with five documents in their unredacted form, Mattson said in court records.

``Had the evidence been produced in its unadulterated form, and allowed to be presented to the court ... it should have made a difference in the outcome of this case,'' Mattson said.

High Court Avoids Immigration, Focuses On RICO's Application To Business Relationships (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, April 27, 2006

The Supreme Court appeared sympathetic to pleas by business advocates not to "RICO-ize" all types of business relationships, as Justice Stephen Breyer put it, during oral arguments Wednesday.

The Court heard debate in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, a class action brought against Georgia carpet manufacturer Mohawk Industries under the civil portion of RICO, the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. Current and former employees of Mohawk claimed that its hiring of illegal aliens -- in concert with outside recruiting and temp agencies -- depressed wages and amounted to racketeering as defined under RICO. If the suit fits under RICO and the plaintiffs prevail, Mohawk would be exposed to treble damages and could be forced to pay plaintiffs' attorney fees.

"These are enormous penalties that are imposed," Mohawk's lawyer, Carter Phillips, told the justices. Congress passed RICO to target organized crime, he asserted, not ordinary dealings between businesses and their agents and contractors. "It is not free for the government or anyone else" to broaden the law unilaterally, said Phillips, a partner in the D.C. office of Sidley Austin.

In advance billing it appeared that the Mohawk case would draw the high court into some of the immigration issues causing controversy across the nation, including the contention that the corporate hiring of illegal aliens has had the indirect effect of keeping wages low for American citizens.

Instead immigration was barely mentioned, as oral arguments devolved quickly into a dense debate over the ambiguous wording of the RICO statute and whether a corporation like Mohawk can be part of a separate "enterprise" covered by the law.

The tedium left at least two justices, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Clarence Thomas, struggling to stay awake, with mixed success. That is not unusual for Thomas, but it is not as common for Ginsburg, 73, though in recent months she has often appeared fatigued on the bench.

Responding to a Legal Times inquiry about the episode late Wednesday, Ginsburg said, through Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg, that she "experienced an eye irritation during oral argument that was probably exacerbated by allergies."

Wednesday was the final day for regularly scheduled oral arguments this term.

Though originally aimed at organized crime, the RICO law was amended by Congress in 1996 to include the hiring of illegal aliens among the "predicate acts" that can trigger a RICO claim. So the employees asserted that Mohawk, by associating with outside recruiters to hire the illegal aliens, fit the requirements to make out a civil RICO claim. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals held that the employees had stated a valid RICO claim. The Bush administration has also sided with the plaintiffs in favor of a broad view of RICO's scope.

Phillips, in a brief for Mohawk, said the circuit's definition of a RICO enterprise "would allow virtually every alleged corporate conspiracy, including most fraud claims and other business torts, to be pled as civil RICO claims."

Breyer appeared to agree, expressing concern that "vast amounts of ordinary activity" by companies would come under the law, even though the companies have nothing to do with organized crime.

Howard Foster of Johnson & Bell in Chicago, representing the plaintiffs, told the Court that Mohawk committed hundreds if not thousands of immigration-related felonies "in very close cooperation" with outside recruiters, all of which are well within the scope of RICO.

Foster also told the justices that all circuit courts that have ruled on the issue have adopted the broader scope of RICO that would include corporations like Mohawk. "There is no dispute in the lower courts that a corporation can be part of an enterprise," said Foster.

Business lawyers warn that if the Court rules against Mohawk, RICO will become another tool for attacking employers. "Employers located in areas with a large immigrant-worker population may be potential targets for civil RICO class actions," says Steptoe & Johnson partner Lynda Zengerle, who recommends that employers use hiring methods that clearly document efforts by companies and their recruiters to abide by immigration laws.

But some business advocates have sounded a broader alarm about the case. "If the Supreme Court sides with the plaintiffs in this case, there is no doubt that we will see many more civil RICO cases filed on a broad range of subject matters, not just immigration," says Karen Hirschman, a partner at Vinson & Elkins.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Republicans Sag In New Poll (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

Rising gas prices have intensified discontent with Washington and handed Congress a frightening midterm election backdrop: a deeply pessimistic electorate, despite a robust economy.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. Fully 77% call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data showed new-home sales and factory orders remain strong. Economists expect a similar message tomorrow when the government reports on first-quarter growth.

Public unease partly reflects fallout from the prolonged and unpopular Iraq war. But it also shows the impact of pump prices topping $3 a gallon in many places, passing Iraq to become the nation's highest-priority issue. The upshot: Two-thirds of Americans say the nation is "off on the wrong track," President Bush's approval rating has fallen to 36% and Congress fares even worse at 22% approval.

"There's almost nothing that the public is satisfied with," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC poll with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. "What they're telling you is, they want change on every front."

That is a worrisome sign for Republicans, who are seeking to defend their House and Senate majorities with little more than six months remaining before Election Day. Continuing a trend that has persisted for a year, Democrats lead -- beyond the poll's 3.1 percentage point margin of error -- in public preference for which party should control Congress. The survey of 1,005 adults was conducted April 21-24.

And in the run-up to November, Democrats also enjoy an edge in intensity; by 11 percentage points, their partisans are more likely to express high interest in the midterm campaigns. The biggest bright spot for Republicans is that Democrats have made no progress improving their national image, an indication that they aren't yet positioned to take advantage of their opportunity for far-reaching November gains.

Public unhappiness with government is strongly at odds with bullishness on Wall Street, as new data underscored the economy's current strength. The Commerce Department yesterday reported sales of new single-family homes rose 13.8% in March, the largest increase in 13 years.

Orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose 6.1% in March, the largest increase in nearly a year. Indeed, that data fueled bond-market worries the economy is so strong that the Fed will be reluctant to stop lifting short-term interest rates after May, when the central bank is expected to bump rates up a notch.

Public unhappiness also represents a powerful source of frustration for Republicans, who want Mr. Bush and Congress to get more credit for the economy. Doing just that is a top priority of new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and congressional Republican leaders, who are aiming to take a first step by accelerating House-Senate negotiations on tax-cut legislation that would extend the current 15% rates on capital gains and dividends.

Yet worries about gasoline prices, offshoring of jobs, rising health-care costs and precarious private pension plans are creating anxiety even among workers who do have jobs. Moreover, the fruits of the economy's recent strength aren't evenly shared: Workers at the bottom and the middle are benefiting less than those at the top.

Richard Curtin, who oversees the University of Michigan's consumer-confidence surveys, says the gap between views of the economy among those who make more than $50,000 and those who make less is wider than it has ever been in the university's polling. Especially for those with moderate incomes, says Mr. Hart, the Journal/NBC pollster, gas prices "are the real numbers that people are living with."

That helps explain why just 19% of Americans say the strong employment picture, rising stock prices and low inflation rate leave them feeling confident about the nation's economic health. Four times that many respondents said that gas prices, rising interest rates and the federal budget deficit have them feeling uneasy.

The poll also explains why oil companies suddenly find themselves in the cross hairs of political debates over potential price-gouging and even windfall-profits taxes. In the wake of record oil-industry profits, some 60% of Americans find oil companies responsible for rising gas prices -- far outpacing the proportion who blame oil-producing nations, President Bush or Congress.

Yet the toll on Mr. Bush is reflected in his 36% approval rating, the lowest he has ever received in the Journal/NBC survey, and the 35% positive mark on handling the economy. Amid continued violence in Iraq and a looming confrontation with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, Americans disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of foreign policy by roughly 2 to 1.

Approval of the job Congress is doing has plummeted to 22%, from 33% just last month. That's worse than the marks a Democratic-controlled Congress received at a similar point in 1994, the year Newt Gingrich led Republicans back to power on Capitol Hill.

In particular, Americans who don't approve of Congress blame their sour mood on partisan contention and gridlock in Washington. Some 44% call themselves "tired of Republicans and Democrats fighting each other"; 36% say "nothing seems to get done" on important issues. A further 34% cite corruption among lawmakers. Among all Americans, a 39% plurality say the single most important thing for Congress to accomplish this year is curtailing budgetary "earmarks" benefiting only certain constituents.

Ranking just behind ending "earmarks" is congressional action on immigration overhaul, the top priority of 32%. By 61%-35%, Americans say illegal immigrants within the U.S. should be allowed to stay rather than be deported so long as they pay taxes and pass security checks. By 68%-28%, they express support for a potential Senate compromise that would allow for different treatment of those who have been in the U.S. at least five years, those here for two to five years, and those in the U.S. for less than two years.

Americans take dim views of both parties, giving Democrats a positive rating of just 33% and Republicans 35%. But they have different expectations for the minority and for the party that controls Congress and the White House. If no progress is made on key issues, the Journal/NBC poll shows, 51% would blame either Mr. Bush or congressional Republicans, compared with 16% who would blame congressional Democrats. One in four voters would blame all parties.

Pain At Pumps May Be Felt At Polls (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla., April 26 -- One of the soaring bridges to the beach here is named for longtime Republican congressman E. Clay Shaw Jr., and at its foot is a gas station where drivers on Wednesday were filling up, wincing at the tally and wondering whom to blame.

Gasoline prices have reached $3 a gallon in the area, and for Shaw, a former mayor and a political institution here, the rising bipartisan disgruntlement at the pumps is a troubling sign. Here and in other swing districts across the country, the Democratic challenger is attacking the Republican incumbent for inaction -- or worse -- on gas prices and other energy woes.

"This is ridiculous," said Jackie Tarone, a retired homemaker and Bush voter who was filling up a Mercedes SL500. "The oil companies keep giving money to the politicians to keep them in there -- that's the way the system works. It's a shame."

Although she has voted for Shaw in the past, she said, she isn't sure about next time.

"I don't know which is the lesser of two evils anymore," she said.

Anger over gas prices is gaining traction in many midterm races around the nation as Democrats attack Republicans for being too close to oil companies. With many in the GOP growing uneasy, President Bush this week called for price-fixing investigations. Political analysts say the rising prices could dovetail with growing public concern over the war in Iraq to give Democrats an opening in several key races.

In Virginia, one of two candidates in the Democratic primary for Senate, Harris Miller, accused Sen. George Allen (R) of siding with oil companies instead of backing legislation to protect consumers. "Looking to George Allen and George Bush to solve the gas crisis is like asking Bonnie and Clyde to solve the crime problem," Miller said.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said in response that Democrats in the Senate had obstructed the passage of an energy bill in Congress for more than five years. He said Allen fought successfully for the bill's passage in 2005. "Had Harris Miller's friends not obstructed that bill for years, we would be a lot closer to energy independence and developing renewable sources of fuel," Wadhams said.

In the Maryland governor's race, incumbent Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) took fire from his Democratic challengers, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan. They accused him of failing consumers by not putting his clout behind anti-gouging legislation that died during the recently concluded legislative session.

Ehrlich dismissed the attacks as "whining" and told reporters he is realistic about his limited ability to exert pressure on gas prices. He did say he is seeking permission to temporarily halt the use of cleaner-burning gas additives in the Washington suburbs and Baltimore area.

In Minnesota, Democratic Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar has stopped at stations to hear from consumers. In Pennsylvania's 6th District, where Democrat Lois Murphy is trying to unseat Rep. Jim Gerlach, Murphy has been swinging through the state all week for rallies at gas stations. In Arizona, Democratic Senate candidate Jim Pederson proposed a tax rebate to families funded by eliminating oil companies' tax breaks.

George Gonzalez, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Miami, said the issue gives the Democrats leverage against Republican incumbents. "It certainly creates a bias against the Republicans," he said.

At the pumps, it was clear that incumbents had something to worry about.

Thomas Fortino said of Shaw: "I voted for him before, but now I want change -- but not just because of gas prices." The retired picture-framing-store owner was filling up in Fort Lauderdale.

Florida's 22nd District stretches across coastal communities from Fort Lauderdale through Boca Raton and Palm Beach. Shaw is being challenged by state Sen. Ron Klein, who is well financed and also focused now on energy issues.

This week, Klein proposed suspending Florida's sales tax on gasoline during August, noting that "there is a lot of frustration out there -- Congress has done nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0026752

In criticizing Shaw for "generally voting with the Republican leadership to prop up the oil companies," he echoed other Democratic candidates whose national leaders have advised them to depict the problem, at least partly, as a product of Republican coziness with the oil industry. At least among motorists filling up here, suspicion regarding the oil companies was rife, with several citing the record profits recorded by Exxon Mobil Corp.

"I'm boycotting Exxon Mobil right now," said Deborah Shuart, a 53-year-old Republican who was putting $41.70 worth of gas into her car. The entrepreneur said her family of five is considering carpooling for the first time. "It's been tough."

Shaw said he anticipates being the target of some of the anger.

In a letter to constituents who ask about the issue, Shaw reminds them that he voted in favor of a measure to increase fuel-efficiency standards, which failed. In August, he sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, calling for scrutiny of potential profiteering and price gouging.

Noting that any "challenger will blame the incumbent" for the economic situation, he said he expects that gas prices, if they continue to rise, "will have some effect" on the election.

At the pumps here, the oil companies may have been the most commonly cited target of consumer ire, but not the only one.

Many said they blamed the government and car manufacturers for failing to develop alternative sources of energy -- particularly after the oil crisis in the 1970s.

"The government is definitely to blame for making oil our number one energy source," said Inna Shapovalov, 35, an immigration lawyer who was putting $35 into her Hyundai Santa Fe. "I wish we could all drive electric cars."

In a district that contains some of the most affluent portions of the state and large numbers of gas-guzzling luxury vehicles, none blamed motorists themselves for buying cars that use so much gas. National figures show that though the average vehicle mileage improved dramatically through much of the '80s, it has since dipped or held constant.

John Holzberg, 64, a Republican banker from Boca Raton, put gas into a Cadillac and cursed when the total of $43 came into view.

"I can't seem to figure out who's responsible," said Holzberg, who "doesn't like George Bush anymore." But he was sure it was making the electorate grumpy. "The economy is humming along, but nobody cares because everyone is focused -- like I am -- on Iraq and oil prices."

Bush To Meet Big 3 For Talks On Fuel Issues And Pensions (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

DEARBORN, Mich., April 26 — President Bush, who touched a nerve this year when he told Detroit carmakers to build "relevant" vehicles, will meet with the companies' leaders next month, William Clay Ford Jr., the chief executive of Ford Motor, said Wednesday.

People involved in planning the meeting, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the high level of the talks, said it would focus on three areas: energy and the environment; costs like pensions and health care premiums that add hundreds of dollars to the price of a Detroit car; and how currency issues affect the Japanese automakers.

The meeting is expected to take place on May 18 at the White House. It would be the first time during his presidency that Mr. Bush has met collectively with Mr. Ford, Rick Wagoner of General Motors and Thomas W. LaSorda of Chrysler.

A White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said she could not confirm or deny that the meeting would take place, adding that Mr. Bush's schedule was generally not final that far in advance. Officials at G.M. and Chrysler, a unit of DaimlerChrysler, declined comment.

Toyota Motor, which ranks fourth in American sales behind Chrysler, and which is considering sites for its eighth North American assembly plant, said it was not invited.

Mr. Ford, who is known for his interest in the environment, said in an interview that he wanted to use the meeting to lobby the government to finance a national delivery system for ethanol, the grain alcohol fuel made from corn.

Together, the three companies have sold millions of flexible-fuel vehicles, which can run on either gasoline or a gasoline-ethanol mixture.

G.M. has introduced a campaign to promote the use of E85, a mixture of 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline, blanketing billboards and the sides of buses with the slogan, "Live green, go yellow."

But Mr. Ford said many of the 1.5 million buyers who own Ford's flexible-fuel vehicles either do not know they are able to run on both fuels, or are unable to find ethanol-based fuel that could help lessen the country's dependence on oil.

"If the goal is to drive ethanol, you have to have it priced attractively," Mr. Ford said. That is a problem because the United States has only 600 stations that dispense ethanol-based fuel, versus about 176,000 gasoline stations. Still, the number of ethanol stations doubled last year and should grow further because of tax credits passed by Congress last year that are meant to promote the installation of E85 pumps.

The discussion over ethanol comes amid rising gasoline prices, which threaten to hurt recovery efforts at Ford and G.M. Each lost market share and billions of dollars in North America last year, while Chrysler gained market share and made money.

Together, G.M. and Ford have announced plans to cut 60,000 jobs and close more than two dozen plants through 2012.

After Ford announced its cutbacks in January, Mr. Bush said the solution to reversing the automakers' problems lay in developing "a product that's relevant." Rather than having the government bail them out, as Congress did in 1979 to save Chrysler from bankruptcy, "I think it's very important that the market should function," Mr. Bush added.

Robert A. Lutz, the vice chairman of G.M., who is known for his candor, criticized Mr. Bush's comments this month. Speaking in New York, Mr. Lutz said: "I'm a lifelong Republican, by the way, but next time around, Hillary, here I come. I'm a protest vote."

Mr. Ford said the discussion of a bailout would not be on the agenda for the meeting with Mr. Bush, whose former chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., served as G.M.'s lobbyist before joining the White House.

Although this would be their first collective session with Mr. Bush, the three Detroit chief executives held two high-profile meetings with President Clinton. The first, in early 1993, took place in Little Rock, Ark., shortly before Mr. Clinton was inaugurated, in what was seen as an unusual show of support for an industry.

The second, in May of that year, provided an opportunity for the companies to show off their cars. They lined up 120 automobiles in an event called "Drive American Quality." Mr. Clinton, a car buff, strolled among the gleaming vehicles, stroking the side panels of some and gazing avidly at others. There are no plans for any kind of auto show this time, officials at the companies said.

Warming Up To Nuclear Power (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Twenty years ago yesterday, at 5 in the morning in Moscow, Mikhail Gorbachev got a phone call telling him that there had been an accident followed by a fire in the fourth block of the Chernobyl nuclear power plant. "I was astounded: How was such a thing possible?" Gorbachev said in an interview published earlier this year. "Nuclear scientists had always assured the country's leadership that our nuclear reactors were completely safe."

For years the nuclear industry has lived in the shadow of Chernobyl, which discouraged many nations from pushing ahead with nuclear power plants. A referendum in Italy banned plants shortly after the accident. Sweden, which first reported that something had happened in the former Soviet Union after sensors at its own nuclear plants detected elevated radiation levels, said it would close down the ones it had. In the United States, the Soviet reactor accident compounded questions over safety issues. Since the incident at the Three Mile Island plant in Pennsylvania in 1979, there has not been a single new order for the construction of a U.S. nuclear plant.

But now the Bush administration is pushing for a revival of nuclear power both abroad and in the United States, saying it wants to promote a domestic unlimited energy source. The Bush-backed Energy Policy Act of 2005 included a bevy of incentives for domestic nuclear power, and the administration has laid aside nuclear-proliferation issues to urge India to build nuclear power plants.

"What I view myself as is the chief salesman for nuclear energy," said Dennis Spurgeon, the new assistant secretary for nuclear energy at the Energy Department and the first person to hold that job in a decade. Spurgeon, who most recently was the chief operating officer of Bethesda-based USEC Inc., an international supplier of enriched uranium for nuclear plants, said, "There's a great story to tell."

Spurgeon said getting a new U.S. nuclear plant built is his "number one priority." But at an initial cost of $1.5 billion to $2 billion for a 1,000-megawatt plant, and with uncertainty about costs linked to nuclear waste that lasts for centuries, most companies remain cautious. Critics of nuclear power say that plants would cost even more without government subsidies and that, in an age of terrorism, they carry grave security risks.

Nuclear power fans have gotten unexpected support from a handful of prominent environmentalists who are more worried about global warming than nuclear accidents or waste disposal. While Greenpeace says that "safe nuclear power is a myth," the organization's founder, Patrick Moore, riled the environmental community by declaring, "Nuclear energy is the only large-scale, cost-effective energy source that can reduce these emissions while continuing to satisfy a growing demand for power. And these days it can do so safely."

Many environmentalists still disagree. "Nuclear power would be a great solution to greenhouse gases but for the four problems that have been mentioned: It's uneconomical, it has a safety problem, it has a horrendous proliferation problem on the global level, and it has a long-term waste problem that hasn't been solved," Thomas Cochran, a nuclear policy expert at the Natural Resources Defense Council, said at a meeting last fall.

But electric power companies aren't going to make big nuclear investments out of concern for the environment. Companies have been encouraged recently by the high price of natural gas and the rising cost of coal, nuclear power's biggest (and cheaper) competitor in the electricity business. If a new system of penalties and credits tied to carbon emissions takes hold, that could further raise the cost of using coal. There are 10 U.S. nuclear projects under consideration, but no company has applied yet for construction or operating licenses or decided to move ahead.

To nudge them along, the Energy Policy Act provides $1.6 billion of spending on research and infrastructure, tax credits of 1.8 cents per kilowatt-hour for eight years, protection against the risks of regulatory delay for six new plants, and $1.25 billion to fund a prototype for a new generation of nuclear plants. It also plans a pilot project to use nuclear power to produce hydrogen for cars that can burn it.

Realizing that waste disposal is a key financial issue, the Energy Department is also looking for ways to cut those costs. The administration continues to push the idea of a giant disposal site at Yucca Mountain in Nevada, and some preparations have been made there. But a coalition of environmentalists, Nevada residents, agencies and nuclear waste experts are still challenging the project. Nuclear power supporters say that new reprocessing technologies could reduce the size of the waste problem by reusing some parts of the spent fuel.

Another lure for companies looking at nuclear power: Companies that gambled on nuclear plants that no one wanted just five to seven years ago are making good profit on those plants now.

Take Constellation Energy Group, the parent of Baltimore Gas and Electric. Constellation took control of the Calvert Cliffs, Md., nuclear plant from BGE at a time when the value of the plant was thought to be a fraction of its book market value. That assessment was an important part of rate negotiations in 1999, and state officials and consumer groups balked at the chance to have a new assessment done in 2001, for fear that the nuclear plant would fail to get relicensed, be worth even less or require unforeseen repairs.

Today, power generation at Calvert Cliffs looks relatively cheap. After investing substantially in the plant, Constellation is running it much more efficiently than BGE did. With deregulation of prices, Constellation should earn more. The company's acquisition of two other nuclear plants also looks smart today.

Nationwide the story is similar. The 103 U.S. nuclear plants run at around 90.5 percent of capacity, up from 56.3 percent in 1979, according to the Nuclear Energy Institute. They account for 20 percent of the nation's electricity. (Their output has kept pace with growing U.S. demand. So has coal-fired electricity, while hydropower hasn't kept pace and oil is rarely used.)

But taking over an existing plant is better business than building one from scratch, many say.

That has been less of a problem in other countries. There are more than 30 nuclear plants under construction around the world. China, which has nine plants, might build as many as 30 more over the next 15 years.

Countries with existing nuclear plants have done little to pare them back. France gets three-quarters of its electricity from its 56 nuclear plants and emits much lower quantities of greenhouse gases than the United States. Even Sweden, which planned to shut down all of its reactors after Chernobyl, has shut down only one. Russia hasn't needed any new plants; its economy contracted after the Soviet Union collapsed and it has plentiful coal, oil and natural gas reserves.

The biggest costs of Chernobyl came in Ukraine, where the reactor was, and neighboring Belarus. Both have borne costs for treating illnesses, decontaminating the plant and surrounding towns and resettling people, in addition to losing industrial output. The International Atomic Energy Agency says that Belarus alone spent $13 billion dealing with the aftermath of Chernobyl from 1991 to 2003. The toll in lives, while hard to measure, has been big, too. The IAEA estimates the accident will have caused 4,000 deaths from radiation and radiation-induced cancers when all is said and done. Greenpeace puts the number closer to 200,000, and there are others in between.

Many nuclear defenders say that such a disaster couldn't happen again, blaming the Soviet reactor model and pointing to more recent improvements in reactor designs.

"People say reactors can't blow up, but Chernobyl blew up," said Victor Gilinsky, a consultant who served on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission from 1975 to 1984. "It was a real explosion." He said people were "too quick" to blame Soviet design and procedures. "There's a tremendous worldwide PR campaign" for new nuclear power plants, he said, "but I guess the acid test will be whether electric companies buy them or not. We can only wait and see."

Phony War On Gas (WP)

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

NO DOUBT IT makes everyone feel better when the president states his concern for Americans, who are now paying more than $3 a gallon for gasoline. Unfortunately, the measures President Bush chose to announce this week to combat high prices are either meaningless or possibly dangerous in the long run, even if they do offer a bit of temporary relief. For example, just talking publicly about "price gouging" can spook gasoline providers into slightly lowering prices. And maybe it's useful to inspire state officials to start looking harder for crooks, given that price gouging is defined at the state level, not by the federal government. But in the long term, such talk encourages the public to believe that evil price gougers are responsible for higher pump prices, when the real culprits are global economic growth, increased demand and Americans' own large cars.

The president's other tactics seem no less dubious. Stopping the filling of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve won't increase supply by much, and it sets a bad precedent: The reserve, after all, is meant for national emergencies, which this is not. Temporarily waiving fuel blend or environmental requirements could help with spot shortages in a few places but won't have much effect on the long-term price. Calling for the construction of more refineries is unnecessary. Although the president is right to state that "there hasn't been a new refinery built in 30 years," it is also true that the oil companies have expanded refineries every year since 1996 and are expected to continue doing so through 2025, according to Energy Department statistics.

The president has, of course, had plenty of opportunities over the past five years to shape a more rational energy policy, one that would have provided incentives to move away from oil and toward other energy sources. He could have lobbied harder to remove the oil industry tax benefits from the energy bill he signed. He could have insisted that Congress add more tax breaks for hybrid cars, as he now says he wishes it had done. He could lift the tariffs on Brazilian ethanol, which would help address some of the ethanol shortages across the country. He could have endorsed a tax on oil and coal, which of course would not lower the price of gasoline but would, again, begin to reduce demand while encouraging investment in new technologies.

And he could have used his statutory authority to raise automobile fuel economy standards or persuaded Congress to find other ways to improve mileage per gallon of U.S. vehicles. Again, if he were completely honest, the president would tell Americans that the main reason fuel prices are higher in this country is because demand is growing -- and one reason for growing demand is that people drive inefficient cars. They drive inefficient cars because public policy, long shaped by the president and by Congress, has made it advantageous to do so. Until that changes, little else will.

39 Million Reasons Why $3 Gas May Change America (USAT)

USA Today, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026756

Just how big a deal is $3 gasoline? For those with six-figure household incomes it's an annoyance, but little more. Evian spring water goes about $6.80 a gallon when purchased in one-liter bottles.

For those in the tap-water brackets, the situation is a bit different. For many of the 39 million households making less than $30,000 a year, the difference between $2 gas and $3 gas is the difference between spending 10% of income on gas and 15%. In a word: Ouch!

It's hardly surprising, then, that politicians from President Bush on down to local legislators are popping up with quick-fix proposals. Bush's plan to suspend deposits into the National Petroleum Reserve and to push for more lenient pollution standards would have little impact. Just as useless are calls for a tax on oil company profits and the partisanfinger-pointing of many in Congress.

It's easy to chalk this up as the inevitable political posturing that follows economic stress. But it is also perhaps the most visible measure of the inability of the nation's leaders to speak the truth about long-term problems — Social Security, health care and runaway spending to name three others. Today's high oil prices are the result of a quarter-century of low prices coupled with robust worldwide growth and instability in the world's oil-producing regions. Any meaningful energy polices will take years to unfold.

If all the posturing seems inevitable, it is because the truth — that everyone will need to adjust to a new reality — is politically unpalatable. But people will learn that truth anyway, and perhaps what follows can give rise to leaders with a longer vision. Or, in a darker view, to a more ominous national division.

In a society with acute differences of wealth, it's not hard to see other economic developments becoming political flashpoints. The surging cost of health care — and its unavailability to many — could easily trigger a hostile class fight. In many areas, housing costs are creating a wealth divide between those who own and those who can no longer afford to buy in. And, in the long run, the unsustainable amounts of money the government spends on retirees could trigger more generational resentment than sound policy discussion could.

Demagogic politics go hand-in-hand with class division. And those divisions are bad and getting worse. According to a Federal Reserve study last month, the 56 million households that make up the bottom half of the economic ladder owns just 2.6% of the nation's wealth. That's down from 3.6% a decade ago. The top 10%, meanwhile, accounts for almost 70% of the wealth.

That will likely fuel contentious debates for many years to come. You can hear the shouts beginning when people pay $3 a gallon at the pump.

Snow Seen As Key To Improved Press Ties (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday named Fox News host Tony Snow as his new White House press secretary, a move geared toward shoring up relations with the Washington press corps and breathing new life into a sixth-year administration that is dropping in the polls.

Mr. Snow, 50, a journalist, writer and political pundit who was the editorial page editor of The Washington Times during the administration of the president's father, took the job after insisting that he be not just a spokesman, but a participant in administration policy debates.

Yet Mr. Bush, in introducing Mr. Snow to reporters gathered in the White House briefing room yesterday, made clear the chain of command.

"My job is to make decisions, and his job is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people," the president said, with a smiling Mr. Snow next to him.

Mr. Snow displayed his knack for ad-libbing -- a trait not often exhibited by his predecessor, Scott McClellan -- by speaking after the president without a prepared speech or notes.

DOJ_NMG_0026757

"One of the things I want to do is just make it clear that ... one of the reasons I took the job is not only because I believe in the president, [but] because, believe it or not, I want to work with you," he said to mild laughter from the reporters who will badger him daily for information.

"These are times that are going to be very challenging. We've got a lot of big issues ahead, and we've got a lot of important things that all of us are going to be covering together. ... I want to thank you, Mr. President, for the honor, and thank all you guys for your forbearance."

Although Mr. Snow was widely speculated to be the choice for more than a week -- he is a longtime friend of new Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten -- his decision to take the post was delayed briefly by health concerns. He had his colon removed last year and underwent six months of chemotherapy. But he had a CT scan last week and has a clean bill of health.

Mr. Snow is well-regarded among reporters in Washington, having worked in newspapers, television and radio. He has criticized the Bush administration as a political commentator and nationally syndicated columnist, which prompted the president to offer a humorous read.

"For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Mr. Bush said. "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' "

In a jab at reporters, Mr. Bush joked, "Tony already knows most of you, and he's agreed to take the job anyway."

Democrats immediately deluged White House reporters with e-mails cataloging some of what Mr. Snow has said about the Bush administration. In one, Democrats cited a Nov. 11 column after Democratic electoral gains in which he wrote that "George Bush has become something of an embarrassment."

In a piece from September, Mr. Snow said, "No president has looked this impotent this long when it comes to defending presidential powers."

Other e-mails fired out to reporters by Democrats cited columns in which the new spokesman said "racism isn't that big a deal anymore" and called the theory of evolution "pure hypothesis."

Although the newly named spokesman did not explain his earlier criticisms yesterday, one former administration official said he expects Mr. Snow to lay down a marker the first day he takes the podium.

"I expect he will say that he will not talk about his opinion -- or prior opinion -- because he is now the president's spokesman. If he sticks to that, the issue will disappear fairly quickly," the former aide said.

Mr. Snow will start May 8, but said yesterday that he won't conduct his first briefing until later that week to give him time to learn the job.

"You know how to talk, but you don't know how to brief. You've got to learn this stuff," he told reporters yesterday morning as he walked through the briefing room to introduce himself. He apologized to several reporters whose phone calls and e-mails he had not returned as he pondered whether to take the job. Mr. Snow demurred when asked how he will be different from Mr. McClellan.

"Just watch and see. I hate to be coy about it, but I'm going to be coy," he said.

"You're not coming here to drink the Kool-Aid; you're coming here to serve the president," he said.

White House Hopes Snow Will Aid Media Ties (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP2, April 26, 2006

President Bush gave his presidency a facelift Wednesday, tapping a smooth-talking, telegenic conservative commentator as the new White House press secretary.

The appointment of Fox News pundit Tony Snow as Bush's third chief spokesman was intended in part to help improve the White House's frayed relationship with the press corps. Bush paired the announcement of his choice with some friendly jabs at reporters, and a serving of respect for their craft.

"Tony already knows most of you, and he's agreed to take the job anyway," the president said, Snow laughing at his side in the briefing room where he will start holding court in about two weeks. "He understands like I understand that the press is vital to our democracy."

Snow, a 50-year-old Ohio native, plans to take over from current press secretary Scott McClellan the week of May 8. He will hold off conducting the daily press briefings for several days while the two overlap.

The choice of Snow was also part of a White House effort — under the leadership of new chief of staff Joshua Bolten and with Bush at his lowest-ever approval ratings — to reach out to conservatives who made up the base of support for Bush's two presidential victories but have been disaffected by government spending and other issues.

Democrats, though, seized on remarks and writings Snow has produced in nearly 25 years in the media that have been critical of Bush, and often provocative. Snow held several print journalism positions, mostly working for newspaper opinion pages, and lately has been the host of the "Tony Snow Show" on Fox News Radio and "Weekend Live with Tony Snow" on the Fox News Channel.

Though usually aggressively supportive of the president as a GOP pundit, Snow has also shown a confrontational side. In a syndicated column, for instance, Snow has called the president "something of an embarrassment," a leader who has "lost control of the federal budget," the architect of a "listless domestic policy" and a man who has "a habit of singing from the political correctness hymnal."

The Democratic National Committee said Snow's appointment shows "truth still snowed in" in the Bush administration.

The White House — led by Bush — said Snow's candor and colorful talk will be an asset, not a liability.

"I asked him about those comments, and he said, `You should have heard what I said about the other guy,'" the president said. "I like his perspective, I like the perspective he brings to this job, and I think you're going to like it, too."

Snow, who took a hiatus from the media in the late 1990s to work in the White House under Bush's father as a speechwriting director and spokesman for regional issues, spoke only briefly. Neither he nor Bush took questions, though he later told The Associated Press he hasn't yet determined what changes would make the White House press operation work better. "I'm still trying to figure it out," he said.

Snow had been openly interested in acquiring a role in developing White House policy — not just talking about it. But Wednesday, he told Fox News Channel, his soon-to-be ex-employer, that "I'm just going to have to wait and see" whether that will come to pass.

Earlier, to reporters in the briefing room, Snow said: "Believe it or not, I want to work with you. ... We've got a lot of big issues ahead and we've got a lot of important things that all of us are going to be covering together."

Snow had delayed a decision about taking the job to consult with his family — he and his wife have three young children — and his doctors — he had his colon removed last year and underwent six months of chemotherapy after being diagnosed with cancer. But his detailed on-air deliberations over recent days raised eyebrows among White House staff who are normally tightlipped and loath to run afoul of Bush's dislike for any public airing of internal thinking.

Bush seemed unaffected. He concluded his introduction of Snow by calling him "buddy."

Bush Selects Outspoken Outsider To Serve As New Spokesman (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush reached outside his inner circle Wednesday for the first time in his staff shakeup, naming a new White House spokesman who recently called the president "something of an embarrassment."

The selection of Tony Snow, a conservative Fox News commentator, broke Bush's pattern of filling top jobs with trusted loyalists. As the public face of the administration, Snow will take a leading role in White House efforts to reverse Bush's slide in the polls.

The job will give Snow a chance to put into practice his advice that Bush should be much more aggressive in confronting his critics. His appointment pleased Republicans who share that view, but skeptics questioned Snow's ability to influence an organization known for buttoned-down discipline and devotion to the president.

Bush said he was well aware of Snow's past criticism and welcomed his willingness to speak out.

DOJ_NMG_0026759

"He's not afraid to express his own opinions," he said in introducing Snow to reporters at the White House. "He sometimes has disagreed with me. I asked him about those comments, and he said, `You should have heard what I said about the other guy.'"

Snow, 50, acknowledged that he'd have to show more deference to the president in his new job, but he said he would continue to make his views known in internal policy debates.

"They want people to express their opinions. You're not coming here to drink the Kool-Aid. You're coming here to serve the president," he said.

Snow's genial personality masks a fighter's instinct. He's repeatedly chided Bush for straying from conservative orthodoxy. His criticism of Bush, delivered in the tone of a friend, is mild compared with his disdain for Democrats.

"A party that projects confidence and good cheer will thrash a Chicken Little party any day," he wrote in a column last November that urged Bush to "stop cowering under the bed." Snow said Bush had become an embarrassment by losing his "swagger factor."

Snow will take on one of the toughest jobs in Washington when Bush's popularity is at the lowest point of his presidency. Paul Levinson, chairman of the department of communication and media studies at Fordham University in New York, said Snow's ability to influence public opinion is limited by the facts he has to deal with.

"You can only spin so much. In the end, people see the reality behind the presentation," Levinson said. "It doesn't matter what a press secretary says if you're paying $3.50 at the (gasoline) pump."

Snow, who won't take over from current White House spokesman Scott McClellan until early next month, survived a cancer scare last year that resulted in the removal of his colon. His doctors have declared him cancer free.

He comes to the White House with extensive journalistic experience as a conservative editorialist for newspapers and Fox News, which sets him apart from other recent presidential press secretaries. Having earned a national reputation on his own may free him to speak up in ways beyond that of McClellan, who owed his career to Bush.

Snow is the first working journalist to take the job since Ron Nessen left NBC to work for President Gerald Ford in 1974. Nessen replaced another journalist, Jerald terHorst, who resigned after a month to protest Ford's decision to pardon former President Richard Nixon.

A colorful personality, Snow is also an avid musician. He plays the flute, saxophone and guitar for Beats Workin', a rock band that specializes in songs from the `60s, `70s and `80s.

Some of Snow's associates at Fox wondered whether he'd be able to maintain his independent streak in his new job.

"You can go in there with the idea that you're going to be an aggressive and effective advocate of the policies of the president of the United States, or you can go in there with the attitude that you want to be the honest broker between the news media and the White House," Fox colleague Brit Hume said. "It's a good question as to whether this will work."

Bush Hires A Loyal Critic As Spokesman (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — In formally naming the Fox News commentator Tony Snow to be his press secretary on Wednesday, President Bush completed a decade-long transformation of the role of the presidential spokesman from behind-the-scenes functionary to daily on-camera personality.

Mr. Snow is something the White House briefing room has not yet had at the lectern: a star of the opinionated cable news era. But he is also something Mr. Bush has never had: a free-wheeling outsider in a very public position, and one with a history of sharing critical opinions of the president.

While making the much anticipated announcement that Mr. Snow would be his spokesman, Mr. Bush acknowledged that "he sometimes has disagreed with me," a reference to recent columns Mr. Snow has written calling Mr. Bush's domestic policy "lackluster" and the president "something of an embarrassment" to his conservative backers.

"I asked him about those comments," Mr. Bush said in the White House briefing room, "and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' "

Even as Democratic groups sent out e-mail messages highlighting some of Mr. Snow's harsher analyses of the president, they said it should not mask his loyalty to his party and his new boss.

The groups were also quick to note Mr. Snow's connection to the Fox News Channel, which is where administration officials tend to show up for interviews in times of trouble, as Vice President Dick Cheney did after he accidentally shot a hunting partner last winter.

Mr. Snow's career change also might not be what Fox News executives want in terms of their public relations defense against criticism that their network is philosophically sympathetic to Mr. Bush. As Karen Finney, the Democratic National Committee spokeswoman, put it Wednesday, "To our mind he is just moving from one part of the conservative infrastructure to another."

Fox executives have dismissed such statements as partisan sniping at the network's conservative opinion makers — Mr. Snow among them — who operate separately from its news division.

But allies of the president said Mr. Snow's criticism and his Fox News commentator stripes provided Mr. Bush with the total package he needed as the administration's public face. Mr. Bush's new chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, hired Mr. Snow as part of the White House shake-up.

"Yeah, he's a conservative commentator journalist; that makes sense if he's reflecting a conservative president," said Mark McKinnon, the president's campaign media consultant.

But, citing Mr. Snow's critical columns, Mr. McKinnon said: "Tony has huge street cred. It gives him credibility, and that's the most important thing for a press secretary."

Mr. Snow's appointment has been described by Democrats and Republicans as an acknowledgment by the White House that it needs, among other things, a whole new approach to dealing with the national press corps after years of trying to keep it at a distance.

As White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, Mr. Snow's predecessor, stuck to a careful script, a style that the White House initially wanted and that seemed to serve its ends through much of a war and a winning re-election campaign.

The president and Mr. Snow seemed to acknowledge Wednesday that with the president's opinion ratings at all-time lows, and with Democrats daily questioning his credibility, the White House could use, if not a new message, at least a new messenger with a bolder, flashier style.

White House officials also said Mr. Snow had been given leeway to be looser and to make more of a show of the daily news briefings, while trying to make nice to a press corps that has grown increasingly assertive as Mr. Bush's political strength has ebbed.

"He understands like I understand that the press is vital to our democracy," said Mr. Bush, who did not, however, take questions. "He's going to work hard to provide you with timely information about my philosophy, my priorities, and the actions we're taking to implement our agenda."

DOJ_NMG_0026761

Mr. Snow toured the White House briefing room after the announcement, and told reporters that he looked forward to sitting down with them "to figure out what you think we can do better."

"One of the reasons I took the job," he told them, "is not only because I believe in the president, but because, believe it or not, I want to work with you."

If anything, Mr. Snow embraced his recent criticism of the White House, which has boiled down to the idea that Mr. Bush is a great leader who is not living up to his potential, as a net positive.

"You're not coming in here to drink the Kool-Aid; you're coming here to serve the president," Mr. Snow said. "At this particular juncture, I think what you want is as much honest counsel as you can get."

Kenneth M. Duberstein, who served as chief of staff in the Reagan White House, said he believed that Mr. Snow would keep an outsider perspective that the president could use these days.

"He may bring a new sense of how things stand on the ground outside the grounds at the White House," Mr. Duberstein said, "And that's an important addition."

But Democrats and Republicans agreed that far more important than how the White House communicated was what it said as the president tried to salvage his second term agenda.

Snow Pick May Signal Less Insular White House (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

President Bush's decision to hire conservative commentator Tony Snow as his chief spokesman reflects a consensus among the president and his top advisers that his White House operation has been too insular and needs to be more aggressive in engaging with the news media and other Washington constituencies, according to Bush aides and outside advisers.

Snow, who in his roles as a pundit on Fox News and elsewhere has rapped Bush on several occasions, joined the White House only after extracting a promise that he would become an adviser to the president on day-to-day strategy. If Bush and his team follow through on that commitment, the former columnist will be the first outsider to become part of Bush's revamped inner circle.

"We want fresh thinking, to charge the batteries, and passionate participation," said Dan Bartlett, a top Bush adviser. "There is a lot of value added in Tony coming on board and helping us internally with his own views and ideas. It fits into the mold."

Bush aides said at least one more well-known Republican will join the White House as early as next week as part of a shake-up also aimed at improving the president's lower-than-ever approval ratings and limiting GOP losses in congressional elections this fall.

The emerging team -- which includes Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, budget chief Rob Portman and now Snow -- has the task of salvaging Bush's floundering second-term agenda and repairing relations with Congress, the media and an increasingly skeptical public. But it is unclear whether Bush, who has resisted change and outside advice in the past, will adjust his style and policies enough to satisfy Republicans on Capitol Hill who have said his White House operation needs a major overhaul.

White House aides are hoping Bush will get what they call the "Bolten bounce" in light of recent political progress in Iraq, his new plan to hold down gasoline prices and progress on an overhaul of immigration laws. Even the Snow news, however, served as a metaphor for the long roster of Bush's troubles: A few hours after the president hoped to make a splash by announcing the new hire, sources close to Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove leaked word that Rove would testify again in the CIA leak case.

White House aides said there is now broad agreement that the first-term strategy of largely ignoring the mainstream Washington media was a mistake. At the beginning, the Bush White House pioneered a strategy of circumventing Washington and communicating directly with what it considered more friendly regional and local media outlets and niche publications that served as a pipeline to supporters. The strategy worked well for a long while, but aides said it eventually undercut their credibility with reporters and impeded the administration's ability to receive fair treatment from the media when Bush's popularity began to fade.

Mark McKinnon, a Bush political adviser, predicted that Snow's long experience in Washington would give him more credibility with the White House press corps.

A variety of Bush advisers suggested that the president is not interested in altering his major decisions or philosophy, but that he recognizes he needs to do a better job communicating in Washington and beyond.

"The president's message and vision are firmly in place and are not going to change," McKinnon said. "But it still helps to have a new messenger. It helps to wipe the slate clean."

Snow, 50, worked most recently as a commentator for Fox News and as host of his own radio talk show. He was a director of speechwriting for President George H.W. Bush and has worked as a USA Today columnist, editorial page editor of the Washington Times, deputy editorial page editor of the Detroit News and frequent substitute for radio host Rush Limbaugh.

Snow is an outspoken Republican, but he has not hesitated to pound Bush in writing and on air for his handling of the budget, as well as immigration and other domestic policies. He even poked fun at Bush's speaking style, saying in 2000 that he sometimes sounds like "a soul tortured with Tourette's."

Bush said Snow's selection is proof that he is open to dissenting opinions. "For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Bush said. "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' " Snow's first assignment will be to improve relations with the media, which have deteriorated over the past five years during disputes over access to Bush and senior officials and the accuracy of information released from the White House. Many reporters viewed outgoing White House press secretary Scott McClellan as out of the loop on many of the big policy and political debates.

"I know there is a perception that we disdain the media as a whole," Bartlett said. "I do not believe that. There have been some issues that strained the relationship, particularly when it comes at a time of war." He said the Snow pick was part of an effort to "improve our relationship with the press."

Snow will begin working at the White House on Monday and will hold his first on-air news conference by the end of next week or the following Monday. Bush hopes Snow can do for media relations what he anticipates Portman will do for congressional relations. Portman, a former GOP House leader who has close ties to many senior members, will be responsible for not only overseeing the budget but also providing insight into winning over lawmakers and better navigating Congress.

"Tony Snow should provide a smooth presence at the podium," said Martha Joynt Kumar, a Towson University professor who studies presidential communication. "But the problems that presidents have are political problems and policy problems, not press problems. But it is often the press problems that get addressed."

Analysis: Bush's New Effort, Old Problems (AP)

By Ron Fournier

The Associated Press, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - A new press secretary for the White House. A new leader for Iraq. A new ray of hope for immigration overhaul. New promises to curb gasoline prices.

Same old problems for President Bush.

He's getting credit for trying to save his ailing presidency. But is it beyond the point of political recovery?

"It takes a lot more than one day of good news or two days of good news to turn polls around," says Charles Franklin, political science professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. "It doesn't take much bad news to keep the polls down. You keeping getting hit."

And that is the rub for Bush. For every good piece of news that comes his way or is generated by his actions, there is a fresh reminder of how tough it will be to rehabilitate his presidency.

Naming conservative commentator Tony Snow as White House press secretary puts a fresh face on the administration and may help mend relations with the Washington press corps. But the move underscores how far Bush has fallen in the eyes of his allies - conservative leaders and voters who helped elect him in 2000 and re-elect him in 2004.

As a GOP pundit, Snow called the president "something of an embarrassment," a leader who has "lost control of the federal budget," the architect of a "listless domestic policy."

DOJ_NMG_0026763

With friends like that, Bush hardly needs the Democrats to carp about him.

On Iraq, his signature issue, Bush had reason to crow when the nation's parliament elected a top national leadership, ending months of political deadlock. It was a step, if a small one, toward Bush's goal of easing U.S. troops out of Iraq as the nation matures politically.

But the killing continues in Iraq, and al-Qaida's Abu Musab al-Zarqawi released a video Tuesday that dismissed the new Iraqi government as an American "stooge" and a "poisoned dagger" in the heart of the Muslim world.

He warned of more attacks to come.

Polls suggest the war in Iraq is the biggest drag on Bush's approval ratings, undermining voters' views of his credibility, competence and leadership skills - all traits that were key to his 2004 re-election campaign against Democrat John Kerry.

Republican strategist Rich Galen said he thinks Bush may be turning his presidency around by working harder to connect with voters and lawmakers.

"They got into a mind-set that they were so right on Iraq - and I agree with them on Iraq, by the way - that they didn't have to explain themselves," Galen said.

Soaring gasoline prices have emerged as another political problem for Bush and his party. He moved to show voters he understood their plight, announcing several initiatives Tuesday aimed at curbing the high price of filling up.

But energy is another issue that is substantially out of the president's control. Bush conceded his plan would do little to curb costs this summer.

He seemed to make headway Tuesday on another tough issue by convening a bipartisan meeting on immigration. After the president urged senators to approve stalled legislation giving illegal immigrants a path toward citizenship, Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy compared Bush's role to President Lyndon Johnson stepping into the 1964 stalemate over civil rights legislation.

But immigration legislation is fraught with political problems, and an endorsement from Kennedy is the last thing Bush needs to keep hard-line conservatives in line. Many conservatives already oppose what they say is a promise of amnesty in the Senate bill backed by Bush and Kennedy.

Bush cannot rebound politically without regaining the faith of conservative voters whose support has waned in recent months.

If conservatives are too frustrated to vote on Election Day, Republicans could lose control of Congress, and the final two years of Bush's presidency could be filled with Democratic-led investigations.

Bush and his chief strategist, Karl Rove, believe the key to reviving the conservative voting bloc is to pass a budget with serious spending restraints, give voice to cultural issues such as abortion and stem cell research and push to make his tax cuts permanent. That is their midterm playbook.

Bush promised this week to veto a Senate spending bill unless the price tag was cut. That should be welcome news to conservative voters who bristle at runaway government spending in GOP-controlled Washington.

Still, so much is out of Bush's control - Iraq, gas prices and even Rove.

Just as Snow put a new face on the presidency, word came that Bush's adviser would testify for a fifth time before a grand jury investigating the leak of a CIA officer's identity.

Nobody - not even Bush - knows how much more political damage this case could produce.

"I've been hoping for a year that he had hit bottom and was moving up," Galen said. "But the bottom kept moving."

Bush's Fortune May Rest With GOP Congress (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum

AP2, April 26, 2006

President Bush is not on the ballot in November, but he might as well be. Republican losses could make an already difficult situation in Congress almost untenable for him.

If his party loses control of one, or both chambers of Congress, the next two years could be a political nightmare for Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0026764

With poll numbers at the lowest of his presidency, Bush has had trouble enough winning support for his priorities in his second term even with a Republican-led Congress. That helped lead to a recent reshuffling of the White House staff.

A Democratic House or Senate and presidential stubbornness could spell legislative gridlock.

Democratic control of either chamber could rearrange priorities. Bush's programs and spending requests would come under increased scrutiny. Congress could even take tentative steps toward bringing troops home from Iraq or reducing funds.

Democratic control of committees in either chamber could lead to investigative hearings on Iraq, awarding of government contracts, the role of lobbyists, fraud and abuse, Pentagon divisions, any number of activities.

"You name the issue. There would be a lot of oversight hearings," said James Thurber, director of the American University Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies. "He will be a true lame duck."

History suggests the party holding the White House will loose congressional seats this year, even without Bush's basement poll ratings. Strategists in both parties are keenly aware of this trend.

The recent surge in gasoline prices just adds to the GOP's midterm woes.

Thus Democrats are portraying the November elections as a referendum on Bush, while Republicans are insisting it's a series of state and local races, each with different issues.

In a recent poll by the Pew Research Center, some 56 percent of voters said the issue of party control would be a factor in their vote in the midterm congressional elections. "More independents, in particular, say partisan control will be a factor," said Carroll Doherty, Pew's associate director.

Two recent two-term presidents — Reagan and Clinton — lost party control of one or both chambers.

Under Reagan, the Republican Senate went Democratic in 1986. Soon his presidency became engulfed in the Iran-Contra arms and money affair.

After two years of Democratic control, Clinton saw both chambers go Republican in 1994 and remain there for the remaining six years of his term.

Energized by their 1994 victories, Republican congressional leaders blocked an array of presidential spending proposals, leading to impasse and the actual shutdown of many government services.

Both Reagan and Clinton found ways to cope. Reagan shook up his staff, reached out to Congress and left office with his legacy mostly repaired.

Clinton successfully managed to blame the government shutdown on Republicans, survived impeachment by the House in a Senate trial, co-opted once-GOP issues like welfare overhaul and saw his approval ratings surge.

Bush starts further back in terms of popularity. And the Iraq war has become a drag on all Republican candidates. Bush seems less able to correct his listing presidency or rebound from a loss of the House or Senate as either Reagan or Clinton, analysts in both parties suggest.

Republicans hold 231 of the 435 House seats. Democrats have 201. There is one independent and two vacancies. In the Senate, Republicans have 55 seats to 44 for Democrats. There is one independent.

Ed Rogers, a GOP consultant, recognizes a GOP vulnerability this year. But he said Democrats "would have to draw an inside straight" to win back the Senate "when you look at it race by race." House races, meanwhile, are usually settled on local issues, although sometimes a national economic downturn can have an impact, Rogers said.

"The national election could become so corrosive that it suppresses turnout. But usually what suppresses turnout is a bad economy," Rogers said. "And the economy is the Republican safety net here."

Still, with gasoline prices recently rising to over $3 a gallon in some areas, it may be only a matter of time before soaring energy costs drag down other well-performing parts of the economy. And the summer driving season has yet to begin.

Democrats have seized on this to mount a new attack on Republican rule.

"It's very clear that it's America's number one issue today," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Departing White House spokesman Scott McClellan countered Wednesday that, "there's a lot of good economic news out there. But high energy prices and rising health care costs do put a strain on family budgets." McClellan noted there remained some 1,000 days in the Bush presidency and "we are getting things done."

DOJ_NMG_0026765

Bush on Tuesday tackled rising gasoline prices himself, suspending environmental rules for gas additives, ordering an investigation into whether price gouging is taking place and temporarily stopping government purchases of crude for the nation's emergency reserve.

His political reserve, meanwhile, is almost empty, even for many Republicans unhappy about his strained dealings with Congress, suggested Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University.

Baker said that, while a divided Congress may not be good for Bush, "there is some research that indicates that a divided government works. And oddly enough, sometimes it can work even better than a unified government."

Just don't expect Bush or his GOP allies to agree.

New Bush Spokesman Not Blind To Boss' Flaws (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Benac

AP2, April 26, 2006

Tony Snow hasn't even started his new job as White House press secretary and already he is learning a lot — about himself. He says he's been called "a BushBot, a puppet, a force of evil in the modern world, a White House mouthpiece-toady-stenographer." And more.

But the good-natured columnist and Fox News commentator — named Wednesday as Bush's new spokesman — can give as good as he gets. Although a strong supporter of President Bush, Snow has used his column to label the president "something of an embarrassment," cast his domestic policy as "listless" and compare him to "the boy who can't say no" when it comes to federal spending.

The 50-year-old conservative commentator has done an even tougher Snow job on Democrats.

He's dismissed them as "reduced to a state of unshakable hysteria" and faulted their "righteous ignorance." He's labeled Democratic leaders like Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid "wheezy prophets of the Defeatocrat Party."

He also has been a strong defender of Bush on many an occasion, applauding his "brilliant" foreign policy, his stick-to-his-guns persistence in Iraq, his "delicious disdain for the Beltway culture," his "visionary" Social Security plan.

"On the seminal issues of national security and global destiny, he positively dwarfs the political opposition," he has written of Bush.

To put it mildly, Snow does not come from the cautious culture of some press secretaries of the past — the ones who make an art form of saying as little as possible.

All of that gives Republicans hope that Snow's fresh voice — and star quality as a polished media figure — will help reinvigorate the beleaguered White House and jolt it out of a defensive crouch.

"Tony's sympathetic to the president, obviously, in terms of policy and philosophy, but he's not a Bush insider and I think that could be healthy," said William Kristol, who worked with Snow in the first Bush administration and was a regular panelist on Snow's TV show on Fox News. He describes Snow as "a happy-go-lucky guy" with a relaxed attitude that could do the tightly wound Bush team good.

Snow wrote in a February column that over time, even the best presidential aides burn out "or worse, lose their capacity to tell the boss, 'Sir, that idea stinks.'"

In an Associated Press interview Wednesday, he rejected the notion that his past criticism of the president could be an impediment as he becomes the public face of the Bush administration. He said it would be a mistake for people to "waste their time on old columns," diverting attention from the real issues.

Former White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater, who worked with Snow in the first Bush administration, said the commentator "has a good personality for bringing together contentious people and contentious issues," and the independent stature to help him prod the White House staff toward better press relations.

Snow, who served the first President Bush as a speechwriting director and in media affairs, also has shown a healthy perspective on White House service. In a 2001 column, he offered some advice to members of the new administration, including a reminder to keep their humility in check because "you are just a visitor to the history factory" that is the White House.

"People will kiss up to you in ways you cannot imagine," he wrote. "In 1991, while I was a minor grandee in that same White House, I received more than 400 Christmas and holiday cards at the office. The following year, following Mr. Bush's defeat, I received 25."

Snow's biography reflects both his standing as a longtime Washington insider and more eclectic elements of his background. He hosted "Fox News Sunday" from 1996 to 2003 and held a string of print journalism positions earlier in his career.

He also has served as an advocate for the mentally ill, taught school in Kenya and Cincinnati and is an avid musician, playing guitars, saxophone and flute. He plays in what he calls "an old-farts rock 'n' roll band" called Beats Workin', attended a rock band "fantasy camp" in New York three years ago, and admits he's a SportsCenter junkie.

Fitzwater said Snow's main concerns about the job focused on health and family,

Snow, who had his colon removed last year after being diagnosed with cancer, delayed a decision on taking the job while he consulted with his doctors and had a CAT scan. Snow and his wife, Jill have three children, 9, 10 and 13.

He said Wednesday he hopes to operate as efficiently as possible and "get as much time off as I can," working from home on the weekends.

Why give up a comfortable job with a much bigger salary for such a pressure-cooker job?

Said Fitzwater: "I always tell people you may lose your health, your wealth and your family but it'll still be the greatest job you'll ever have in your life."

Guffaws About A Fox Guarding The White House (LAT)

By Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK — The selection of Fox News host Tony Snow on Wednesday as the next White House press secretary reignited a debate about the network's political leanings.

The liberal blogosphere chortled about the choice. "Snow, like everybody else on the payroll at Fox, is already a White House spokesman," the blog Reclusive Leftist read, one of many liberal sites that mocked the move. "Is there really a need to give him an office in the West Wing and pay him a government salary?"

The Democratic National Committee took a swipe at the cable network as well, with spokeswoman Karen Finney calling Snow's hiring "an interdepartmental move from one part of the conservative infrastructure to another."

Fox News anchors responded to the chatter about the White House tapping one of the network's own.

"The joke has been all along, we've been hearing it all day on the radio and stuff, 'Tony's not really changing jobs; he's just changing buildings,' " Shepard Smith said on-air Wednesday afternoon. "The conspiracy theories abound. They're baseless, of course. I promise."

In the decade since Fox News Channel launched and then overtook CNN as the top-rated rated cable news network, it has contended with criticism that it leans to the right, despite its "fair and balanced" slogan.

Fox News vigorously rejects that notion, saying that its format mirrors that of many newspapers, which provide news stories as well as editorials. Though many of its best-known personalities such as Sean Hannity and Brit Hume — to whom Snow gave his only television interview Wednesday — offer outspoken conservative views, straight news programming dominates much of the network's daytime schedule.

Fox has taken pains to shield its news coverage from charges of bias. In 2000, network officials reprimanded Snow, then a political analyst and host of "Fox News Sunday," for speaking to a GOP youth group during the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia.

But Snow's White House appointment reinforces for some the perception that Fox News is the go-to network for the administration, media observers said.

"Much of the public will say, 'Suspicions confirmed,' " said Robert Zelnick, chairman of Boston University's journalism department, adding that such sentiments understandably ruffle the network. "The essence of journalism is independence and not hewing to any particular line."

DOJ_NMG_0026767

Fox News said in a statement, "We're proud of the work Tony did for Fox as a commentator, and we wish him all the best in his second stint at the White House." Snow previously was a speechwriter to President George H.W. Bush.

Network officials declined to comment further.

Snow's hiring comes as the cable channel, whose ratings overwhelmingly beat CNN and MSNBC, has sought to burnish its news credentials. For example, Smith recently spent two days in Jerusalem covering the Israeli elections, and anchor Bill Hemmer reported from Iraq for a week in March.

But it hasn't helped matters that Vice President Dick Cheney — who in February gave Hume an exclusive interview about his accidental shooting of a hunting companion — has indicated that Fox News is his favorite news outlet, a fact that he joked about at a recent Radio and Television Correspondents Assn. dinner.

Snow's selection to replace Scott McClellan only gives critics more fodder.

Weekly Standard editor and network analyst Bill Kristol acknowledged as much, joking to Smith that "Fox News will just take over the Bush White House now," and quipping that "On the Record's" Greta Van Susteren could be named White House counsel.

"This is what the world is going be saying, though," Smith replied. "You know, we're in bed with the White House, whatever."

Kristol said: "That will end quickly enough — the moment we all criticize the White House and Tony's there defending it."

New Bush Hire Has An Outspoken Past (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

Some say Tony Snow's bluntness in matters such as race may be a risk as press secretary.

WASHINGTON — Three months ago, when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) told a mostly black audience that Republicans were running the U.S. House like a "plantation," conservatives accused her of racial divisiveness. But no one put it quite like Tony Snow, the man President Bush has chosen to be his new press secretary. "Had she proceeded to distribute fried chicken and watermelon," Snow wrote, "she would have achieved perfect condescension."

It was vintage Snow: turning a routine shot at a liberal politician into a dance on thin ice. Linking fried chicken and watermelon to African Americans is something few public figures would dare to do no matter what point they were making.

His voice is quiet and authoritative. Even critics concede he has a talent for articulating policy issues and political philosophy. What has set Snow apart, however, is his penchant for making his points by walking close to the line in areas where others play it safe, including race.

In 1991, Snow, then a speechwriter for President George H.W. Bush, defended some ideas of Louisiana gubernatorial candidate David Duke at a time when Republicans were trying to distance themselves from the former Ku Klux Klan leader. Snow suggested that Duke was espousing some good conservative ideals, including family values and opposition to welfare dependency.

In 2001, Snow wrote a column defending another former klansman, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), for his use of a racial epithet.

As a conservative commentator, Snow's job was to be provocative and fire up the faithful. Sometimes that led him to level blunt criticism of Bush, whose policy agenda he recently derided as "listless." Snow also said his future boss appeared "impotent" in defending his presidential powers.

But how will Snow adapt those sharp-tongued skills to his new role at the White House, where his predecessor, Scott McClellan, seemed to make it his goal to appear as sedate and non-provocative as possible? Bush and his aides on Wednesday tried to put a positive spin on Snow's bluntness, offering his past words as evidence that the White House was not as averse to dissent, as critics had alleged.

"For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Bush said as he introduced Snow to a packed West Wing press room. "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' "

DOJ_NMG_0026768

Asked if the White House had reviewed Snow's record of commentary as part of the vetting process, McClellan said: "He has strong views. That's a good thing."

For his part, Snow said he intended to continue expressing strong views.

"Look, they want people to express their opinions," he said. "You're not coming here to drink the Kool Aid, you're coming here to serve the president. And at this particular juncture, I think what you want is as much honest counsel as you can get. So when I agree, I agree, and when I disagree, I disagree. But on any opinion his vote's the tie-breaker."

Snow deflected a question about his potential differences with Bush on Iraq and other issues. "The president's the guy who runs the place," he said. "So I'll speak for him and at some other point I'll speak for myself."

As early as Tuesday night, when rumors began circulating about Snow's appointment, Democrats began circulating e-mails detailing his history of controversial statements.

David Brock, head of the watchdog group Media Matters, said that Snow's record underscored a risk for the White House in picking a celebrity for a post that had traditionally been filled by a loyal foot soldier.

"It's all fair game because it's all on the record," Brock said. "But it makes him something of a target.... And it's counterproductive in terms of what the administration is trying to do here."

Snow's record of provocative treatment of racial subjects could become especially sensitive for GOP political strategists. They have worked to build alliances among African American voters and to offset the political damage from the government's faltering response to Hurricane Katrina, which affected blacks disproportionately.

Snow has a paper trail on that topic too. And his words do not exactly mesh with the past rhetoric of the president. Bush has spoken of the need to rebuild a "great American city." Snow, chastising Mayor C. Ray Nagin for his pledge to keep New Orleans a "chocolate" city, wrote this year that Nagin was "more an entertainment figure than a statesman, just as New Orleans now is more a theme park with a port than a city of consequence — although both aspire to greater things in years to come."

One of the most frequently cited quotes in Democratic e-mails Wednesday was a 1991 comment by Snow, quoted by syndicated columnist Clarence Page, explaining why many conservatives might support Duke.

"You can't write off Duke's voters as racists," Snow was quoted as saying. "Duke is talking about things people really care about: high taxes, crummy schools, crime-ridden streets, welfare dependency, equal opportunity. A lot of politicians aren't talking about these things."

Ten years after that, he wrote that Byrd had appeared on Fox News to apologize for using a term which Byrd said he had learned not as a racial epithet but as a reference to white racists.

"This is not an unusual term for people of his generation or region," Snow wrote. "Some of my relatives used it from time to time when I was a child, usually as an epithet to describe what we might now call 'racist white trash.' "

Snow contended at the time that Byrd's critics were ignoring a central tenet of the senator's argument: that racism was becoming a figment of the past.

Snow echoed that sentiment in a 2003 commentary on Fox News Sunday. "Racism isn't that big a deal anymore," he said. "No sensible person supports it. Nobody of importance preaches it. It's rapidly and thankfully becoming an ugly memory."

White House aides seemed unconcerned on Wednesday that race might become an issue for Snow. "An overall look at Tony's record on race shows someone who has a long record of reconciliation and acceptance," spokeswoman Erin Healy said in an e-mail.

And one of the Democrats' most prominent African American strategists, former Al Gore campaign manager Donna Brazile, defended Snow against suggestions that he had been insensitive on racial matters.

"The vast majority of Americans don't know how to talk about race without stepping on somebody's toes," she said. "But Tony's somebody who has been at my house, he's been part of the larger political family. He has strong ties to people of color."

Times staff writer Nick Timiraos and researcher Robin Cochran contributed to this report.

"A Republican president and a Republican Congress have lost control of the federal budget and cannot resist the temptation to stop raiding the public fisc. George W. Bush and his colleagues have become not merely the custodians of the largest government in the history of humankind, but also exponents of its vigorous expansion."

— Townhall.com, March 17, 2006

"No president has looked this impotent this long when it comes to defending presidential powers and prerogatives. Nearly 57 months into his administration, President Bush has yet to veto a single bill of any type. The only other presidents never to issue a veto — William Henry Harrison and James Garfield — died within months of taking office."

Bush Touts Spokesman's Media Savvy (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — In naming Tony Snow as his new press secretary Wednesday, President Bush lauded the radio talk show host for his experience in the media and government.

Media experience, however, means little if Snow doesn't get consistent access to Bush and other high-level administration officials, said Ron Nessen, the last presidential spokesman to jump into the job from the media.

“The key to being a good press secretary is getting the information firsthand and not having someone inside the White House have to tell it to you,” said Nessen, who went from NBC to the Ford administration in 1974.

Snow, 50, a Fox News Talk host, joins Bush as the president struggles to improve the lowest poll ratings of his tenure. Snow replaces Scott McClellan, who resigned as part of an administration shake-up that started last month when Joshua Bolten replaced Andy Card as White House chief of staff.

Nessen said there was an increasingly “hostile” relationship between the White House press corps and McClellan. They engaged in heated exchanges over such issues as Iraq and an investigation into the leak of the name of an undercover CIA officer.

Snow said that he has been promised sufficient access to Bush and that he'll express his views privately to the president. However, he said, Bush always has final say: “The president is the guy who runs the place.”

The chief speechwriter for the first President Bush, Snow is also a former newspaper editorial writer and has written for The Forum in USA TODAY. He hosted Fox News Sunday on TV from 1996 to 2003 before moving to his radio show.

Snow recently survived a bout with colon cancer and received a medical clearance to take on the time-consuming job of press secretary.

Snow's background gives him “good insight into what it is reporters need,” Nessen said.

Bush said his “job is to make decisions” and Snow's “is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people.”

Snow said he took the job because he believes in Bush, and “we've got a lot of big issues ahead.”

DOJ_NMG_0026770

Taking a spin around the press room, Snow said he knows how “to talk” but needs to learn how “to brief.” He won't start doing White House briefings until next month.

Stephen Hess, author of Organizing the Presidency, said, “We've never had a journalist of opinion” as press secretary.

Some of Snow's published opinions have been critical of Bush, including a column after this year's State of the Union address in which Snow called Bush's domestic policy “listless.” In that same column, however, Snow also called Bush's foreign policy “brilliant.”

In November, Snow wrote that “the newly passive George Bush has become something of an embarrassment.”

Bush said Wednesday that he had asked Snow about some of his criticisms, “and he said, ‘You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' ”

Frank Donatelli, political director for President Reagan, said Snow's conservative credentials could help Bush with a wavering constituency. “The challenge for the administration is to soften the criticism from his Republican and conservative base,” Donatelli said.

He and other analysts said Snow's ideology is less important than his access to the president and ability to disseminate his message fully.

W. Dale Nelson, author of Who Speaks for the President?: The White House Press Secretary from Cleveland to Clinton, said Snow must be careful not to sound like a commentator when he conducts White House briefings.

“By picking Snow, even though he has criticized him, Bush knows that Snow was just doing his job,” Nelson said. “Now that's all different. … He's the president's man.”

Fox Commentator Named Bush's Press Secretary (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush appointed Fox News commentator Tony Snow as his press secretary Wednesday, signaling that in its final 1,000 days, his White House plans significant changes in the way it reaches the American people.

Before taking the job, Snow — who was a speechwriter in the George H.W. Bush administration — sought and was given "walk-in" privileges in the Oval Office and the chief of staff's office, according to a veteran Republican advisor who asked not to be named because his conversation with Snow was confidential. That would make Snow one of the few officials with unscheduled access to the president and Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten.

The arrangement could be helpful as Snow, 50, attempts to build trust with a White House press corps that had an adversarial relationship with his predecessor and as he tries to help Bush recover from low public approval ratings.

Bush presented Snow on Wednesday morning as his choice to replace Scott McClellan.

"My job is to make decisions," Bush said, "and his job is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people…. He's going to work hard to provide you with timely information about my philosophy, my priorities and the actions we're taking to implement our agenda."

Snow's appointment was unusual for a White House that has prized loyalty and long-standing relationships with Bush. He has worked for Fox for the last decade, and has criticized Bush — calling him "impotent" and "something of an embarrassment" in recent commentary.

He also is the first outsider given a top position during the White House shake-up engineered by Bolten, who has been chief of staff for less than two weeks. But Snow's selection fits a historical pattern.

At low moments in their terms, other presidents have sought to bolster their credibility by hiring press secretaries seen less as administration loyalists than as independent operators with their own authority and stature.

Suggesting that Snow would present himself as the latter, Tom Rosenstiel — director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, a nonprofit group that studies the media — said: "One thing we know is that Tony Snow has to eat lunch in this town again. He is going to serve the president, but not sacrifice his reputation while he's doing it."

Moments after Bush introduced him, Snow walked through the White House press briefing room, pledging to work with reporters — "to figure out what you think we can do better."

DOJ_NMG_0026771

"It's clear they are bringing in someone to do better marketing," said David Gergen, a former White House communications aide for both Republican and Democratic presidents who now is a professor of public service at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government. "Whether they are bringing in someone to bring more complete information to the public is very much an open question."

Snow, who is expected to take over in the next two or three weeks, will be Bush's third press secretary. McClellan succeeded Ari Fleischer in July 2003.

The new spokesman brings a "fresh perspective" because he did not serve during the administration's first five years, said Kenneth M. Duberstein, who took a senior position in the White House at a similarly challenging moment — as President Reagan sought to emerge from the Iran-Contra scandal in 1987.

But, Duberstein said, the question remains whether Snow can overcome the Bush administration's aversion to outsiders and get information from the White House that he will need to be an effective spokesman.

Most fundamentally, the appointment of a prominent media figure may indicate that the White House is focused on shaping the way Bush is portrayed in the mainstream media.

Many analysts agree that this White House has appeared less concerned than previous administrations about influencing newspapers and network television — placing greater emphasis on reaching its core conservative supporters through such outlets as talk radio and cable TV.

They said that the appointment of an accomplished TV personality reflected a White House conclusion that — with fewer than 40% of the voters approving of Bush's performance — it needs to win over a broader segment of the population through the traditional national news media.

"What they've done before is use their back-channel media to get their message out to their base supporters .... And when times were good and bills were passing and things were going well, there was less of a concern of dealing with the mainstream media overall," said a senior Republican congressional aide who was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject and requested anonymity. "Now it becomes critical that they apply a different strategy ... on a daily basis, and they have chosen a guy who can do that."

Republicans inside and outside the administration said they believed Snow would approach the job with a more proactive agenda than did his predecessors, who often seemed to view the daily press briefings more as an exercise in damage control than as an opportunity to drive a strong political message. A senior White House official acknowledged that the administration was looking to rethink the way it communicated with the public.

"I think it's fair to say that there is no panic in the White House, but there is concern about the numbers and a real attempt to make these changes an opportunity to relaunch our public message," said the official, who was not authorized to speak on the record.

But others said Snow's selection could indicate more continuity than change in Bush's approach to the media.

Gergen, for instance, praised Snow as a "person of integrity," but noted that he came to the job as a conservative advocate. "Coming from Fox, it will send a good message to their base," Gergen said. "They are not going out and getting an Associated Press reporter. This is a commentator with a conservative point of view."

Indeed, several Republicans said the White House may hope one benefit of Snow's appointment will be to signal that Bush hears the complaints of conservatives who believe he has not done enough to restrain federal spending — a charge Snow often leveled against the administration.

It has been more than 30 years since a journalist served as the White House press secretary. Ron Nessen, who had worked for NBC News, was President Ford's spokesman.

Snow has largely made his living in the news business, but his experience has been as a commentator and editorial writer, not as a news reporter.

He launched the public affairs talk show "Fox News Sunday." For several years, he has hosted the news program "Weekend Live," along with "The Tony Snow Show," a daily talk show on Fox News Radio.

He grew up in Cincinnati, wrote editorials for the Greensboro (N.C.) Record and the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot, and for four years was editorial page editor of the Washington Times.

DOJ_NMG_0026772

He has also, Bush said, taught in Kenya. His biography on the Fox News website said he taught physics and geography. He plays flute, saxophone and guitar, and is in a rock band called Beats Workin'.

"The only thing more embarrassing than my old columns is my old music recordings," Snow said during his walk through the briefing room.

Snow recently underwent surgery for colon cancer. He and his wife live in Virginia with their three children.

Times staff writers Matea Gold in New York and Peter Wallsten and Tom Hamburger in Washington contributed to this report.

Into The Lion's Den (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, April 26, 2006

It was all smiles in the White House briefing room Wednesday as George Bush introduced his new press secretary, Fox News commentator Tony Snow, to an excitable press corps. But Snow knows this isn't a happy situation he's walking into, even though his predecessor Scott McClellan was beaming at the cameras as the president walked in. After all, Snow knows just what it's like to be in McClellan's position.

In 1991, Snow gave up his job as editor of The Washington Times editorial page to head up the first President Bush's troubled speechwriting operation. A year later, during Bush's re-election campaign, Snow was forced out. Looking back on the experience, three years later, Snow sounded rueful. When President Clinton hired former U.S. News editor Don Baer in a similar shake-up, Snow offered some insight into his own experience as a journalist turned White House staffer. "I've been in this movie," Snow told National Journal. "He's stepping out of a nice secure journalism job to run an embattled speechwriting shop at the White House." Snow offered some blunt advice to Baer. "Make sure you have plenty of high-ranking defenders," he told the magazine. "When things go bad at the White House, the first person they come looking for is the speechwriter. The policy is never bad."

While Snow isn't being hired as a speechwriter, he's walking back into the lion's den. The White House press operation has been under fire for months, particularly from congressional Republicans who say administration officials haven't been effective in talking about the war, the economy and other policy issues. As a key public face of the White House, McClellan felt the brunt of much of that criticism, as some GOP officials complained that the White House's strained relationship with reporters wasn't helpful in helping Bush regain much-needed momentum this second term. Others called for a complete shake-up of the entire press operation and communications staff.

On Wednesday, Snow's appointment, which had been rumored for days, got positive reviews by Republicans on the Hill, including from one senior GOP leadership aide who told NEWSWEEK it was "great news." "He'll give some good outside-the-box thinking for the White House," said the Republican aide, who declined to be quoted by name so as not to upset other administration officials. "He also may be a bull in a china shop. It will be fun to watch him at the podium."

In some respects, Snow's pick was a no-brainer for an administration. The Fox News pundit has already been a go-to guy for administration officials to get their message out. Vice President Dick Cheney has been a frequent guest on Snow's radio show, most recently in March when he phoned in a defense of the administration's handling of national-security issues and the war. When congressional Republicans were in open revolt over the Dubai Ports World deal, Karl Rove called into Snow's program to dial back Bush's threat to veto legislation that would block the deal.

Yet Democrats offered a curious reaction to Snow's appointment. On one hand, some Democrats billed the Fox News analyst as someone who had already been an unofficial messenger of White House talking points. "Truth Still Snowed in at the White House," declared a Wednesday-morning press release from the Democratic National Committee. At the same time, Democrats also flooded reporters with e-mails citing Snow's public criticism of Bush and the White House--including excerpts from a recent syndicated column in which Snow described the president's domestic policy as "listless" and that Bush's "wavering conservatism" and his decision not to fight back against Democrats was "something of an embarrassment."

In announcing his pick of Snow, Bush acknowledged he was aware of his new press secretary's public gripes, telling reporters, "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy'." By embracing someone outside his Texas inner circle, Bush suggested that he is also hearing complaints that he needs fresh advice. Indeed, Snow made it publicly clear that if he took the job he would do so only if he could take a seat within Bush's inner circle and have the ability to shape policy. "The upside is that for someone like me who's been a pundit for many years, you sit around and you think about the way the world should be," Snow said in an interview with Fox's Bill O'Reilly last Thursday. "You become part of something that's very rare, which is an inner White House circle where you've got to make decisions." Citing the difficulties of being the president's spokesman, Snow said, "That has [a] sort of perverse attraction, which is it's a meaty substantive job with real responsibilities."

One GOP official privy to the negotiations told NEWSWEEK that Snow had pressed administration officials for a job that extended beyond simply being Bush's guy behind the podium and had successfully argued for increased access to the president. Additionally, Snow also argued for and won the ability to make staffing decisions within the press office, including the ability to hire or fire staffers. "He won't be a lightweight," said the Republican official, who declined to be named.

The Oily Slope

George W. Bush has traveled many long roads since he entered the Oval Office in January 2001. But few are quite so long as his personal journey on the energy issue--arguably the single subject he and his veep know more about than anyone else in their administration.

In 2000 Bush campaigned against Al Gore's green-tinged policies by lampooning them, suggesting that hybrid vehicles were some kind of alien life form. Now the president tours hybrid-vehicle facilities like they are a second home, laying out his vision for a nation of electric- and hydrogen-powered cars. This isn't, as some critics have suggested, a superficial move: Bush is sold on the new technologies of the auto industry.

But that's not Bush's only reversal on energy. This week's four-point plan on gas prices marked the end of another of the president's signature positions. In 2000, he campaigned as a Reagan-style free-marketer who opposed what he saw as the regulatory excesses of the Clinton years. Reagan wanted to get government off the back of business. This week Bush urged his own Justice Department to get on the back of the oil industry, launching an investigation into possible market collusion or price-fixing of gasoline.

Such investigations are notoriously difficult, and the bar is high when it comes to litigation. In the early 1980s, the Justice Department sued American Airlines' Robert Crandall for his attempt to raise prices together with his counterpart at Braniff Airlines. Crandall was secretly tape-recorded as he phoned Braniff, saying that if the company raised its prices by 20 per cent, "I'll raise mine in the morning." It would be hard to come up with a clearer attempt to manipulate prices, but the lawsuit ended with a slap on the wrist: Crandall merely agreed to stop having such conversations about fares.

In the case of the oil industry, there's no suggestion of behavior like that. When asked if there were any suspicions of market manipulation, the outgoing White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan came up with nothing. "It's important to make sure that there's not any price gouging," he simply stated.

In fact, President Bush has repeatedly explained why gas prices are high for a host of reasons other than price gouging. “We live in a global marketplace, and when the demand for crude oil goes up in China or India, fast-growing economies, if the corresponding supply doesn't meet that demand, the price of gasoline is going to go up here in America,” he told an audience in West Sacramento, Calif., on Earth Day last weekend. “The American people have got to understand what happens elsewhere in the world affects the price of gasoline you pay here.”

President Bush is of course feeling the intense political pressure of high gas prices, which his aides have blamed for a steady decline in his approval numbers for the last 15 months. That pressure led to another energy reversal this week, as Bush fiddled with the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Bush dismissed as a political stunt Bill Clinton’s release of oil from the reserve in 2000, and he repeated the same charge against John Kerry in 2004. This week, he followed Clinton and Kerry with an even less significant move--suspending shipments to the reserve.

What does Tony Snow think of the price-gouging story? Not much. Speaking to Bill O’Reilly last week, Snow rejected his fellow pundit’s protests about price gouging and about excessive pay for oil executives. Snow said gas prices were high because of “jitters about the stability of the Middle East.” As for the role of oil executives in setting gas prices, Snow insisted it was irrelevant. “The fact is, it doesn’t matter who’s running these companies,” he told O’Reilly. “As long as you’ve got $70 a barrel oil, you’re going to be paying that price.”

Bush Picks Fox News's Snow As White House Spokesman (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray Catherine Dodge

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush picked Tony Snow, a Fox News radio host and former presidential speechwriter, as the White House press secretary, replacing Scott McClellan.

``He's not afraid to express his own opinions," Bush said, appearing with Snow and McClellan in the White House briefing room. ``I like the perspective he brings to this job, and I think you're going to like it, too."

Snow's hiring -- Bush's third spokesman in six years -- is part of an effort by Bush's new Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten to reorganize the White House team amid job approval ratings for the president that are at or near record lows. McClellan, who held the job for almost three years, announced his resignation last week and today told reporters that Snow would likely start at the White House the week of May 8.

Snow, 50, prefaced his remarks by saying that one reason he's taking the job is that ``I believe in the president."

``These are going to be times that are very challenging," he said. ``We've got a lot of big issues ahead and we've got a lot of important things that all of us are going to be covering together."

Snow didn't take any questions after the announcement.

Snow has been the host of Fox News Channel's ``Weekend Live With Tony Snow" on Saturday and a daily radio show for Fox News Radio. Before joining Fox in 1996, Snow worked as a syndicated columnist for the Detroit News and a columnist for USA Today.

Former Speechwriter

He served as a speechwriter and deputy assistant for media affairs for President George H.W. Bush from 1991 to 1993 after a career in newspapers, according to his biography on the Fox News Web site.

Snow would bring credibility to the White House post and is comfortable in front of the cameras, Joe Lockhart, who served as press secretary to President Bill Clinton, said yesterday, before the announcement was made.

``Tony is very bright, personable and has a good sense of humor, and that's a lot of what you need to be successful in the job," Lockhart said. ``The real issue for him is will the president and the White House let him do his job? There needs to be a fundamental shift in thinking in the White House on the role of the press, not just another new face."

Opinions

On his radio show, Snow has voiced strong opinions on a range of topics in a tone that contrasts with the measured approach traditionally taken by White House press secretaries. He also has occasionally criticized Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0026775

The Web site for his show provides recordings of his broadcasts, including one in which he summarizes Bush's January State of the Union address as marked by ``brilliant foreign policy and listless domestic policy."

He described Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as ``Iran's Nutjob-in-chief" and Pennsylvania Democratic Representative John Murtha, who has advocated pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq, as a leader of ``the cut-and-run crowd."

His show has also featured U.S. military leaders critical of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's job performance.

Bush noted Snow's past criticisms. ``For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Bush said. ``I asked him about those comments, and he said, `You should have heard what I said about the other guy.'"

Lockhart said he expected the news media would highlight the more controversial comments Snow has made on the air at Fox. That may actually work to the administration's benefit if Republican voters conclude ``liberal reporters are attacking the press secretary," he said.

Snow's appointment is likely to be popular with the core of the president's supporters and may ``charge them up" for the November congressional elections, Lockhart said.

In his spare time, Snow plays guitar, saxophone and the flute in an amateur rock-n-roll band called ``Beats Workin'," a group that bills itself on a Web site as a combination of ``four lawyers, a realtor, a business executive, and a radio and TV political commentator."

Showtime At The White House (WP)

By Ari Fleischer

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

The Washington press corps -- working in an industry that's been transformed by talk radio, 24-hour cable news and the Internet -- still views the White House briefing room as it was back in the 1950s -- or the '60s, '70s, '80s or even early '90s. Despite dramatic changes forged by live coverage and instant analysis, the press fondly adheres to the notion that the briefing can be conducted the way it used to be.

But as Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, will soon discover, the briefing is no longer a briefing, it's a TV show.

Gone are the days when this daily session was a serious affair, with mostly serious questions asked and mostly serious answers given. Instead, the public is now treated to a spectacle in which the media do their best to pressure the White House, regardless of which party is in power, into admitting that much of what the president is doing is wrong, and the White House pushes back. The two sides talk past each other, and the viewing public gets to watch a good fight.

Before 24-hour cable news and the Internet, reporters at the briefings asked tough questions and generally received straight answers. Because the quantity of coverage was limited and the quality was driven by the next day's newspapers and the 6:30 evening news, with major figures such as Walter Cronkite delivering it, press secretaries didn't have to worry that their every word or thought would instantly be reported live on the North Lawn of the White House.

There was only one news cycle, and it lasted about 24 hours. Today there's no telling when a news cycle begins and ends. It's 24 hours a day, and reporters are under constant pressure from editors to update their stories a dozen times a day. Reporters are in endless pursuit of "the latest development" or "this just in," even if there are no developments of late or even if what's "just in" is barely news at all.

Press secretaries realize that their audience isn't only the couple of dozen reporters in the room. It's also the hundreds of thousands of people who tune in to watch, giving the press secretary a forum to "get out the message."

Not so long ago, when Marlin Fitzwater was press secretary to the first President Bush, TV cameras weren't permitted to cover the briefing live. One of President Bill Clinton's press secretaries, Mike McCurry, in an effort to accommodate the new 24-hour-a-day cable news programs, allowed his briefings to be open to TV coverage. Poor Mike. The first briefing the press covered live was on the day the Monica Lewinsky story broke. Since then the briefing room has never been the same.

In addition to the televised session, I used to brief the press every morning in something called "the gaggle." It was on the record, but no TV cameras were allowed. The gaggle was more informative and serious than the briefing. Reporters didn't posture as much for their colleagues and editors, since their reporting wasn't on the air. If I ducked a question at the gaggle -- such as the ones I was asked immediately after Sept. 11, 2001, about whether a military strike was "coming within hours, days, weeks or months" (I was asked that actual question) -- the reporters didn't attempt to ask me the same thing 17 different ways, as they did at the televised briefing. They got the point: The White House wasn't answering.

Of course, the reporters aren't the only ones who behave differently before the cameras. I acted differently, too. At the televised briefing I would sometimes lean into the podium, raise my hand and do my best to deliver a sound bite for the evening news. I liked mixing it up with reporters. I enjoyed a good intellectual televised argument. But the briefing always had an air of theater to it -- on both sides of the podium. It was easier to give thoughtful explanations of controversial issues at the gaggle or during the numerous times a day reporters strolled into my office to talk with me.

It may not be the briefing it once was, but it is still an important show.

The writer was President Bush's press secretary from January 2001 to July 2003.

Senate OKs $2 Billion To Stop Illegals (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

The Senate yesterday approved immediately spending nearly $2 billion to stop illegal immigration, the largest such infusion of emergency cash for the effort in recent years.

Nearly every member of the Senate voted in favor of the new spending, but Democrats and Republicans split over whether to find cuts elsewhere in the massive spending bill to offset the border security expenditures. Republicans ultimately prevailed and roughly 3 percent will be cut from defense spending contained in the same bill.

"Porous borders are a threat to our national security, and the Senate has acted today to provide vital funding that will increase our border defenses," Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said after the vote.

Republicans turned back an effort by Minority Leader Harry Reid to grant the same expenditures for border security but without making cuts elsewhere in the emergency spending bill, which has ballooned to a $106.5 billion proposal. The Nevada Democrat, whose amendment failed on a mostly party-line 54-44 vote, said the Republican amendment would hurt the military.

"Democrats offered a way to secure our borders and support our troops," he said. "Instead, Senate Republicans chose to slash $2 billion desperately needed by our troops in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere in order to offset the costs of additional border security."

Yesterday's action -- if approved by the House -- would make a comprehensive immigration bill like President Bush wants more difficult to pass through Congress. Border security unites virtually all lawmakers, while the guest-worker program is disliked by liberals who say it creates unfair competition for American workers, and a path to citizenship is disliked by conservatives who view it as amnesty.

The 59-39 vote came one day after Mr. Bush appeared to endorse a Senate proposal that would give many illegal aliens already in the country a path to citizenship.

After meeting at the White House with more than a dozen senators Tuesday, Mr. Bush told reporters that there was a broad and bipartisan consensus for immigration reform legislation that "recognizes we must have a temporary worker program, a bill that does not grant automatic amnesty to people, but a bill that says somebody who is working here on a legal basis has the right to get in line to become a citizen."

By yesterday, however, there was some dispute about whether Mr. Bush had actually endorsed the Senate proposal hatched early this month by Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Mel Martinez of Florida.

Under that plan, illegal aliens who have been in the U.S. five years or more could apply for citizenship without leaving the country while those who have been here between two and five years would have to apply at a point of entry. Those here less than two years would have to return to their home country to apply for citizenship.

"I'm extremely confident that there was no endorsement," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, who didn't attend the White House meeting because he thinks the Hagel-Martinez proposal amounts to amnesty. "Matter of fact, I'm extremely confident that they were told, 'I'm not endorsing the bill.' "

DOJ_NMG_0026777

Mr. Cornyn, one of Mr. Bush's most ardent supporters in Congress, said his information was from a "highly placed source in the White House" but he declined to elaborate.

"That's not true at all," said Mr. Martinez, who attended the meeting. "That was clearly discussed yesterday and clarified in about three different ways with clear questions and answers and he said as long as there's not automatic citizenship, as long as there's not amnesty."

Asked if he had any doubts that Mr. Bush supported the Hagel-Martinez proposal, Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, replied, "Not really. But he has not committed to what 'automatic' means."

In any case, Mr. Bush was cautious.

Mr. Graham said he asked Mr. Bush if he defined "amnesty" as any program that doesn't force illegals to leave the country altogether before applying for citizenship -- a question that gets to the very heart of the debate.

"You don't want me to answer that question," Mr. Bush replied, according to Mr. Graham.

Other Republicans on Capitol Hill said Mr. Bush is either misinformed or just flat wrong if he supports Hagel-Martinez.

"I know he wants to move something forward," Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican, said. "I think they need to study the language carefully because I do not believe that language in the bill comes close to meeting his standards that he's set forth."

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, denounced the proposal.

"I feel very strongly that we should not reward illegal behavior with amnesty," he said. "I think this convoluted three-tiered approach rewards illegal behavior and I don't think that's the right policy for this country, notwithstanding what the president had to say."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican and longtime advocate for immigration reform, said he was glad to see the new spending for border security, but he still has a big question.

"Will the president actually enforce the law?" wondered the Republican. "I know he says he will, but he has demonstrated over and over again that he will not."

Projected Iraq War Costs Soar (WP)

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

The cost of the war in Iraq will reach $320 billion after the expected passage next month of an emergency spending bill currently before the Senate, and that total is likely to more than double before the war ends, the Congressional Research Service estimated this week.

The analysis, distributed to some members of Congress on Tuesday night, provides the most official cost estimate yet of a war whose price tag will rise by nearly 17 percent this year. Just last week, independent defense analysts looking only at Defense Department costs put the total at least $7 billion below the CRS figure.

Once the war spending bill is passed, military and diplomatic costs will have reached $101.8 billion this fiscal year, up from $87.3 billion in 2005, $77.3 billion in 2004 and $51 billion in 2003, the year of the invasion, congressional analysts said. Even if a gradual troop withdrawal begins this year, war costs in Iraq and Afghanistan are likely to rise by an additional $371 billion during the phaseout, the report said, citing a Congressional Budget Office study. When factoring in costs of the war in Afghanistan, the $811 billion total for both wars would have far exceeded the inflation-adjusted $549 billion cost of the Vietnam War.

"The costs are exceeding even the worst-case scenarios," said Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.), the ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee.

Such cost estimates may be producing sticker shock on Capitol Hill. This year, the wars will consume nearly as much money as the departments of Education, Justice and Homeland Security combined, a total that is more than a quarter of this year's projected budget deficit. Yesterday, as the Senate debated a $106.5 billion bill to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and ongoing hurricane relief, 59 senators voted to divert $1.9 billion from President Bush's war-funding request to pay for new border patrol agents, aircraft and some fencing at border crossings widely used by illegal immigrants.

When some Democrats said the move would take money from needed combat funds, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), the bill's sponsor, called the criticism "pure poppycock."

In another challenge to Bush, the Senate moved, in a veto-proof 72 to 26 vote, to shelve an amendment that would have struck spending on all items -- from farm drought assistance to a $700 million measure to move a Mississippi railroad away from the Gulf Coast -- not requested by the administration. The White House has threatened to veto the bill if it much exceeds the $92.2 billion Bush requested in February.

Because of the controversy surrounding the railroad funding, the Senate held a separate vote, 49 to 48, to retain the funding, which critics have singled out as a non-emergency. But advocates of the project, including Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran and Sen. Trent Lott, both Mississippi Republicans, defended it as part of a vital economic development effort along the Gulf Coast.

"It's built on marshes and on sand," Lott said of the railroad, displaying on the Senate floor enlarged photos of the tracks, which run along the coastline. "It will not stand."

But for a bill devoted largely to funding the war, the cost of the Iraq conflict so far has played little part in a political debate focused mainly on energy prices, immigration and pork-barrel spending.

Defense specialist Amy Belasco, the CRS study's author, stressed that the price tag is only an estimate because the Defense Department has declined to break out the cost of Iraqi operations from the larger $435 billion cost of what the administration has labeled the global war on terrorism. That larger cost applies to military, diplomatic and foreign aid operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, enhanced security efforts begun after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and related medical costs of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"Although DOD has a financial system that tracks funds for each operation once they are obligated -- as pay or contractual costs -- DOD has not sent Congress the semiannual reports with cumulative and current obligations for [Iraq] and [Afghanistan], or estimates for the next year, or for the next five years that are required by statute," the CRS noted.

The report goes on to outline a series of "key war cost questions" for Congress to pursue and "major unknowns" that CRS has not been able to answer: How much has Congress appropriated for each theater of war? How much has the Pentagon obligated for each mission per month? What will future costs be? How much will it cost to repair and replace equipment? And how can Congress receive accurate information on past and future troop levels?

Such questions are highly unusual for a congressional research agency report, congressional budget aides said yesterday, and they point to growing frustration in Congress with a Pentagon that has held war-cost information close to the vest.

Lt. Col. Brian Maka, a spokesman for the Defense Department's comptroller, said the Pentagon will study the report before commenting on it.

The report details how operations, maintenance and procurement costs have surged from $50 billion in 2004 to $88 billion this year, citing rising expenditures for body armor, oil and gasoline; equipment maintenance; and training and equipping Afghan and Iraqi security forces.

"These factors, however, are not enough to explain a 50-percent increase of over $20 billion in operating costs," the report states.

War-related investment costs have more than tripled since 2003, from $7 billion to $24 billion, as money has been spent on armored vehicles, radios, sensors and night-vision goggles, as well as on equipment for reorganized Army and Marine Corps units.

"These reasons are not sufficient, however, to explain the level of increases," the report states again.

Other analysts are also scratching their heads. Michael E. O'Hanlon, a defense budget expert at the Brookings Institution, suggested that the military may be slightly padding its request for fear that Congress will be less giving on future emergency spending bills.

"I don't think these guys would make things up, but there is an assumption in the military that these supplementals might dry up, and if there are things that might be considered even Iraq-related, they should get them funded right now," he said.

Of the total war spending, the CRS analysis found $4 billion that could not be tracked. It did identify $2.5 billion diverted from other spending authorizations in 2001 and 2002 to prepare for the invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0026779

That discovery helped push the CRS cost estimate higher than estimates from independent budget analysts. The CRS total also includes expenditures on foreign aid and diplomacy not counted in the military cost tallies by groups such as the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

Senate Cuts War Funding To Tighten Border Control (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate voted today to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead increase patrols against illegal immigrants on the nation's borders and provide the Coast Guard with new boats and helicopters.

An amendment was adopted, 59-39, to cut Bush's Iraq request by $1.9 billion to pay for new aircraft, patrol boats and other vehicles, as well as border checkpoints and a fence along the Mexico border crossing near San Diego.

Later, the Senate voted by a veto-proof 72-26 margin to kill an attempt by conservatives to cut the overall bill back to Bush's request -- just a day after the White House issued a toughly worded promise to veto the $106.5 billion bill unless it is cut back to below $95 billion.

Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, R-Ill. -- the key architect of the bill -- is unhappy with the veto threat and easily beat back a move by Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., to kill $12 billion in add-ons such as $4 billion in farm aid, $1.1 billion for Gulf Coast fisheries and money for a much-criticized $700 million relocation of a Mississippi freight rail line.

While the border security funds had broad support, Democrats and Republicans argued over whether the cuts to Pentagon war spending would harm troops in Iraq. The cuts, offered by Judd Gregg, R-N.H., would trim Bush's request for the war by almost 3 percent but don't specify how.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., said Gregg's cuts would "take money from troop pay, body armor and even the joint improvised explosive device defeat fund. Now that is a false choice and it is a wrong choice."

Gregg responded heatedly, arguing that the cuts eventually would come from other parts of the massive Pentagon budget rather than U.S. forces in Iraq.

"To come down here and allege that these funds are going to come out of the needs of the people on the front lines in Iraq or Afghanistan is pure poppycock," he said.

An amendment by Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada to add the border security funds but not tap the Pentagon for them failed by a 54-44 vote.

In its veto statement, the White House said the bill contains too many items that are "unrelated to the war or emergency hurricane relief needs." It said a final House-Senate compromise "must remain focused on addressing urgent national priorities while maintaining fiscal discipline."

The bill is sure to be carved back in House-Senate negotiations next month, and Bush may very well not have to follow through on his veto promise.

To accommodate the White House's objections would require the Senate to shed numerous projects. That would represent a departure from the way a disaster aid bill was handled in December, when Congress added $12 billion in new spending not requested by Bush.

Even as the White House raised the potential of a first-ever Bush veto, the administration on Tuesday asked the Senate for $2.2 billion more to repair and strengthen levees in and around New Orleans. The request wouldn't add to the overall cost of the bill since it was accompanied by a decrease in Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds.

The White House acknowledges that FEMA coffers would have to be replenished again in the fall instead of next year under the proposal.

Bush insists that total spending in the bill be capped at his $92.2 billion request for Iraq and hurricane relief, though he is willing to accept $2.3 billion in the bill to prevent an outbreak of avian flu. His February budget anticipated the funding, but the White House has been slow to follow up with a detailed request.

DOJ_NMG_0026780

Gregg chairs the Appropriations Homeland Security Subcommittee. His border security plan focuses used on the capital needs of the Border Patrol and the Coast Guard, including new planes, helicopters, ships, communications equipment and a project to build a fence along the Mexico border near San Diego.

Gregg said his plan would "give the people who are defending us on our borders, the border security agents, the Custom agents, the Coast Guard, the tools they need to do their job right -- the unmanned vehicles, the cars, the helicopters which are a critical part of our fight in the war on terrorism. It has to be done now."

The underlying bill contains $67.6 billion for Pentagon war operations and $27.1 billion for hurricane relief, including grants to states to build and repair housing and $2.1 billion for levees and flood control projects. The funding for hurricane relief exceeds Bush's request by $7.4 billion.

To date, Congress has provided about $315 billion for the war in Iraq and anti-terror spending since September 2001.

Tax Reduction, Border Security Proceed In Senate (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republicans neared agreement on a $70 billion tax-reduction bill even as the Senate Finance Committee told the Internal Revenue Service that it wants to inspect five years of returns from the top 15 oil and gas companies.

"The goal is we need some information," said Finance Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa). At this stage no clear legislative agenda is attached to the request, which also was signed by the panel's ranking Democrat, Sen. Max Baucus of Montana.

But in writing the tax bill now being negotiated, Senate tax writers were more aggressive than the House in looking for revenue offsets from the oil industry. And amid the outcry over record profits and high gas prices, the level of detail in the request makes it one of the broadest of the IRS in recent memory.

"We understand the frustration of members of the committee, and that they have a role to perform. But gas prices are set by market forces, not any manipulation by producers or refiners," said John Bisney, a spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute. "Some of these documents go back five years, and in that period we haven't heard a peep out of them [the IRS]."

Relatively small oil industry-related provisions were still in play last night as negotiators tried to pin down an estimated $4 billion in final offsets for the tax package. Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R., Cal.) were hopeful that an agreement in principle could be announced today.

The core elements will include a one-year patch to protect middle-income taxpayers threatened by the alternative minimum tax and a two-year extension of the favorable 15% rate for capital gains and dividends, due to expire at the end of 2008.

As part of the package, the financial-services industry appears certain of getting an extension of the "active financing exemption," important to multinationals. The exemption, which dates back to 1997 and is due to expire this year, says that U.S.-based firms shouldn't be taxed on the active business income earned abroad by their foreign subsidiaries until the income is returned to the American parent.

But major provisions, approved by the House or Senate, will be left out in anticipation of a second tax bill. Mr. Grassley said he didn't think the second package, which would include the research and development tax credit and more AMT relief for 2007, needed to be announced today, but "we have to have some consensus."

The progress on the tax front came as the Senate Republicans won approval of $1.9 billion in emergency spending for border security designed, in part, to ease conservatives' concerns and lay the groundwork for a second try at passing immigration legislation next month.

Most of the funds would go to buying patrol boats, aircraft and other equipment for Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection operations. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) hopes to burnish the Republican image on border issues before again tackling immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0026781

The action follows a White House meeting Tuesday at which President Bush urged senators in both parties to try again to complete a proposal that stalled before the spring recess. Republicans say he is clearly sympathetic to provisions that authorize expanded guest-worker programs and a path toward legalizing millions of undocumented workers in the U.S.

"I think he is really going to lean into this one," said Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.), who said Mr. Bush had read -- and urged him to get -- the book "Judgment Days" by Nick Kotz, which details the relationship between another Texan, Lyndon Johnson, and Martin Luther King Jr. running up to the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Mr. Brownback said that just as President Johnson went against Southern forces in the Democratic Party, Mr. Bush appeared prepared to tackle conservatives in his own. "I think Bush sees [immigration] somewhat in that category," Mr. Brownback said. "I think the president really wants to get something. He thinks this is the issue of this year's legislature ... I think this is Bush's time as far as affecting millions of people."

The $1.9 billion for border security would be wrapped into a $106.5 billion appropriations bill to continue paying for the war in Iraq and hurricane recovery efforts along the Gulf Coast. Emergency defense funds would be reduced so the net cost of the package wouldn't increase. But the underlying bill remains $14.3 billion above the administration's request and is already the target of White House veto threats.

Mr. Frist said that he has 35 votes to sustain any future veto, but when put to the test yesterday, his party was more likely to support Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.) who argues more money is needed for the Gulf Coast.

On a 72-26 roll call, with a majority of Republicans on his side, Mr. Cochran easily tabled a first conservative effort to roll back the cost of the bill to the president's request of $92.2 billion. And with the help of Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, a former Republican national chairman, Mr. Cochran won a 49-48 vote blocking efforts to strip out $700 million to help relocate a CSX Corp. rail line in the state.

US Senate Frees Up Two Billion Dollars For Border Security (AFP-Y2)

AFP, April 26, 2006

The US Senate voted to set aside nearly two billion dollars for improving border security, in a move hailed as an important first step toward immigration reform.

By a vote of 59 to 39, the Senate approved an amendment by Republican Senator Judd Gregg that would free up 1.9 billion dollars in credits for surveillance planes and building a fence near San Diego, California, along the border with Mexico.

"Securing our border is the first step for any action that we need to take in terms of more comprehensive reform in immigration, ... an issue that we will come back to," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Immigration has risen to the top of the national political agenda ahead of November's mid-term legislative elections.

The issue has divided the Republican Party, with some members of Congress pushing for strict penalties against illegal immigrants and those who employ or assist them.

For the past two years, President George W. Bush has been asking for a sweeping reform of border security procedures and a "guest worker" program.

The debate has spurred hundreds of thousands of immigrants and rights advocates to protest in Los Angeles, New York, Houston, Washington and dozens of other US cities, with a massive nationwide protest and boycott planned for May 1.

Senate Adds $1.9 Bln In Spending On Border Security (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brian Faler

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate voted to cut $1.9 billion from Defense Department programs so it can spend the money on aircraft, patrol boats and other equipment to boost border security.

The Senate approved the border-security changes in a 59 to 39 vote on an amendment to a $106 billion emergency spending measure for military operations and hurricane recovery.

Under the amendment, $1.9 billion will be used to replace surveillance aircraft, patrol boats, ``outdated'' vehicles, communications equipment and other improvements that lawmakers said were urgently needed to secure the nation's borders.

DOJ_NMG_0026782

``The purpose of this amendment is to basically give the people who are defending us on our borders -- the border security agents, the Customs agents, the Coast Guard -- the tools they need to their job right," said Senator Judd Gregg, a New Hampshire Republican. ``We can bring the border under control and we're on a path to do that."

Democrats denounced the border-security plan, saying it forced lawmakers to choose between supporting American troops and protecting the country's Southwestern border.

`Urgent Need'

``Border security is an urgent need and it should and must be addressed by this Congress," said Senator Hillary Clinton, a Democrat from New York. ``But our security and our values are not served by choosing between protecting our troops and protecting our homeland."

A Democratic alternative proposal, which would have made paid for the border security equipment without cutting defense programs, was rejected on a 54-44 vote.

Republicans said their plan would cut non-emergency defense programs, not funds for troops, and was more fiscally responsible because it wouldn't increase the overall size of the spending measure.

The legislation includes money to replace the U.S. border protection agency's only unmanned surveillance aircraft, which crashed yesterday in Arizona.

The chamber also rejected, by 72 to 26, a proposal to cut the $106 billion spending bill by more than $10 billion as the Bush administration has demanded. The White House Office of Management and Budget yesterday said President George W. Bush would veto any legislation spending more than $94.5 billion.

Senator Craig Thomas, a Wyoming Republican who sponsored the proposal, said it would have cut billions in unnecessary spending. After the vote Thomas said he was confident the Senate would reduce the total cost of the measure.

`Reduced'

``I think when it's all over you'll see a lot more people being opposed to it unless it's reduced quite a bit," he said.

The House has approved legislation that closely tracks the president's request, capping the spending at about $92 billion.

Differences between the House and Senate measures will have to be resolved by a conference committee.

The border security spending is part of an effort by Majority Leader Bill Frist to gain support for pending legislation, now stalled in the Senate, to overhaul the nation's immigration laws.

The immigration measure would beef-up border security, create a temporary worker program and allow millions of illegal immigrants to gain legal status has stalled in the Senate over disagreements on a number of proposed amendments to the plan. The House has approved legislation that would crack down on the hiring of undocumented workers while calling for the construction of a 700-mile fence along the border. The Bush administration has called for overhauling U.S. immigration laws, including the creation of a guest-worker program.

Gregg, Clinton Face Off (NHUL)

By From Staff And Wire Reports

New Hampshire Union Leader, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON – A war of words broke out yesterday between Sens. Judd Gregg and Hillary Clinton after the Senate approved Gregg's proposal to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead bolster U.S. border security.

Sen. Clinton, D-N.Y., said Gregg's cuts would "take money from troop pay, body armor and even joint improvised explosive device defeat fund. Now that is a false choice, and it is a wrong choice."

Gregg responded heatedly, arguing that the cuts eventually would come from other parts of the massive Pentagon budget rather than U.S. forces in Iraq.

"To come down here and allege that these funds are going to come out of the needs of the people on the front lines in Iraq or Afghanistan is pure poppycock," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0026783

The Senate passed Gregg's amendment yesterday by a vote of 59-39. The amendment cuts President Bush's Iraq request by $1.9 billion to pay for new Border Patrol agents, aircraft and some fencing at border crossings widely used by illegal immigrants.

"Yes, fighting the war in Iraq is critical to this war on terrorism," Gregg said on the Senate floor Tuesday. "Fighting the war in Afghanistan is critical to this war on terrorism. But I have to think equally important is making sure that our borders are secure."

While the border security funds had sweeping support, Democrats and Republicans argued over whether the cuts to Pentagon war funds would harm troops on the ground in Iraq.

Gregg's proposed cuts trim Bush's request for the war by almost 3 percent but don't specify how. Yesterday, his press secretary said the money could be drawn from portions of the President's request that would not affect current U.S. troops in Iraq.

In his floor statement, Gregg said the majority of dollars in the amendment — more than $700 million — would go to improving the air fleet used to patrol U.S. borders. Some of the planes are 40 years past their useful life, he said.

Gregg said the United States has had just one unmanned aerial vehicle conducting surveillance along the border. On Tuesday, he said, it crashed.

Other portions of Gregg's amendment would go to new cars and helicopters. Gregg said he also hoped to buy new boats for the Coast Guard.

Gregg chairs the Appropriations Homeland Security Subcommittee. His plan, he said, would "give the people who are defending us on our borders, the border security agents, the Custom agents, the Coast Guard, the tools they need to do their job right — the unmanned vehicles, the cars, the helicopters, which are a critical part of our fight in the war on terrorism. It has to be done now."

Yesterday's vote came in the wake of a toughly worded promise by the White House to veto the $106.5 billion measure unless it is cut back to below $95 billion.

In its veto statement, the White House said the bill contains too many items that are "unrelated to the war or emergency hurricane relief needs." It said a final House-Senate compromise on it "must remain focused on addressing urgent national priorities while maintaining fiscal discipline."

The move is likely to force senators to drop most of their $14 billion in add-ons for farm aid, highway repairs, aid to the Gulf Coast fishing industry and other projects. The additional money had won the ire of the White House and GOP congressional leaders and scorn from conservative allies whose support is crucial on Election Day.

The bill is sure to be carved back in House-Senate negotiations next month, and Bush may very well not have to follow through on his veto promise.

The White House statement said farm aid in the bill is unnecessary after a booming 2005 crop year and that a controversial $700 million relocation of a Mississippi freight rail line would unfairly put taxpayers on the hook for privately owned infrastructure.

To accommodate the White House's objections would require the Senate to shed numerous projects. That would represent a departure from how a disaster aid bill was handled in December, when Congress added $12 billion in new spending not requested by Bush.

Even as the White House raised the potential of a first-ever Bush veto, the administration on Tuesday asked the Senate for $2.2 billion more to repair and strengthen levees in and around New Orleans. The request wouldn't add to the overall cost of the bill since it was accompanied by a decrease in Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds.

The White House acknowledges that FEMA coffers would have to be replenished again in the fall instead of next year under the proposal.

Bush insists that total spending in the bill be capped at his $92.2 billion request for Iraq and hurricane relief, though he is willing to accept $2.3 billion in the bill to prevent an outbreak of avian flu. His February budget anticipated the funding, but the White House has been slow to follow up with a detailed request.

To date, Congress has provided about $315 billion for the war in Iraq and anti-terror spending since September 2001.

Minutemen Gaining In Immigration Debate (AP-Y2)

By Gillian Flaccus

DOJ_NMG_0026784

AP2, April 26, 2006

Laurie Lisonbee worried about illegal immigration but figured it was somebody else's issue — until she saw hundreds of thousands of immigrants and their supporters marching across her TV screen.

Soon, Lisonbee had recruited several friends to attend a demonstration by the Minuteman Project, a volunteer group that patrols the border to keep out illegal immigrants. Now, the 51-year-old art professor checks the group's Web site daily and plans a summer trip to the Mexican border to help build a fence.

Minuteman organizers say this spring's marches have proved to be an unexpected recruitment tool for Americans who feel uneasy about the burgeoning immigration movement but may have considered the organization a pack of gun-toting vigilantes.

"We're not trying to be more mainstream — mainstream has found us," said Stephen Eichler, the group's executive director. "They're saying, 'These guys actually have teeth, they don't all chew tobacco, they don't all have a gun rack in the back of their truck.' They're saying, `They believe what I believe,' and they're joining us."

Lisonbee, a registered Republican, said only one issue matters to her now.

"My vote will go to the candidate who's the toughest on immigration, whether they're Democrat or Republican," she said from her home in Orem, Utah. "Before, we were pretty much the types of people who would call our congressmen and not take to the streets. But that's all changed now."

The Minuteman Project first gained attention last year when Orange County resident and former tax accountant Jim Gilchrist helped lead its first 30-day patrol of the border in Arizona. The group has added mainstream political tools, including a network of local chapters and e-mail lobbying campaigns.

In December, Gilchrist, a former Republican, ran as a third-party candidate in a special House election in Orange County, Calif., finished a respectable third with 25 percent of the vote.

Since this spring's huge pro-immigrant rallies, 300 people nationwide have applied to start local chapters, according to Eichler. The group's goal is 500 chapters by December and a membership of 1 million within 1 1/2 years, Eichler said.

Eichler claimed the organization's membership has climbed to more than 200,000.

But Heidi Beirich, deputy director of the Southern Poverty Law Center's Intelligence Project, which monitors the Minuteman Project for racist rhetoric, said that estimate appears to be ridiculously high. She offered no estimate of her own.

"At the border during this last outing, they had maybe 50 people. If they have 200,000 people, it doesn't seem right," she said.

Beirich also questioned the premise that pro-immigrant rallies will help the Minuteman Project. She said many recruits may attend one or two rallies, but leave after they discover what she called the group's extremist attitudes.

"They get in there and they're like, `My God, I didn't sign on for this,'" she said.

In the coming weeks, the Minuteman Project plans to set out in a caravan from Los Angeles to Washington, with stops in 13 cities, including President Bush's vacation haven of Crawford, Texas. It is also raising money to build a private fence along parts of the California-Mexico border.

Increased security along the border is a popular idea on Capitol Hill, where the immigration debate will soon resume. How to treat the approximately 11 million illegal immigrants now here is where Congress splits — a House bill would criminalize the immigrants, a Senate bill would offer guest worker status and a potential path to citizenship.

David S. Meyer, a professor of sociology and political science at the University of California, Irvine, said the growing Minuteman movement has "stiffened the spine" of conservative politicians who might otherwise be wary of publicly identifying with the organization's views.

He said the recent workplace crackdown at a pallet manufacturer that resulted in 1,100 arrests at 40 U.S. sites was part of an attempt by the Bush administration to appease the Minuteman Project and its congressional supporters. Bush supports a guest worker program.

"The debate has kind of come to them, and they're clever enough politically to realize that," Meyer said. "People in mainstream politics who are not associated with the Minuteman Project are essentially voicing their position, which is a victory itself."

Immigrants Divided On Boycott (WP)

By Karin Brulliard And Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Disagreement over whether immigrants should walk off the job and boycott businesses Monday appeared to deepen yesterday as one immigrant group mustered support for the protest while another group cautioned immigrants that it might put their jobs at risk.

The controversy over what has been called "a day without immigrants" has exposed a rift in the immigration reform movement over the best course of action after successful demonstrations April 10 in cities across the nation.

Although groups in Dallas and Los Angeles say momentum is building for a major May 1 boycott, the coalition that organized the recent rally on the Mall has discouraged participation for fear it could lead to firings and create a negative climate as Congress debates immigration legislation.

"We don't want to be the ones telling people to risk your job, risk your well-being," said Maryland Del. Ana Sol Gutierrez (D-Wheaton), who was joined yesterday by other Latino officials at a news conference.

Rather than protest, the officials said, workers who are excused from their jobs Monday should engage in such civic activities as cleaning parks and supporting voter registration efforts.

An opposing vision for the day was presented at a second news conference called by a group that was part of the April 10 effort -- Mexicans Without Borders -- and several smaller immigrant groups. They said a walkout and business boycott would up the ante in response to a congressional deadlock on immigration reform and multi-state raids in which 1,000 illegal immigrants were arrested last week.

"We want to show that our absence will leave an emptiness that cannot be filled," said Ricardo Juarez, coordinator of Mexicans Without Borders.

Speakers at both events emphasized that although they disagree over the boycott, they remain unified in their quest for legal status for immigrants who entered the country illegally.

"Not even in the civil rights movement did you have just one strategy," said Mario Cristaldo, the general coordinator for Voting Rights for DC Coalition, one of the groups that advocated a boycott yesterday. "This is a democratic system, and people agree and disagree."

That thought was echoed by Gutierrez, who was joined by Arlington County Board member Walter Tejada (D), Prince George's County Council member William A. Campos (D-Hyattsville), Montgomery County Council member Tom Perez (D-Silver Spring) and officials from two Prince George's municipalities.

"I don't know why there is the expectation that all of the Hispanic community would be on the same page or act monolithically," Gutierrez said. "We are not as organized as groups on the West Coast. There is not going to be a single leader or a single organization telling people what to do. This is coming from the bottom up."

The six groups backing the boycott -- including the National Association of Indigenous Salvadorans and the Latino Media Collective -- said they think the immigrant community supports the idea. Juarez said a recent survey by his group of more than 2,000 immigrants in the Washington region found that 97 percent said they would participate in the boycott even if it meant losing their jobs.

"For us, this poll was the voice of the people," Juarez said. "We are with the people and the voice of the people."

But most unions, chambers of commerce, churches and immigrant groups in the Washington area have been lukewarm to the idea of a boycott. The National Capital Immigration Coalition, the April 10 umbrella group, is planning Monday gatherings in the District, Baltimore and Prince George's County in the late afternoon and evening so people can attend after work or school. In Virginia, activists will stand on the corners of major intersections in Herndon, Alexandria and Baileys Crossroads, waving large banners advocating immigration reform.

"We have been trying to come out to educate the American community that we are immigrants who come just to work. . . . That has been very successful for us so far," said Juan Carlos Ruiz, a coordinator with the coalition. "We believe that if there is a need for a strike, we should use it, but we don't think it should be done right now."

DOJ_NMG_0026786

Jorge Ribas, president of the Western Maryland Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, said that his group has taken no official position on the issue but that he does not believe many Hispanic business owners will participate.

"Hispanics are too pragmatic. They are not going to shut down just for that," he said. "Most are start-up businesses, and the owner is the sole employee."

The AFL-CIO, the Service Employees International Union and other unions that supported the April marches for immigrant rights do not support the boycott. Unions said authorizing what amounts to a strike for a day could be considered a breach of their contract agreements.

The support of mainstream business groups for immigration reform also influences those who oppose the boycott.

"Business is on our side. I'm thinking, why hurt business?" said Manuel Hidalgo, executive director of the Latino Economic Development Corp. in Washington and a member of the immigration coalition.

Some observers said immigrants seem unsure what to do about the boycott. Giovanna Tassi, manager of Radio Latina (950 AM), said that May 1 is a constant topic of discussion on the station's morning talk shows and that many callers express enthusiasm for the idea -- until, she said, she explains that most local immigrant advocates are not behind it.

The Rev. Jose E. Hoyos, director of the Arlington Catholic Diocese's Spanish Apostolate, said he has been bombarded with calls from immigrants asking questions and seeking advice. He has told them to continue with business as usual and attend community events in the evening, he said.

"That's like we are against the system," Hoyos said of a work stoppage. "We want to be part of the system."

D.C.-area Hispanics Oppose Boycott (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Local Hispanic elected officials yesterday discouraged participation in Monday's nationwide immigrant boycott of work and school and instead urged immigrants to show solidarity with American citizens.

"We encourage all residents of the Washington metro region to participate in activities on May 1 ... that are peaceful, educational and raise awareness of the contributions immigrants make to our nation," said Arlington County Board member J. Walter Tejada, a leading immigrant advocate.

Prince George's County Council member Will Campos issued a plea to all immigrants: "Please do not boycott anything on May 1."

"We are trying to establish relationships with our federal leaders for comprehensive immigration reform and a boycott, especially of this magnitude, could damage that relationship," said Mr. Campos, Hyattsville Democrat.

The Hispanic leaders were responding to calls for a nationwide immigrant boycott organized by the California-based Latino Movement USA and Act Now to Stop War & End Racism (ANSWER) coalition.

Called "a day without an immigrant," the proposed boycott aims to highlight immigrants' place in the economy by having them close their businesses, skip school and work and avoid spending money.

Last week, local leaders of pro-immigration rallies held April 10 withdrew their support of Monday's boycott.

Officials from Arlington, Montgomery and Prince George's counties yesterday said they fear that holding a boycott so soon after the rallies, which drew hundreds of thousands of immigrants and demonstrators across the country, might generate a backlash against immigration and result in lost jobs.

Instead, they encouraged immigrants to register to vote and begin petition drives Monday -- activities that Maryland state Delegate Ana Sol Gutierrez said are as "American as apple pie."

"We want to form alliances with our American friends," the Montgomery County Democrat said.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Senate this week returned to work on an immigration reform bill -- the focus of this month's rallies.

The United States is home to an estimated 12 million illegal aliens, about two-thirds of whom arrived in the past 10 years, according to the Pew Hispanic Center, a nonprofit research group.

Illegal aliens cost the country and localities millions of dollars each year in unpaid income and Social Security taxes and in education and health care benefits, several state and federal leaders have said.

DOJ_NMG_0026787

"We believe that all these [immigration] issues that we confront at our local government can be resolved by the federal government taking a comprehensive approach to our immigration crisis today," said Mr. Tejada, former chairman of the Virginia Latino Advisory Commission, which compiled a report on a state law denying illegal aliens' access to public benefits.

Advocacy groups on the West Coast, particularly in the border state of California, said immigrants and illegal aliens plan to participate en masse in the boycott. But other groups have expressed reservations about the effort.

Juan Jose Gutierrez, director of Latino Movement USA, said he will be satisfied with any kind of participation Monday.

"The fact that most of the people are in fact doing different activities on May 1 [is] in itself is a major step forward in the struggle for comprehensive immigration reform," Mr. Gutierrez said in a telephone interview from California. "Without the boycott, they probably wouldn't be doing anything at all."

However, the Virginia-based group Mexicans Without Borders said it has withdrawn its support of the boycott, after having endorsed the event last week, said Manuel Hidalgo, executive director of the Latino Economic Development Corp.

Some small-business owners plan to close their doors early to attend evening events but cannot afford to shut down completely, said Mr. Hidalgo, whose group trains Hispanic workers and provides loans to Hispanic businesses.

U.S. Lobbyists Lash Out At Mexican Boycott (AP)

By Alan Clendenning

AP, April 26, 2006

U.S. lobbyists lashed out Wednesday at the Mexican "Nothing Gringo" campaign timed for May 1 to coincide with the "Day Without Immigrants" boycott in the United States.

The American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico said organizers are risking a backlash and foolishly targeting some of their best allies, since U.S. corporations have actively lobbied the U.S. Congress for immigration reform including legalization for many of the estimated 11 million undocumented migrants.

Mexicans' refusal to "buy American" on May 1 could further polarize the debate and make reform supporters seem anti-American at the very moment that lobbyists are trying to persuade lawmakers in Washington to pass a bill that would benefit migrants, worries Larry Rubin, the chamber's president.

"This is like shooting oneself in the foot," Rubin said. "U.S. companies have been the first to lobby, launching a huge lobbying effort for immigration reform. ... Why hurt something that is helping you?"

Migrants and their supporters in the United States are being encouraged to skip work and school and not spend money for one day to demonstrate the migrants' importance to the U.S. economy.

South of the border, Mexicans are targeting American stores and chain restaurants — "That means no Dunkin' Donuts, no McDonald's, Burger King, Starbucks, Sears, Krispy Kreme or Wal-Mart," reads one e-mail making the rounds.

But even activists are confused about which companies are U.S.-owned. Sears is cited by boycott organizers, despite the fact that Sears' Mexico stores were bought by Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim in 1997. And few organizers mention Vips — the chain of ubiquitous Mexican diners — even though they are owned by Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

A quarter of Mexico's formal private-sector jobs with regular pay are provided by U.S. firms, according to the chamber, including Walmex, the Mexican Wal-Mart subsidiary that is the nation's biggest private employer with 140,000 workers. Delphi Corp., the U.S. auto parts maker, is second with 70,000 workers.

"Certainly, companies could be hurt," Rubin said at a news conference Wednesday.

The chamber represents more than 2,000 American and other foreign companies doing business in Mexico, and says its members are responsible for $100 billion of investment in the country.

The companies say they're helping Mexico by providing jobs, but activists counter they pay so little that Mexicans have little choice but to head north.

Backers of the Mexican boycott insisted Wednesday that the protest could send a message that American companies should offer better pay and benefits to their Mexican workers.

DOJ_NMG_0026788

"They continue to exploit Mexicans with badly paid jobs and no labor rights," said Roberto Vigil, who works in the Mexico City office of the California-based immigrants rights group Hermandad Mexicana. "They're kind of two-faced: they support, but they exploit."

Unskilled workers at U.S. companies usually start with Mexico's minimum wage of $4.35 a day. While many earn more, such as seamstresses making an average of $5.89 a day — even these wages pale in comparison to paychecks offered by the same companies north of the border, conceded the chamber's Humberto Banuelos.

A cashier at Subway (or "sandwich artist," as the company refers to them) earns about $189 a month in Mexico City. In Colorado, Subway cashiers make four times that — $824.

Companies also often hire workers for three-month periods to avoid paying health insurance or other benefits, activists say.

"Yes, we are aware that they are the largest employers in the Mexican republic, but they are paying crumbs," said Martha Suarez Cantu, coordinator of Alianza Braceroproa, a Mexican labor-rights group helping organize the boycott.

The only way to stem immigration is to narrow the income gap between the two countries, said Robert Pastor, director of the Center for North American Studies at American University in Washington. He pointed to the European Union, where migration slowed after heavy investment reduced the income gap in its poorer countries.

Washington does not invest directly in job creation in Mexico. The U.S. Agency for International Development gave Mexico $31 million last year, but it went toward scholarships, tuberculosis, AIDS prevention and advice to lending institutions.

But raising wages would cause Mexico to lose ground to countries with cheaper labor, such as China and India. Felix Boni, director of equity research at Scotiabank's Mexican brokerage firm, suggested boosting Mexico's productivity and job growth.

"U.S. aid is not going to do it," Boni said. "It doesn't make sense to pour money into something that's broken. Mexico needs to make structural changes."

Migrants' Boycott Plan Is Crossing The Border (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar And Cecilia Sánchez, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY — It began as a series of e-mails bouncing around Mexico and Central America, the kind of chain letter a lot of people think of as a nuisance.

"Send this message to as many people as possible!" read one sent by a video-rental shop owner in San Salvador to more than 200 clients. "Don't buy anything North American … No Dunkin' Donuts, McDonald's, Burguer [sic] King, Starbucks, Sears, Crispy Cream [sic], Wal-Mart…. "

Spreading now by word of mouth as well as through cyberspace, the campaign calls for a 24-hour boycott Monday of American businesses in Mexico and other Latin American countries. The idea is to show solidarity with immigrant rights protests scheduled in several U.S. cities that day.

This week, a growing number of business groups, trade unions and political leaders in Mexico said they planned to join the boycott, which will be on the traditional May Day holiday here.

Even though Internet access is still a luxury in Mexico (only 9% of households have it), word of the boycott is quickly spreading.

Teresa Garcia Hernandez, a 44-year-old nurse in Mexico City who doesn't surf the Internet, heard about the boycott from her teenage children.

"They're really excited about it and they're telling all their friends, cousins and uncles," she said. "They told me, 'Mama, since your friends don't have this thing called the Internet, you tell them in person not to buy anything gringo that day.' "

Many Mexicans are closely following the immigration debate in the United States. There is a growing sense among Mexicans that proposals being debated by the U.S. Congress could hurt millions of compatriots who crossed over illegally.

In Ciudad Juarez, across the border from El Paso, the Chamber of Commerce announced that its 5,000 members would neither buy nor sell U.S. products that day. And leaders of a Chihuahua state peasant group said they planned to block the bridges that link Ciudad Juarez and El Paso.

"For those of us who live on the border, it's to our advantage to shop in El Paso, but one day isn't going to hurt us," Ciudad Juarez resident Adriana Olague told the newspaper El Universal. "And this way we help the paisanos [countrymen] over there who are looking to get better treatment."

For some Mexicans, however, the talk of a boycott is worrisome.

In the Mexico City neighborhood of Anzures, Carlos Torres pointed out that his McDonald's franchise was the joint investment of "many families that are completely Mexican."

"With this boycott we could have serious losses," Torres said. "Just because it's an American brand doesn't mean the owners are gringos. This is our source of employment. The workers here are all Mexicans."

The growing clamor to buy "nothing gringo" on Monday has also caused concern among members of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Mexico.

Larry Rubin, president of the group, noted that 40% of the Mexican workforce is employed by U.S. companies. The chamber has lobbied for changes in U.S. immigration laws that would allow millions of Mexicans in the United States to gain legal status.

"Our members have been very vocal in support of a positive immigration reform in the U.S.," Rubin said. Boycotting American products "is not a good way for Mexicans to pay back this support," he said. "It's like shooting oneself in the foot."

Immigration groups in the U.S. conceived of their protest as "A Day Without Latinos," a name derived from a 2004 mockumentary in which California descends into chaos when it is mysteriously emptied of its Mexican population. Latin American activists quickly picked up on the slogan. One of the e-mails circulating through the region gleefully tells its recipients: "We can make the movie 'A Day Without a Mexican' into reality!"

Elmer Escobar, the owner of four Evolution Video stores in El Salvador's capital, San Salvador, got the "Day Without a Mexican" e-mail from a friend and promptly sent it to the 288 clients in his database.

In a country where nearly every family has a relative who has migrated to the U.S., joining the boycott feels a bit like an obligation, Escobar said.

"I have family in Los Angeles and San Francisco, relatives who came up from the bottom like I did," Escobar said. "We've all suffered to improve our lives. And the others who've migrated from Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras, they've come up from the bottom too. That's why we have to stick together."

A professor at the National University in San Salvador printed out the e-mail and posted it across the campus.

In Guatemala, activists who work with Maya Indians are planning to use community radio stations to spread word of the boycott to rural areas.

"We want to send the message to the towns and settlements, asking people to tell their relatives in the U.S. not to send remittances [to Guatemala] on that day," said Ignacio Ochoa, director of the Nahual Foundation. "We believe that just boycotting American products won't have as big an impact."

Members of the Chamber of Commerce in the central Mexican state of Guanajuato have said they plan to join the boycott too, as have officials in the border states of Tamaulipas, Chihuahua and Coahuila. Sonora state, which borders Arizona, is not supporting the boycott.

But Mexican diplomats and President Vicente Fox are said to be afraid that the boycott could backfire.

"The Mexican government will not join boycotts of this nature," Foreign Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez said last week. All Mexican embassies and consulates in the U.S. will remain open.

On Tuesday, supporters of leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador passed out fliers in support of the boycott at a campaign rally in Mexico City. But center-right candidate Felipe Calderon said he opposed the action.

"I've felt the temptation to show solidarity with the movement," Calderon said in an interview. But "it's important to understand that the immigration problem can't and shouldn't become a conflict between countries."

Calderon said he worried that the boycott would lead to an even greater "anti-Mexican" sentiment in the U.S.

Ernesto Zamora, a 65-year-old Mexico City retiree, said his family would honor the boycott even though it didn't buy many American-made products. His son, who left for Los Angeles to work in construction some years back, called to tell his father about the boycott.

DOJ_NMG_0026790

"We can show the support of Mexico for the Mexicans who are over there," Zamora said of the boycott. "They're good workers and it's not right that they want to send them back."

Voters May Target Illegal Status (LAT)

By Ashley Powers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

As Congress debates the polarizing issue of immigration, the founder of an anti-illegal immigrant group is pushing for San Bernardino to outlaw day labor sites and bar the undocumented from renting property.

Joseph Turner, executive director of the group Save Our State, submitted voter petition signatures this week that would force a City Council vote or a citywide election on the measure, which would also deny city permits, contracts and grants to businesses that employ illegal immigrants, and require that city business be done in English.

The proposal comes as Congress tries to hash out its plan for immigration reform — a debate that has sparked rallies large and small around the country and rekindled the dispute over how best to deal with the nation's estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants.

The federal fight has trickled down to cities, including Maywood in Los Angeles County and Coachella in Riverside County, where officials have declared their towns sanctuaries for illegal immigrants. Costa Mesa was recently thrust into the national spotlight when it decided to allow police to check the immigration status of suspected felons.

The reaction to the proposal in San Bernardino has already ignited a fiery local debate.

"This is bigoted and I don't think Latinos will be the only ones who suffer. They're going to pick certain parts of the population to run out of town," said Marianna Gonzales of the National Alliance for Human Rights, a Riverside-based immigrant advocacy group.

City Councilman Chas A. Kelley praised the ordinance as creative lawmaking needed to cope with the city's undocumented residents.

"Most people obey the law and the law says you come to this country legally. Period," he said. "It's not cruel. It's not about being racist. It's obeying the law."

The Pew Hispanic Center estimates that Riverside and San Bernardino counties have about 215,000 illegal immigrants.

Latinos account for nearly half of the city of San Bernardino's 200,000 people, and city voters elected Judith Valles, the country's first Latina mayor of a city with a population over 100,000, to two terms in office. Josie Gonzales, the sole Latina on the county Board of Supervisors, represents a district dominated by San Bernardino.

The Southern California town that most recently waded into the immigration debate is Costa Mesa, a city of 110,000 whose council endorsed using its police officers to check the immigration status of suspected felons. The decision divided the city, triggered protests and may have played a role in the police chief's recent resignation.

"Local [immigration] legislation can often polarize a city, and you see that now in Costa Mesa," said UC Irvine professor Louis DeSipio, who specializes in ethnic politics.

"My suspicion is that it may create a long-term distrust between the immigrant community and native citizens."

DeSipio called city attempts at immigration law largely symbolic, since enforcement tends to be spotty. "It's a reaction to the perception that the feds are failing," the professor said.

Indeed, the San Bernardino proposal stemmed from Turner's view that larger government bodies were doing little to combat illegal immigration. Local leaders, in turn, were "aiding and abetting illegal aliens to get jobs and reside in our city," he said.

Turner also acted to prevent creation of a city-run day labor center, which San Bernardino leaders had discussed but never approved.

Under a rarely used provision of the city charter, Turner needs only 2,216 approved signatures for the proposal to be sent to the seven-member City Council, which would have to vote on the plan but could not alter it. If the council rejects the ordinance, a special citywide election must be held in 90 to 135 days.

DOJ_NMG_0026791

Turner this week submitted about 3,100 signatures, which the county registrar of voters has to certify by May 4, three days after a planned national boycott of schools, workplaces and stores to protest congressional proposals against illegal immigrants.

"Is it divisive? Yeah. Is democracy divisive? Yeah," said City Councilman Neil Derry, who said he agreed with some of the proposal's tenets but questioned how they would be implemented.

The far-reaching ordinance would ban illegal immigrants from renting or leasing property, allow police to seize vehicles used to pick them up and punish businesses that employ them.

It would also preclude the city from funding or building day labor centers and force privately run centers to verify the immigration status of anyone using their sites, according to an analysis by the city attorney, who added that the law would be vulnerable to a court challenge.

"It's going to be a laughingstock," said Jesse Diaz, an organizer for the March 25 Coalition, which headed a rally for immigrant rights in downtown Los Angeles that drew an estimated 500,000 people.

"Something like that is not going to pass in a city that once elected a Latina mayor," he said.

Outside a San Bernardino Home Depot, day laborer Jose Enriquez, 29, said he relied on construction jobs to support his 10-year-old son in El Salvador. Any such crackdown would make it far harder for him to earn money, he said.

"I'm not looking to bother people or anyone," said Enriquez. "Police should go after drug dealers or people with guns, not people who are just looking for work."

Court To Decide Whether To Let Illegals Suit Proceed (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Lawyers for employees of a Georgia-based manufacturer yesterday urged the Supreme Court to allow a lawsuit that accuses the flooring company of suppressing workers' wages by recruiting illegal aliens.

Even though the case involves the politically explosive matter of illegal labor, it arrived before the justices because of a dispute over the lawsuit's use of the Racketeering Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) -- a law traditionally used to prosecute organized crime.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. asked the lawyer representing the employees, who are backed by the Bush administration, why their accusations against Mohawk Industries, which appear to fit under general criminal conspiracy law, had been brought under RICO.

"I'm trying to give you an opportunity to tell why this case constitutes RICO, and you're telling me 'interstate commerce' and that it happened with more than one person," the chief justice said. "Those are things that can be handled by criminal conspiracy law."

Justice Stephen G. Breyer said allowing the case to go forward could effectively "RICO-ize vast amounts of commercial activities" that have "nothing to do with organized crime."

Winning parties in RICO cases can be awarded triple damages -- notably higher awards than winners in non-racketeering criminal cases. Congress expanded RICO in 1996 to include violations of immigration law.

The group of current and former Mohawk employees say the company violated RICO by systematically contracting outside recruiting firms to hire illegals. The lawsuit says Mohawk provided identification cards to illegal aliens, which helped them avoid detection by immigration authorities.

The case stalled after Mohawk filed a preliminary motion to have it dismissed, arguing that it was improperly filed under RICO on grounds the company's activities did not constitute a racketeering "enterprise" as described by the language of the law.

Carter G. Phillips, the lawyer who represented the company yesterday, told the justices that providing ID cards to workers was part of the company's regular personnel practices, not a racketeering enterprise.

Mohawk denies knowing that it had illegal aliens on its payroll.

The high court agreed to weigh in after two lower federal courts denied Mohawk's motion.

Court observers noted the greater immigration underpinnings of the case likely will not come to the forefront until the justices decide whether to allow the case to go forward under RICO or order it to be refiled under another criminal law.

Yesterday's debate "was only to discuss the motion to dismiss," said Lynda S. Zengerle, a prominent immigration lawyer in the District, who predicted the case would not be dismissed.

"It was basically like Clinton's 'what is the definition of is,' " she said, referring to the former president's grand jury testimony.

Justice David H. Souter was critical of Mohawk's effort to dismiss the case yesterday, saying the deeper issue at hand centered on whether the company was "providing cover for the illegal status of the aliens" it hired.

Justices Debate Illegal Hiring Case (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a case that could provide a new way to crack down on firms that hire undocumented immigrants, the Supreme Court on Wednesday considered whether companies could be charged with racketeering if they used contractors to hire undocumented employees.

The case was brought by employees of Mohawk Industries Inc., a Georgia carpet maker, who say the company depressed their wages by hiring undocumented immigrants.

The justices focused on narrow questions: Whether a firm and an outside contractor fit the definition of an "enterprise" under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute, or RICO, and whether corporations could be sued at all under a law originally meant to chase down the mob.

But with a handful of similar cases already in the courts, a decision for the Mohawk employees could generate numerous civil suits against businesses reliant on immigrants. The decision could also affect the use of RICO in criminal cases. The Justice Department, which had a lawyer in court to support the employees' argument, uses the law to send corrupt union leaders to prison and win financial damages from pension funds.

Some business groups say they are worried by the prospect of new RICO cases. "We don't think it's a proper use of the RICO statutes, frankly," said Laura Foote Reiff of the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, a business alliance.

"Unless we get an immigration reform bill, we're going to see more and more RICO cases, and that's a huge problem for business and a misuse of the RICO statutes," Reiff said.

Congress is considering an overhaul of immigration laws that could include measures to allow more foreign workers to take jobs legally in the U.S.

Michael Hethmon, an attorney with the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which favors restrictions on all forms of immigration, said the case showed the federal government was unable to enforce immigration law.

"What we're seeing is a devolution of enforcement onto state and local officials and the citizens themselves through private actions," said Hethmon, who favors the use of the RICO law in immigration cases. "Congress intended this [RICO statute] to be a powerful tool. The needs for these kinds of tools are critical and the problems that are triggering this will only get worse."

DOJ_NMG_0026793

The RICO statute was written in 1970 to prosecute the Mafia. In 1996, Congress expanded it to include immigration law violations and specifically included the hiring of undocumented workers. As a legal tool, it has the attraction of allowing plaintiffs to claim triple damages.

RICO laws can only be applied if an enterprise separate from the defendant exists. Currently, these enterprises are described mostly as groupings of individuals. On Wednesday, the justices considered whether a corporation and an outside contractor recruiting illegal immigrants qualified as an enterprise under the law.

A few of the justices indicated an unwillingness to interpret the RICO statutes in ways that could expand their use.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer asked if Congress meant for the 1996 expansion to "RICO-ize with criminal penalties … vast amounts of ordinary commercial activity." Justice Antonin Scalia said he did not want a decision that would let lower courts probe the way corporations conduct their daily business.

But Justice David H. Souter questioned Mohawk's lawyer about whether "a scheme to provide phony IDs" for workers brought by a contractor fit the RICO definition of an enterprise.

The defense counsel, Carter G. Phillips, argued that an alleged practice of issuing false IDs was "simply Mohawk conducting its own affairs." He argued that it could not be guilty of a RICO violation because it was conducting its regular business.

Justice Department attorney Malcolm L. Stewart countered that businesses being used as a front for drug dealing could argue that they should not be sued under RICO, as they too were simply conducting their normal business. Stewart also told the justices that appeals courts had ruled unanimously in favor of a plaintiff's use of RICO in immigration-related cases.

The Mohawk case is currently on hold while the company appeals a trial court judge's refusal to dismiss the case.

Other RICO cases in the works include a lawsuit against Tyson Foods Inc., brought by the same Chicago-based lawyer, Howard Foster, representing the Mohawk employees. That case will be heard in 2007.

Foster also represents Canyon County, Idaho, in a RICO suit against local employers that is now under appeal.

The case before the Supreme Court is Mohawk Industries Inc. vs. Shirley Williams, et al. A decision is expected by the end of June.

Gingrich Slams Immigration Plans (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich yesterday said the government's failure to enforce immigration laws resembles its handling of Hurricane Katrina, and described current reform proposals in Congress as a "con."

Mr. Gingrich said he sympathizes with illegal aliens participating in protests and placed blame for the illegal immigration problem on businesses and the federal government.

"I do not blame someone who leaves poverty to seek prosperity," Mr. Gingrich said during a speech at the American Enterprise Institute. "They showed up here to work under a social contract and then [the government] tried to change the terms.

"We need to quit lying about who is hiring illegals -- it's Americans," said the Georgia Republican who is considered a potential presidential candidate in 2008.

Mr. Gingrich's own immigration reform plan, "Ending the Dishonesty: The Way Forward on Border Control and Patriotic Immigration," calls first for gaining control of America's borders, followed by a worker-visa program.

Mr. Gingrich said private companies such as American Express should run the worker-visa program. Worker cards would include a biometric identification system and require immigrant workers to pay taxes.

"There's zero reason to believe the federal government can run this program," Mr. Gingrich said.

In addition, Mr. Gingrich said a worker-visa program would allow prospective citizens currently obeying immigration laws to come to America immediately.

Mr. Gingrich said he favors the deployment of security fences at points of high traffic flow along the U.S.-Mexico border supplemented by electronic security and surveillance at areas of lower traffic flow.

DOJ_NMG_0026794

In the past two weeks, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat and potential presidential candidate in 2008, and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean have called for increased border security.

Mr. Gingrich conceded he previously fell prey to amnesty compromises during his time in Congress. "I voted for the '86 bill," Mr. Gingrich said. "It sounded fantastic."

The House last year passed an immigration enforcement bill that calls for nearly 700 miles of new fences on the U.S.-Mexico border and requires employers to check Social Security numbers to ensure employees are legal workers.

The Senate is heading in a different direction, with leaders saying they have a general agreement on a broader bill that would create a program for future foreign workers and would legalize many current illegal aliens, offering them a path to citizenship.

Majority Says Nationality Shouldn't Be A Factor In Immigration Policy (WSJ)

By The Wall Street Journal Online

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

With immigration reform a hot-button issue in Washington, a strong majority of Americans say nationality shouldn't be a factor in U.S. immigration policy, according to a new Harris Interactive poll.

Many Americans support favorable treatment of immigrants under certain conditions. For example, nearly three-quarters of those polled said children of U.S. citizens should receive favorable treatment in order to immigrate into the U.S. and 67% said spouses should receive favorable treatment.

Likewise, half of the 2,377 U.S. adults surveyed said they support favorable treatment of immigrants who "might be punished, imprisoned or tortured if they are sent home."

But about two-thirds of those polled said U.S. immigration policy shouldn't give preference to people from some countries over people from other countries, compared with 21% who said the U.S. policy should give preference.

Among the factors to be considered when admitting immigrants to the U.S., 56% said fluency in English should be considered, and 51% said job skills should be taken into account. About a third of those polled said level of education and country of origin should be factors, and only 6% said religion should be considered.

However, respondents were divided when asked if they think immigrants from some countries make "a bigger contribution" than others. A third of those polled said some make a bigger contribution, 34% said they "all equally contribute" and 33% said "not sure."

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., April 11-17, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,377 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. 35 Senators Vow To Back Spending Veto (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Thirty-five Senate Republicans signed a letter yesterday assuring President Bush they will back his veto of the emergency-spending bill for war efforts and hurricane relief if the final version exceeds his requested budget level.

"The Senate's willingness to support a veto reflects that we're not kidding about fiscal restraint and responsibility," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0026796

The signatures indicate there are more than enough votes to prevent the Senate from securing the two-thirds vote needed to override a veto.

Mr. Bush threatened this week to veto the emergency-spending bill if it goes beyond his requested level of $92.2 billion, plus an extra $2.3 billion the Senate added for pandemic flu preparation. Many conservatives had privately urged Mr. Bush to step up and make the threat, since the Senate version currently stands at $106.5 billion and contains many extra, unrelated spending items they want out.

But the first few tests of senators' willingness to cut the bill didn't go well. Senators voted 49-48 to kill a proposal that would have stripped a highly contentious $700 million plan to reroute a railroad in Mississippi -- dubbed by critics as "the railroad to nowhere."

And 72 senators voted to kill an amendment that would have immediately stripped the Senate bill down to Mr. Bush's level. Sen. Craig Thomas, Wyoming Republican, offered this proposal, which 26 Republicans supported.

When asked about the seeming inconsistency between the Republicans' letter and the refusal by some to cut the bill, a Senate Republican aide noted that the letter refers to the final House-Senate version of the bill.

Mr. Thomas said most members "want to reduce the total" cost, but are still discussing what to cut, so he wasn't surprised his proposal failed.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, offered the railroad-stripping proposal as one of 19 separate proposals to cut items from the bill.

"Mississippi will win if this happens, but the future of our country loses," he said of the railroad plan. "It's not an emergency."

Mississippi's two Republican senators vigorously defended the plan and lobbied fellow members to keep it in the bill. They argued the rail must be moved north, out of the path of future hurricanes. Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, was the deciding vote that allowed the measure to remain.

Mr. Coburn's time-consuming crusade didn't sit well with everyone. Sen. Christopher S. Bond, Missouri Republican, was overheard sarcastically complaining to an aide "That's just what I want to do -- vote on his 19 amendments."

As Republicans struggled over what and whether to cut, Democrats accused Mr. Bush of hypocrisy yesterday for his veto threat, saying he and Republicans have plunged the nation into debt over the past five years.

"We had a surplus five years ago," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York said yesterday, referring to the end of her husband's tenure. "But the combination of this White House and this Republican majority has blown all of that to smithereens. This president has never vetoed anything, and now we finally get a veto threat on an emergency supplemental."

Mrs. Clinton, widely seen as a 2008 presidential hopeful, compared Republicans' call for spending restraint to a boy killing his parents and then asking the judge for leniency because he's an orphan.

But Republicans dismissed the hypocrisy charge as politics. Sen. Johnny Isakson, Georgia Republican, said Democrats "proposed a whole lot more spending than we did" over the past few years.

GOP Senators Spurn Bush's Order To Cut Bill (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Defying a White House veto threat, the Republican-controlled Senate on Wednesday refused to pare back an emergency spending bill sought by President Bush that lawmakers had expanded to include their own pet projects, which included items as diverse as aid for farmers and money to reroute a Mississippi railroad.

The vote was a direct rebuff of Bush by a number of GOP senators and underscored a growing party rift at a time when the president's popularity has sunk to new lows in public opinion polls.

"I might be intimidated by my constituents, but not the president," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said in an interview.

The Senate vote against cutting the $106.5-billion bill was a lopsided 72-26, more than enough to override a veto.

About half of the chamber's Republicans joined most of its Democrats to reject the reduction proposal.

The bulk of the measure's money would pay for the ongoing expenses for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and for Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0026797

But earlier this week, Bush said he would veto the bill if its bottom line was not trimmed.

Last month, the House passed a $91.9-billion spending bill, which closely tracked with Bush's initial request.

Despite the Senate vote, several GOP lawmakers pledged to continue to try to cut the bill's cost.

They included Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who had encouraged Bush to issue his veto threat — an unusual step, given that the bill was crafted by other Republicans.

Bush has yet to veto a bill during his presidency.

Ultimately, Congress may send him a measure stripped of much of the funding he opposes.

"The bill we are debating is supposed to be about emergency spending — it's not an invitation to go on a shopping spree," Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) said, pressing the case for cuts.

Still, the willingness of so many other Republicans to stand by the added spending requests starkly reflected the new political reality on Capitol Hill.

Until recently, Republicans almost always marched behind Bush's priorities — especially on issues involving the war on terrorism.

But Wednesday's vote illustrated his diminished clout, as well as lawmakers' differing political pressures.

Although Bush is not on the ballot this year, many GOP incumbents are. And they want to show constituents they are tending to their needs, even if that means running afoul of the White House.

The Mississippi railroad project has emerged as the most controversial addition to the spending bill.

Lott and the state's other senator, Republican Thad Cochran, said the railroad needed to be relocated for safety reasons. The tracks run along the Gulf Coast and could be easily damaged in another hurricane, they said.

The White House budget office has objected to using taxpayer funds to relocate a privately owned rail line. Officials have noted that the railroad owner, CSX Corp., has been using its own money to repair damage to the tracks caused by Hurricane Katrina.

But Lott, who served in the House for 16 years before winning his Senate seat in 1988, made clear he would not be swayed by such arguments.

"The very idea that presidents, Republican or Democrat, have the only say over what is in a budget is outrageous," Lott told reporters. "I got elected. I was here when Bush got here, and I'll probably be here when he's gone."

Lott dismissed Bush's veto threat as "totally irrelevant at this point," given that any bill the Senate passed would have to be reconciled with the version that the House approved.

"I guess he's under pressure to veto something," Lott said. He added, "Thank you for your input, Mr. President."

The emergency spending measure also became the latest battleground in Congress' debate on overhauling the nation's immigration system when the Senate approved, 59-39, a provision that would allocate $1.9 billion to tighten border security.

The new money aimed at stemming the flow of illegal immigration into the U.S. would not increase the bill's cost because it would be offset by cuts to defense-related spending in other parts of the measure.

Some Republicans said the provision could improve the prospects for passing separate legislation to toughen border enforcement while creating a guest-worker program and a potential path to citizenship for many of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now in the country.

The immigration bill has stalled in part because Republicans disagree about whether it should focus solely on border security.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said the spending approved Wednesday could help build support for the broader approach to immigration, "because then we can convince our constituents that our first and most important priority is border security."

Democrats were skeptical that the spending provision for border security would affect the immigration stalemate.

"We hope it works, but it's too soon to tell," said a senior Democratic leadership aide who requested anonymity when discussing the legislative jockeying.

A number of Democrats opposed the border provision, saying that paying for it could harm U.S. troops by reducing defense-related funding. The foes included Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.).

DOJ_NMG_0026798

But Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) broke with party colleagues to support the $1.9-billion proposal. "This is what people are calling my office and saying — that we need to secure the border."

Army Chief Laments Defense Budget Fights (AP-Y2)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP2, April 26, 2006

Americans spent as much on "plastic Santa Clauses," tinsel and other holiday purchases last year as they will for defense in the coming year, the Army's top general said Wednesday, lamenting complaints about the military's budget requests.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told reporters: "I just don't understand. ... What's the problem?"

Schoomaker said the defense budget the Bush administration requested for the fiscal year starting in October — nearly $440 billion — plus the costs of war in Iraq and Afghanistan, is 3.9 percent of the nation's nearly $13 trillion overall economy.

During World War II, military expenditures accounted for more than one-third of the economy, he said, calling today's piece of the pie the "lowest percent ... that we've ever spent in wartime."

"Here's what is amazing to me. ... What do you think we spent on plastic Santa Clauses and tinsel and all this stuff for Christmas last year ... the holidays?" Schoomaker asked during a meeting with reporters. "The answer is $438.5 billion, roughly equivalent to the defense budget."

The general said he got the figure on Christmas spending from a newspaper clipping quoting the National Retail Association.

The actual number from the National Retail Federation was a few billion less — $435.3 billion — and it was a projection for "winter holidays," meaning it included Thanksgiving turkeys and other seasonal spending, said federation spokeswoman Kathy Grannis.

Even so, the general's point was clear: America is a rich country, and he thinks it needs to spend more on defense.

Schoomaker was discussing his concern that it might take a fight to get enough money from Congress to rebuild the Army's equipment and supplies worn down in Iraq and Afghanistan. Officials have said the military would continue to submit requests for such money for at least two years after the last troops come home — which President Bush has said will probably be years from now.

"I've told Congress this," he said to a defense writers group. "I've told everybody this: What's the problem?"

"I mean I don't get it," Schoomaker said. "We've got a lot to be thankful for in this country, and we've got a lot to lose. And one of the first responsibilities of government is to defend the country. The Constitution says that."

Asked about Schoomaker's remarks, the No. 2 House Democratic leader, Rep. Steny Hoyer (news, bio, voting record) of Maryland, said he believed the general was frustrated over the budget pressures his agency is facing.

"My gut is, his real problem is he knows we're spending a very large amount on Iraq and Afghanistan and, at the same time, spending is squeezed very tightly in other areas" like training and equipment, Hoyer said.

The Bush administration recently requested an additional $68 billion for those wars for 2006. That would bring the total proposed for approval for this year for the wars to $118 billion.

Congress Democrats Eye Iraq Spending Talks (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

AP2, April 26, 2006

Accusing the Bush administration of a failed policy in Iraq, all 23 Democrats on the House International Relations Committee on Wednesday demanded congressional hearings on what they said was waste and fraud in reconstruction efforts.

"No one has been held accountable," said Rep. Adam Schiff (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif. "More than $9 billion transferred to the CPA is missing," said Rep. William Delahunt (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., referring to the interim U.S. occupation institution, the Coalition Provisional Authority.

"We know nothing," said Diane Watson, D-Calif., at a hearing that several Democrats said was the first the committee held on Iraq this year. "We as decision-makers get nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0026799

But panel Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said he had held nine hearings on Iraq, and Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., said "many committees including ours" had reviewed the Iraq situation.

Tempers flared as Democrats accused President Bush of failure and the GOP-controlled committee of shirking its responsibilities. Only a few Republicans attended the session.

"It's a quagmire, it's a mess," said Rep. Betty McCollum (news, bio, voting record), D-Minn. "We should take our responsibilities seriously and hold Bush accountable."

There was no immediate decision on the Democrats' request, which was coupled with charges of "waste, fraud and abuse" in a letter to Hyde circulated by Rep. Tom Lantos (news, bio, voting record) of California, the committee's senior Democrat.

Mississippi Burning Tax Dollars (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

Just when you thought Republicans had sworn off pork spending, along comes an emergency appropriations bill that has Capitol Hill engulfed in the unmistakable aroma of bacon. President Bush has requested $92.2 billion for Iraq and hurricane relief, to which GOP Senators have added $14 billion or more in earmarks to benefit casino operators, condo developers, the shrimp and oyster industry, defense contractors, cotton and corn farmers and other urgent priorities. Mr. Bush threatens his first-ever veto unless the spending bill is cut back to below $95 billion.

Running to the taxpayers' rescue is Senate pork-buster Tom Coburn, last seen battling Alaska's infamous $233 million Bridge to Nowhere. As early as today the Oklahoma Republican will force an up-or-down vote on whether to strip the bill of $700 million for the proposed "Railroad to Nowhere." This pet project of Mississippi Republicans Trent Lott and Thad Cochran would reroute railroad tracks that CSX spent $250 million to repair after Hurricane Katrina. The Senators wish to make room for a new road that would just happen to service the gambling and beachfront condominium district of Biloxi.

Is this a good use of tax dollars? Mississippians don't think so. Last year Governor Haley Barbour's commission on recovery from Hurricane Katrina rejected the project as "no longer seen as practical" because of the steep price tag. If Mississippians don't want to foot the bill, why should federal taxpayers?

Fiscal-Conservatives-Come-Lately (NYT)

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

President Bush is threatening to veto this year's emergency budget supplement for the Iraq war and hurricane recovery efforts — he's suddenly shocked, shocked that his own Republican-led Senate has steadily inflated it with $14 billion in unrelated goodies. As if this sort of fiscal mayhem is not the now-familiar fallout from the administration's own signature fecklessness in adding to the record debt and deficit for future generations to handle.

This year's $92 billion "must pass" measure, while supposedly restricted to the pressing costs of the war and the post-Katrina Gulf Coast repairs, has been turned into a fiscal Christmas tree. Billions have been added for extra farm subsidies, highway repairs, higher education, veterans' health care and forest maintenance, and even a $15 million bauble for something that's called a "seafood promotion strategy."

Taxpayers interested in fiscal sanity should first wonder why, three years into the war, its costs are still being rushed through Congress by administration planners who are obviously wary of detailed accountability. No less irresponsible is the growing penchant of members of Congress to bypass the harsher tests of the regular budget process in favor of giving their pet projects a ride aboard the White House's annual "emergency" express. The $4 billion the Senate ponied up for extra farm subsidies certainly deserves a more serious look, considering that farm incomes have been booming, in part because of a record $23 billion in crop subsidies.

What's at the heart of the veto threat is an intramural Republican war over a feared mutiny by voters this November. House Republicans running as fiscal "hawks" (after years of cheerleading for the costly Bush tax cuts for the affluent) back the president's budget request; the Senate Republicans who are more concerned about popular spending programs opt for the add-ons. No one mentions the responsibility to find revenues to someday pay for all this, plus debt costs.

DOJ_NMG_0026800

With his eye on a run for the White House, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, one of the enablers of the administration's ongoing budget mess, scolded his colleagues to take care "not to blow the bank on the back of war." But the bank's already been blown.

Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, made that point last month in his previous role as a conservative polemicist: "A Republican president and a Republican Congress have lost control of the federal budget."

Medicare Rule Guarantees Continuity Of Drugs (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — The Bush administration issued a new policy on Wednesday that protects Medicare beneficiaries against the sudden loss of coverage for drugs they are taking under the prescription drug program.

Under the policy, insurers can still change their lists of covered drugs, known as formularies. But if they drop any drugs or impose new restrictions, they must exempt beneficiaries who are now taking those drugs.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, summarized the policy this way: "In general, a plan cannot change your coverage for the drugs you are using during the year. The stability of drug formularies is extremely important for many of our beneficiaries."

The policy addresses one of the chief criticisms of the Medicare drug benefit. Democrats and a few Republicans in Congress had said it was unfair that drug plans could change their formularies at will while most beneficiaries were locked into a drug plan for the full year. This disparity was a major concern for many consumer advocates and for some beneficiaries.

The new policy says, "No beneficiaries will be subject to a discontinuation or reduction in coverage of the drugs they are currently using," with some limited exceptions.

An insurer could, for example, remove a drug from its formulary if new research showed that the drug was unsafe for some patients, or if a new low-cost generic version of a brand-name product became available.

The Bush administration issued the policy with less than three weeks remaining before the May 15 deadline for people to sign up for Medicare drug coverage. People who miss the deadline will generally not have another opportunity until November and will then face higher premiums as a penalty for late enrollment. People can switch plans at the end of each year without penalty.

Karen M. Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, an industry trade group, said her organization supported the new federal requirement even though "it does not reflect common practice in the private sector," where employers provide drug coverage to millions of workers and retirees.

Ms. Ignagni said the federal policy "will have a financial impact," increasing costs for insurers under Medicare. But, she said, "you need to balance that with the goal of providing continuity of drug coverage and peace of mind to beneficiaries."

In most states, 40 or more drug plans are available. They differ in premiums, co-payments, deductibles and other details. Some plans cover fewer than 800 drugs. Some cover more than 1,800.

Insurers have many tools to manage use of prescription drugs. They can, for example, require doctors to get prior approval for prescriptions and can limit the number of pills given to a patient each month.

The policy says that an insurer can remove a drug from its formulary, increase co-payments or impose new restrictions "only if enrollees currently taking the affected drug are exempt from the formulary change for the remainder of the plan year."

Dr. McClellan, the Medicare administrator, said his agency had received 4,600 requests from drug plans that wanted to change their formularies. About 3,100, he said, involve the addition of drugs or relatively minor changes. About 1,500 requests involve more significant changes that will be covered by the new requirement, he said.

In a memorandum being sent to insurers, the Bush administration says the policy is needed to protect beneficiaries against "bait and switch" tactics in the drug benefit program, known as Part D of Medicare.

"Medicare beneficiaries select Part D plans, in part, based on the formulary that is marketed during annual open enrollment and therefore have a legitimate expectation that they will have continuing access to coverage of the Part D drugs they are using throughout the plan year," the memorandum says.

DOJ_NMG_0026801

Nothing in the new policy fills the gap in coverage found in most plans. After incurring $2,250 in drug costs, beneficiaries typically must pay all of the next $2,850, until catastrophic coverage kicks in.

The policy was issued just as Senator Max Baucus of Montana and other Democrats were putting the final touches on a bill to increase protections for Medicare beneficiaries.

Dr. McClellan said insurers had legitimate reasons for changing formularies because "drug therapies are constantly evolving as new drugs are developed and new medical knowledge becomes available."

Tough Choices Can Be Side Effects Of Medicare Plan (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And Julie Appleby

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — They are poor or near-poor, old, disabled or both. Some have cancer or AIDS, schizophrenia or bipolar disorder, spinal cord injuries or multiple sclerosis. Others have lists of medications as long as the alphabet.

They're paying more for their drugs, perhaps as little as $1 per prescription, but often thousands of dollars a year. Some buy on credit without knowing how they'll pay it off. Others scrimp on food and utilities or rely on the charity of family and friends.

When things get really bad, they space out their pills or injections, risking medical setbacks. They lose weight or swell up or get nauseated. Some wind up in emergency rooms.

They are the people that Medicare's new prescription-drug program has hurt, rather than helped. Most of the program's beneficiaries have saved money since it began Jan. 1. But for others, perhaps about 20%, the much-heralded program has meant higher costs, and in some cases greater pain and more worry.

“The people who need this the most can fight the least,” says Victoria D'Angelo of Denver, a former legal secretary now living on Social Security disability payments while battling bipolar disorder, asthma, high blood pressure and other ailments. “We don't have the strength. We don't have the mental ability.”

Before Medicare, 6.4 million of them had drug coverage through Medicaid. Others had state help or free drugs from drug companies. “They had good coverage before this program began,” says Ron Pollack of Families USA, a liberal health care advocacy group. Now, “there's a sizeable group that is actually worse off.”

On Wednesday, two advocacy groups and three patients sued the federal government in an effort to improve the plight of the 6.4 million people transferred from Medicaid to the Medicare plan.

“Our clients are poor, frail and disabled. They cannot afford to pay for their medicines or to go without them,” said Vicki Gottlich of the Center for Medicare Advocacy, which joined the National Senior Citizens Law Center in filing the lawsuit.

Since the Medicare program went into effect, many states have dropped their drug-assistance programs. Many drug companies have stopped accepting Medicare enrollees into programs that last year donated 35 million prescriptions to low-income people, according to the industry's trade group.

Among the manufacturers cutting back are Eli Lilly, AstraZeneca, Bristol-Myers Squibb and Wyeth. Ed Sagebiel, spokesman for Eli Lilly, says the program was “a bridge” to Medicare's drug benefit.

Companies such as Schering-Plough, Merck and Novartis have continued to provide free drugs to Medicare beneficiaries, due in part to an advisory opinion from the Department of Health and Human Services.

Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan has urged others to join them, “so beneficiaries can have the Medicare program and the assistance programs.”

Across the country, many low-income people face rising costs and dwindling health:

•In Denver, D'Angelo, 56, saw her drug costs under Medicare rise to more than $500 a month. Now they're even higher, because she has reached the “doughnut hole,” a period during which Medicare beneficiaries with high drug costs must pay for 100% of their prescriptions. Although she has cut back on her 22 medications, she recently put $2,679.19 on her credit card for a three-month supply. “I have no idea how I'm going to pay for it,” she says.

•In Jacksonville, mentally ill residents of Doug Atkins' assisted-living facility are refusing to spend part of their $54 monthly personal allowance on $1 and $3 drug co-payments. “They're saying they'll just go to the emergency room,” Atkins says.

DOJ_NMG_0026802

•In Lafayette, La., Dorothy Broussard, 58, went a week in February without her arthritis and multiple sclerosis drugs because she was in the "doughnut hole." Her prescriptions came to about $1,400 per month. "I almost passed out in the pharmacy."

Class-Action Suit Targets Medicare (LAT)

By Rong-gong Lin li

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

A class-action lawsuit filed in federal court Wednesday alleges that Medicare has failed to properly enroll millions of low-income seniors and disabled beneficiaries into its new prescription drug plan.

The suit, filed in Oakland on behalf of three women and two senior-advocacy groups, also alleges that some low-income beneficiaries eligible for a subsidy were not properly notified about it or not receiving it. As a result of the problems, many seniors and others who qualify for the program are going without critical medication, said lead attorney Jeanne Finberg of the National Senior Citizens Law Center.

"The system simply isn't working," Finberg said. "Clients are falling through the cracks."

More than 6 million low-income senior and disabled beneficiaries, who had received drug coverage under Medicaid, the government health program for the poor, were required to be automatically enrolled into Medicare Part D plans Jan. 1. But that transfer was plagued by errors because databases to verify eligibility weren't ready or contained conflicting information.

Though he declined to comment directly on the suit, Medicare spokesman Peter Ashkenaz said the agency has resolved the enrollment problems it faced at the beginning of the year.

The lawsuit seeks a federal judge to issue a permanent injunction forcing Medicare to resolve the enrollment problems, inform drug plans that low-income beneficiaries are eligible for subsidies, and "take any and all other steps to ensure that plaintiffs and class members receive the full benefits of the Part D program."

1 In 5 Pay More In Medicare Rx Plan (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Medicare's new prescription-drug program has increased out-of-pocket costs for about one in five participants, causing some to risk their health by reducing or eliminating medications.

Though most of the more than 30 million beneficiaries enrolled in the program are saving money, two recent surveys suggest a substantial minority of seniors and people with disabilities are not:

•A Kaiser Family Foundation poll taken April 6-11 found 55% of 154 seniors who had enrolled said the plan would save them money, 19% said it would cost more, and another 19% said they would break even.

•A KRC Research poll taken March 15-20 for the Medicare Rx Education Network, a consortium of groups working to implement the law, found 59% of 201 enrolled seniors saved money, but 23% did not.

Both polls rely on small samples of beneficiaries and have large margins of error: +/-8 percentage points for the Kaiser poll, for example. But they confirm what had been predicted about the program since it went into effect Jan. 1: There are millions for whom the plan is increasing drug costs.

Among them: most of the 6.4 million low-income people transferred from state Medicaid drug programs. Most had no co-payments for drugs under Medicaid but now pay $1 to $5 per drug.

Others include those who used to get drugs for free from drug companies or at reduced cost in state programs; those who had less expensive employer retiree coverage; and those with little or no current drug expenses who signed up for a Medicare plan as a hedge against future costs. That last group is paying premiums but getting little or no benefit. Premiums will rise after the May 15 sign-up deadline for those not yet enrolled.

Medicare officials acknowledge that many low-income seniors and disabled Americans are paying more. They are urging drug companies and states to continue assistance to the poor who rely on expensive medications. "Any extra help they need can and should be provided by those other sources," says Kathleen Harrington, director of external affairs at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

DOJ_NMG_0026803

In one case, a 59-year-old Newburgh, N.Y., man died in March after he stopped taking medications he could no longer afford, according to his pharmacist and his cousin. Eddie Rosa, whose death was first reported by the Middletown, N.Y., Times Herald-Record, lived alone and suffered from heart disease, diabetes, seizures and other mental and physical conditions.

Despite those illnesses, his pharmacist, Marty Irons, says, "I really think he'd be alive today if he had all his medicines." Adds his cousin, Dolores Reano, "When Medicare came in, it just blew him away."

When the Medicare drug program went into effect, Steve Worrell, 53, of Black Hawk, Colo., lost the free medications he had been getting from a drug company for his disabling arthritis. Faced with a $5,400 annual bill under Medicare, he spaced out his injections. His condition worsened. "You start swelling up, and you start twisting more," he says.

Maria Oranje of Oakley, Calif., who turned 100 on Wednesday, is luckier. She takes 26 medications, but since she was switched from Medicaid to the Medicare program in January, her co-payments have been picked up by her daughter, Greta Heartfill, 62.

"If it wasn't for her living with me (and me) taking care of all this stuff," Heartfill says of her mother, "she would not have been able to make it."

Congress Is Studying Title-Insurer Practices (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the wake of recent state and federal investigations into title insurance, lawmakers here are turning critical toward the industry.

A subcommittee of the House Financial Services Committee met yesterday, with an eye toward pushing for more consumer friendly competition in the title business.

Millions of Americans need title insurance in order to obtain a mortgage, because lenders want to be sure the properties that back their loans are free of outstanding claims or liens. Title insurers work to uncover such encumbrances, and issue policies that can protect the buyer or lender if any do turn up later.

Home buyers, however, are often unfamiliar with title insurance. A preliminary report by the Government Accountability Office notes consumers often rely on real-estate lenders and agents to find their title insurers. As a result, title agents normally market to those professionals, "creating a form of competition from which the benefit to consumers is not always clear."

Officials in Colorado, California and Washington, D.C., have investigated the industry in recent years, in some cases alleging that title companies paid what amounted to kickbacks to get business. Industry representatives contend there is competition, and prices properly reflect the cost of doing title searches.

Michael Oxley, chairman of the Financial Services Committee, indicated that Congress can do more to foment competition and said the investigations showed an "endemic problem."

"Consumers are paying home-purchase costs that are artificially high because of the lack of competition in real-estate services," he said. Erin Toll, the deputy insurance commissioner in Colorado, who has investigated the industry, told the panel, "The playing field is not level."

No Quid Pro Quo In Land Deal, Says W.Va. Democrat (WP)

By The Washington Post

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) said this week that his purchase of farm property with a corporate chief executive has no relationship to his support for legislation providing a $2.1 million defense contract to the CEO's company.

Responding to a Wall Street Journal report published Tuesday, Mollohan said he and Dale R. McBride, head of FMW Composite Systems Inc. of Bridgeport, W.Va., have been close friends for 50 years.

Mollohan, who recently resigned from his position as the ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee because of a controversy over other investments, said he and McBride plan to use the 300-acre property for personal recreation, not for development.

DOJ_NMG_0026804

Mollohan contended that he and McBride are equally at risk and equally responsible for paying off the eight-year, $900,000 mortgage they obtained from the previous owner, a widow.

"This has everything to do with friendship," he said, referring to the land acquisition. "This is totally 50-50," he added, saying that he received no special treatment from McBride.

Mollohan said he supported the $2.1 million contract for FMW after asking the same questions he applies to all decisions concerning money going to his home state: "Is it a good project, and does it mean jobs and economic development for West Virginia?"

The conservative National Legal and Policy Center filed a 500-page complaint against Mollohan with a U.S. attorney in February, challenging the accuracy of Mollohan's financial disclosure forms and detailing the run-up in Mollohan's wealth in recent years.

From 2000 to 2004, the congressman's holdings in real estate and other assets shot up in value from $562,000 to at least $6.3 million. Mollohan has argued that there is nothing untoward in the growth of his net worth, and that he has benefited from the surge in real estate values across the country.

In addition to winning approval of the contract for McBride's company, Mollohan used his position on the House Appropriations Committee to secure more than $150 million in appropriations for five nonprofit groups in his congressional district, including one run by a former congressional aide who, along with her husband, bought $2 million worth of property with Mollohan and his wife, according to an April 8 report in the Journal.

No Outcry About Lobby Scandal, Lawmakers Say (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

The scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has been a Washington obsession for months, but Republican lawmakers who returned from a two-week recess this week said they felt free to pass a relatively tepid ethics bill because their constituents rarely mention the issue.

The House is scheduled to vote today on ethics legislation to increase lobbyists' disclosures and require lawmakers to own up to the earmarks, or narrow projects, that they insert into appropriations bills. But the measure would not restrict the gifts or meals provided by lobbyists as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) had proposed in January, nor would it expand the number of enforcers of lobbying rules and laws.

Lawmakers acknowledge that the bill is more limited in its scope and impact than the provisions promised by congressional leaders immediately after Abramoff's guilty plea to federal charges of bribery, conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud nearly four months ago. But they say they do not feel compelled to push more stringent measures partly because voters do not appear to be demanding them. "We're all being rushed into a bill," said Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio). "We panicked, and we let the media get us panicked."

Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.), a former ethics committee chairwoman, said passage of the bill will have no political consequences because "people are quite convinced that the rhetoric of reform is just political."

Some Republican leaders assert that lawmakers are hearing little from constituents about the congressional corruption scandal, even though it has received considerable media attention. Jo Maney, spokeswoman for Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), a chief architect of the House ethics bill, said: "Many members have told him [Dreier] that they are not hearing about corruption and lobbying reform at home. They hear more about immigration, gas prices." Still, Dreier and Hastert "feel strongly" that the ethics bill "is the right thing to do" and that it will "improve the public's perception of the integrity of the House of Representatives," Maney added.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll this month showed that 63 percent of Americans called "corruption in Washington" important to their vote. Democrats are eager to use the lobbying controversy as part of their campaign to win back control of Congress this year, and they contend that the corruption issue can be a powerful Election Day weapon.

A poll this month by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press showed the public giving Democrats an edge on the ethics issue. Twenty-eight percent of Americans said they think the Republican Party governs in an honest and ethical way, compared with 36 percent who said the Democrats are more ethical, according to the survey. By a ratio of 45 percent to 28 percent, respondents said that Republicans are influenced more by lobbyists and special interests than are Democrats.

Democratic strategists say that the ethics issue does not carry a lot of weight by itself. They say that, to win over voters, they must link Republicans' alleged coziness with lobbyists to failures in Washington to address specific public needs, such as health-care coverage and economic security. "It is up to us to show the public what this means to them," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). For example, she said: "If [we] want to reduce our dependence on foreign oil, and therefore improve our national security situation, you can't do it if you are a Republican because you are too wedded to the oil companies."

Republicans won back control of the House and the Senate in 1994 after making Democratic political corruption part of the larger issue of arrogance of power and poor performance in government, according to Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. The Democrats' burden now, he said, is to make that larger connection to voters.

Republicans counter that Democrats have ethical problems of their own that blunt their effort to portray the GOP as the party of corruption. Two Democratic congressmen are facing separate, official inquiries about their connections to private pleaders: Reps. Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) and William J. Jefferson (La.). Both say they have done nothing wrong.

"The Democrat party runs a real risk here of being the pot that calls the kettle black," said Tracey Schmitt, press secretary of the Republican National Committee.

Some lawmakers and political analysts believe that voters could punish incumbents during the November elections if Congress passes a minimalist ethics bill. The chances of such a backlash could rise, these critics say, if there are more indictments or guilty pleas later this year. Abramoff and two former aides to Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) are cooperating with federal authorities in a wide-ranging investigation of political favors done in return for gifts, trips, payments and campaign contributions. DeLay, a once-powerful House majority leader, is fighting a criminal indictment in Texas on charges of political money laundering.

Some congressional historians assert that GOP leaders would be taking a risk in assuming that the lobbying bill is of such low voter priority that they could push through a modest plan without paying a political cost. "When you combine [the ethics issue] with the general dissatisfaction with the way in which we are governed," said L. Sandy Maisel, a professor of government at Colby College, "I think the breaking point might be near."

Today, the House plans to vote on a bill that would require lobbyists to file quarterly instead of semiannual disclosures and to include in those reports the donations they give to federal candidates and political action committees. Lobbyists would also have to make public the amount of any gift that they give to lawmakers or congressional aides. In addition, appropriations bills would have to list any earmarks that they contain, as well as the sponsors of those projects. Ethics training would become mandatory in the House under the legislation.

Government watchdog groups have complained that the legislation would not change much about how lawmakers and lobbyists interact. "It's a reform bill in name only, and they're hoping no one will notice," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

Tom Fitton, president of Judicial Watch, a conservative public interest organization, said one reason for the bill's weakness is that the public is not riled up about lobbying abuses. "The American people take the view that both parties are involved and there's not much surprising about it," he said.

Lawmakers Backtrack On Spending, Ethics Reforms (BSH/KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn, Knight Ridder

Biloxi Sun Herald, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Just weeks after declaring themselves fiscal and ethical reformers, lawmakers are adding billions of dollars in special projects to a spending bill for the Iraq war while retreating from some of the lobbying restrictions they'd once touted as the antidote to a spate of scandals.

The House of Representatives is scheduled to vote Thursday on a package of ethics rules and measures designed to cut back on "earmarks," the special pork-barrel spending projects that routinely festoon congressional appropriations.

DOJ_NMG_0026806

Government watchdog groups dismiss the House ethics proposals as cosmetic changes, but because some senior Republicans oppose even those as too binding, the outcome of the vote remained in doubt Wednesday.

In the Senate, lawmakers are working their way through a $106.5 billion bill that would pay for the war in Iraq and for hurricane-related costs. But the Senate version is $14.5 billion more than President Bush requested and could grow even bigger, larded with money for lawmakers' pet causes.

The White House this week threatened to veto the bill if it exceeded Bush's request. It made a special point of objecting to a $700 million railroad relocation in Mississippi added by the state's two Republican senators, Trent Lott and Thad Cochran. On Wednesday, 35 Senate Republicans sent a letter to Bush pledging to vote to sustain his veto if he casts it, enough to ensure that it would stick.

Yet Congress' continued appetite for unchecked spending and backpedaling on ethics illustrates how hard it is to change behavior that's ingrained in Washington's political culture. Many lawmakers believe that changing ethics rules would criminalize innocent conduct. Many lawmakers also believe that they - not government bureaucrats - know best how to spend federal money back home.

"My leadership doesn't think we have an ethics problem and doesn't believe in reform," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., one of the leading Republican advocates for tighter ethics rules. The pending legislation, Shays said, "has no redeeming feature."

Recent guilty pleas by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., have spotlighted the crossroads of ethics and special-interest spending.

"Earmarks are the currency of corruption," said Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz.

The House bill would give lawmakers new powers to challenge legislation that contains earmarks, but advocates of more sweeping changes wanted to block members altogether from being able to add such individual spending items to bills. The proposed restrictions would apply only to appropriations bills, not tax or policy legislation, which also often contains special-interest favors.

The Republican chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Jerry Lewis of California, objects to restrictions on earmarks that affect only appropriations bills. Appropriators point out that another infamous spending proposal - the so-called $230 million "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska - was inserted into a massive transportation policy bill. It was eliminated only after a deluge of national publicity led the Senate to strike it.

Critics of the House bill say it also falls short on restricting lawmakers' access to privately paid travel and to corporate jets. The House legislation temporarily bans privately funded travel through the November election, but provides no permanent remedy.

Lawmakers currently reimburse corporations for use of their aircraft at a rate equal to that of a first-class ticket. But the cost of a corporate jet is significantly higher, amounting to a contribution to members of Congress. The legislation simply prohibits a company lobbyist from accompanying a lawmaker on such a flight.

Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., the chairman of the House Rules Committee and lead author of the House bill, defended it as a "bold package of reform." He noted that former members of Congress who are lobbyists would no longer be allowed in the House gym or on the House floor and that lobbyists would have to disclose their clients and issues of interest with more frequency.

In the Senate, the spending bill for the Iraq war and the hurricane aftermath is considered "must pass" emergency legislation. That means it can't be blocked easily through parliamentary maneuvers. As a result, the bill has become a popular bipartisan vehicle for additional spending.

One of the biggest extra provisions was inserted by Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., whose ties to Abramoff have made his race for re-election difficult. Burns inserted $3.9 billion to help farmers hurt by any natural disaster, not just last year's hurricanes. The money includes aid to offset the high costs of oil, making agriculture one of the few industries to get energy-related assistance.

"No other industry in this country buys retail, sells wholesale and pays freight both ways," Burns said.

The Senate did manage to show a bit of restraint Wednesday. It tacked on to the bill $1.9 billion for border security while reducing military spending by a similar amount, but that was an exception.

DOJ_NMG_0026807

Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour was in the Capitol on Wednesday lobbying for the $700 million to relocate a railroad line inland from the coast and build a highway to correct coastal bottlenecks. Critics have come to call the project "the railroad to nowhere."

"A lot of people get focused on the railroad who don't understand the purpose of moving the railroad is so we can replace it with a highway," Barbour said.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., a staunch critic of earmarks, offered an amendment Wednesday to eliminate 19 earmarks from the bill.

"This is a good plan in Mississippi," he said. "It's just not a plan that the people of the rest of the country ... ought to be asked to do."

But the Senate voted 49-48 early Wednesday evening to kill Coburn's bid to knock out the $700 million for Mississippi's project. And among those voting against Coburn were several of the 35 senators who had pledged earlier in the day to back Bush's veto if he cast it.

GOP Split Over Earmarks In Ethics Bill (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, April 26, 2006

House approval of legislation to tighten lobbying and ethics rules was complicated Wednesday by a Republican split over how to deal with the issue of earmarks, those narrow and often wasteful pet projects that make their way into bigger bills.

With a vote on the lobbying package scheduled for Thursday, the GOP leadership was trying to resolve concerns, coming mainly from Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee.

The lobbying bill, which requires lobbyists to report more frequently on their work to influence lawmakers and temporarily bans privately sponsored travel by House members, allows lawmakers to raise points of order against appropriations, or spending bills, that do not properly identify earmarks.

But Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., said it was unfair that the crackdown on earmarks was limited to spending bills, and did not apply to tax and authorization, or policy, bills.

A reform bill that "does not touch on the 'Bridge to Nowhere' is not really reform," Lewis said Wednesday. Two proposed bridge projects with a cost of some $450 million, in sparsely populated areas of Alaska, were highlighted as among the more egregious of thousands of earmarks that made their way into a major highway bill the Congress passed last year.

Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield said appropriators were not out to defeat the lobbying bill, only to improve it.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said they would continue working on the differences over earmarks. "Going after those earmarks, bringing more transparency and more accountability to that process, will in fact lead to less numbers of earmarks," he said.

"We're trying to open the process," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. "And anytime you do that, people have their own views. It's hard to change things around here, but that's what we're committed to do."

The Senate overwhelmingly passed its version of lobbying reform last month, but the House measure has hit much more resistance, with Democrats and good government groups arguing that the bill is too weak to have any real effect on lobbying practices that led to the scandal of disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

The Senate bill bans all gifts and meals from lobbyists and doubles to two years the waiting period before a retiring lawmaker can take a job lobbying Congress. It also requires lobbyists to disclose their participation in grassroots lobbying campaigns, where the general public is encouraged to contact lawmakers through phone calls and ads.

The House leadership has also decided to attach to the lobbying bill a measure passed by the House earlier this month that limits donations to nonprofit political groups known as 527s. Such groups tended to back Democrats in the 2004 presidential election, and Senate Democrats have said they will oppose any lobbying bill that includes the campaign finance measure.

Stabenow Campaign Corrects Finance Records (AP)

By Ken Thomas

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Debbie Stabenow's campaign has corrected her campaign finance reports to show that some donations from 2002 and 2003 came from an Indian tribe then represented by now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, not an individual as she reported at the time.

Stabenow's campaign originally reported that $4,000 in donations came from Christopher Petras, who was the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe's legislative director at the time. The donations came during a period in which Stabenow and other Michigan lawmakers sought funding for the tribe and wrote letters to federal regulators on the tribe's behalf.

The campaign wrote the Federal Election Commission on April 14 to correct the report to show the donations came from the tribe. Records originally listed Petras as giving Stabenow's campaign $2,000 on March 6, 2002, and an equal amount on June 30, 2003. Copies of the checks showed the first was dated Feb. 20, 2002, and the second June 2, 2003.

Stabenow campaign manager Tom Russell said Wednesday the tribe made the contributions and the error was "a glitch in filing the report which was corrected" as soon as it learned of the problem. He said the computer system attached Petras' name to the donations because he was listed as a contact for the tribe.

The wealthy Mount Pleasant, Mich., tribe, which operates a casino, contributed $308,980 during the 2002 campaign cycle and $564,480 during the 2004 campaign, according to campaign finance watchdog group PoliticalMoneyLine.com.

The tribe received $3 million in funding approved in November 2003 to build a school on the reservation. Earlier this month, tribal leaders asked that the funding be redirected to other federal programs.

Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud, turned to Republicans, including Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, to overcome the Bush administration's objection to providing the school funding for the tribe.

Stabenow, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Rep. Dave Camp, R-Mich., wrote the Interior Department on Jan. 23, 2003, and again on July 14, 2003, regarding the funding. The tribe made campaign donations to the three lawmakers, but they have said there was no connection between the letters and the donations.

Burns has said he acted at the Michigan lawmakers' request and wasn't influenced by Abramoff. His campaign has returned or donated to charity about $150,000 linked to the lobbyist.

Brian Nick, a National Republican Senatorial Committee spokesman, said it appeared that "Stabenow received thousands of dollars just before taking actions on behalf of a close associate of convicted felon Jack Abramoff, and now years later has gone back and doctored her campaign report in an attempt to avoid scrutiny."

Democrats Urge Hearings Into VA Contract (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche

Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats on the House Veterans Affairs Committee called for hearings Wednesday into a multimillion-dollar contract awarded to a firm now headed by former Veterans Affairs Secretary Anthony J. Principi.

Principi is chairman of the board of QTC Management Inc., a Diamond Bar company that administers medical exams under contract for the VA. In a two-page letter to Rep. Stephen E. Buyer (R-Ind.), chairman of the House panel that oversees the VA, seven Democrats asked for investigations into exam costs by the company and into possible conflicts of interest in awarding the contract.

"Our committee should review the facts and circumstances involving Mr. Principi and the QTC contracts to determine if there was any wrongdoing," the letter said. It sought a hearing date no later than Oct. 6.

Buyer could not be reached for a response Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0026809

Principi previously told The Times that he fully complied with federal ethics laws, and that as VA secretary for four years he played no role whatsoever in the awarding or administration of the contracts. Under the contracts, QTC conducts exams on veterans applying for disability benefits.

Principi, who was the president of QTC when he was nominated for the top VA job in late 2000, said he divested himself of all interests in the firm before being sworn in as secretary. He also said he had never heard of QTC until mid-1999, when he was recruited for the top job at the company by a headhunting firm. Principi had served as a top VA official under former President George H.W. Bush.

Officials of the American Federation of Government Employees issued a statement criticizing the contract.

"This is a conflict of interest in the most extreme form," said union President John Gage, adding that the exams could be performed by VA staffers at a far lower cost.

Gage called award of a contract to a firm connected to a political appointee "flat wrong," and said the case "should definitely raise red flags with members of Congress."

The Times reported Sunday that data compiled by a consulting firm in 1999 estimated that the cost of the QTC exams was as much as 400% higher than in-house exams. The consultants recommended that the VA do a follow-up study to get more precise cost data on the in-house costs. It was never conducted.

In their letter to Buyer, the seven House Democrats, including ranking member Lane Evans (D-Ill.), said the full committee "should address if the leader of an organization who has essentially divested himself from a prior business interest can, even unintentionally, influence the award of a business contract or provide an advantage to his former firm."

As Principi has pointed out, he was not at the VA or QTC when the firm first won a contract from the VA in 1998. The firm won a second contract in 2003, while Principi was running the VA. It has been revised by amendments and remains in effect today.

Congressional Budget Office projections show the firm's VA contract could be worth as much as $1.2 billion in fees if fully funded by Congress through 2008.

VA officials said the agency complied with bidding requirements by publicly advertising for bids 30 days before an October 2002 deadline. QTC was the only firm to submit a proposal. Officials of other firms said they were not aware the contract was up for bid, though they had previously expressed interest to the VA.

Stuck With Bush (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

If George W. Bush could have been removed from office for being a bad president, he would have been sent back to his ranch a long time ago.

If incompetence were a criminal offense, he'd be behind bars.

But that's just daydreaming. The reality is that there are more than two and a half years left in the long dark night of the Bush presidency — nearly as long as the entire time John Kennedy was in office.

The nation seems, very belatedly, to be catching on to the tragic failures and monumental ineptitude of its president. Mr. Bush's poll numbers are abysmal. Republicans up for re-election are running from him as if he were the bogyman.

Callers to conservative talk radio programs who were once ecstatic about the president and his policies are now deeply disillusioned.

The libertarian Cato Institute is about to release a study titled "Power Surge: The Constitutional Record of George W. Bush." It says, "Unfortunately, far from defending the Constitution, President Bush has repeatedly sought to strip out the limits the document places on federal power." While I disagree with parts of the study, I certainly agree with that particular comment.

In the current issue of Rolling Stone, Sean Wilentz, a distinguished historian and the director of the American Studies program at Princeton University, takes a serious look at the possibility that Mr. Bush may be the worst president in the nation's history.

What in the world took so long? Some of us have known since the moment he hopped behind the wheel that this reckless president was driving the nation headlong toward a cliff.

The worst thing he did, of course, was to employ a massive campaign of deceit to lead the nation into a catastrophic war in Iraq — a war with no end in sight that has already claimed tens of thousands of lives and inflicted scores of thousands of crippling injuries.

When he was a young man, Mr. Bush used the Air National Guard to hide out from the draft in a time of war. Then, as president, he's suddenly G. I. George, strutting around in a flight suit, threatening to wage war on all and sundry, and taunting the insurgents in Iraq with a cry of "bring them on."

When the nation needed leadership on the critical problem of global warming, Mr. Bush took his cues from the honchos in the oil and gasoline industry, the very people who were setting the planet on fire. Now he talks about overcoming the nation's addiction to oil! This is amazing. Here's the president of the United States scaling the very heights of chutzpah. The Bush people and the oil people are indistinguishable. Condoleezza Rice, a former Chevron director, even had an oil tanker named after her.

Among the complaints in the Cato study is that the Bush administration has taken the position that despite validly enacted laws to the contrary, the president cannot be restrained "from pursuing any tactic he believes to be effective in the war on terror."

This view has led to activities that I believe have brought great shame to the nation: the warrantless spying on Americans, the abuses at Abu Ghraib, the creation of the C.I.A.'s network of secret prisons, extraordinary rendition and the barbaric encampment at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, in which detainees are held, without regard to guilt or innocence, in a nightmarish no man's land beyond the reach of any reasonable judicial process.

The sins of the Bush administration are so extensive and so egregious, they could never be adequately addressed in a newspaper column. History will be the final judge. But I've no doubt about the ultimate verdict.

Remember the Clinton budget surplus?

It was the largest in American history. President Bush and his cronies went after it like vultures feasting in a field of carcasses. They didn't invest the surplus. They devoured it.

Remember how most of the world responded with an extraordinary outpouring of sympathy and support for America in the immediate aftermath of Sept. 11?

Mr. Bush had no idea how to seize that golden opportunity to build new alliances and strengthen existing ones. Much of that solidarity with America has morphed into outright hostility.

Remember Katrina?

The major task of Congress and the voters for the remainder of the Bush presidency is to curtail the destructive impulses of this administration, and to learn the lessons that will prevent similar horrors from ever happening again.

Freddie's Friends On The Hill (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

It's well-known that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have good friends on Capitol Hill. But last week the Federal Election Commission shed some light on how Freddie Mac rewarded its friends. In a settlement with the FEC, Freddie admitted to illegally raising $1.7 million for candidates from both parties between 2000 and 2003. In 2001 alone, Freddie Mac's Senior Vice President for Government Affairs boasted of holding 40 fund-raisers for House Financial Services Committee Chairman Michael Oxley.

Unfortunately for Freddie, it is explicitly barred by law from political fund-raising. In the settlement, Freddie agreed to fork over $3.8 million in fines. Yet Freddie probably figures it also got its money's worth. Genuine reform of the two giant "government-sponsored enterprises" is now stalled on Capitol Hill, thanks in large part to Mr. Oxley's dutiful service.

Which means it's time for reformers to turn to Plan B. The Bush Administration could itself take the opportunity to rein in Freddie and Fannie. An overlooked provision of the laws that founded the two companies already gives the Treasury Secretary the power to restrict the duo's mortgage portfolios that now threaten the U.S. financial system.

First, some background. Fan and Fred have lower costs of capital than their competitors because of the market perception that the government stands behind their debt. This, in turn, is indispensable to their business model. Fannie and Freddie between them hold more than $1 trillion worth of mortgage-backed securities that they've bought with this cheaper credit.

To make it all work, Fannie and Freddie must carefully balance the risks that arise from interest-rate movements, mortgage prepayments and the different maturities of their debts and assets. The monumental accounting troubles that both companies have had in recent years centered around how they account for those risks and the hedges they use to mitigate them. The danger that those portfolios could melt down has led critics such as Alan Greenspan and his successor at the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, to warn that Fan and Fred pose a "systemic risk" to the financial system if the size of their portfolios is not reduced.

It took Congress just weeks to pass Sarbanes-Oxley in 2002. But -- perhaps because Mr. Oxley has been spending so much time at Freddie's fund-raisers -- it can't seem to deal with the far larger financial problems at Fan and Fred. A watered-down reform bill has passed the House, but a stronger bill in the Senate shows no sign of being brought up for a vote anytime soon. Securities analysts have been telling investors they believe the drive to rein in the duo is losing momentum. Freddie Mac's president and COO recently concurred in public. He added that strict limits on retained portfolios would not be in the "best interest of the housing finance industry." By which he meant the best interest of Fannie and Freddie.

Portfolio limits are, however, in the interest of American taxpayers and the integrity of the financial system. The law requires that the bonds that Fannie and Freddie issue explicitly deny that they are backed by the federal government, but plainly no one believes that. Otherwise, who in their right mind would purchase the debt of Fannie Mae, a company with no financial statements and $11 billion in overstated profit?

This type of situation was foreseen when Fan and Fred were chartered. Which is why the same sections of the U.S. Code that require Fannie and Freddie to disavow any government backing of their debts also require the companies to get the approval of the Treasury Secretary before issuing any debt.

Specifically, the law pertaining to Fannie reads: "[T]he corporation is authorized to issue, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and have outstanding at any one time obligations having such maturities and bearing such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the corporation with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury . . ." (our emphases). The section of the law dealing with Freddie Mac has similar language.

As we read that, Treasury already has the power to limit Fannie's and Freddie's borrowing. What's more, that authority appears to have been granted specifically out of concern that the debts of the pair might someday be laid at Treasury's doorstep. But without massive borrowing, neither Fannie nor Freddie could afford to hold the hundreds of billions of securities that they currently do. So limiting their borrowing would require them to decrease the size of their portfolios -- and hence the risk to the economy of a blow-up. Meanwhile, their regular business of securitizing mortgages and selling them would be unaffected. It is their repurchase of those mortgages with subsidized credit that needs to be limited.

The Bush Administration has been forceful in calling for Congress to reform how Fannie and Freddie are regulated and run. But if it wants its effort to succeed, it is going to have to show Fan and Fred and their friends on the Hill that Treasury will act if Congress doesn't.

Sales Of New Homes, Factory Orders Surge (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

A jump in demand for commercial aircraft pushed orders for big-ticket manufactured goods higher last month while sales of new homes shot up at the fastest pace in 13 years, reflecting a rebound from bad weather in February.

Both reports depicted an economy continuing to expand at a healthy pace, a view supported by a survey of business conditions across the country released yesterday by the Federal Reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0026812

The Fed's 12 regional banks used words such as "solid" and "steady" to describe the economy's performance last month and early this month. The Fed did note that "higher energy prices were at the forefront of most districts' mention of cost pressures," and that was before crude oil soared to a record $75.17 per barrel Friday.

Some analysts said the strong growth plus rising inflation pressures will mean the central bank's rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) will raise rates for a 16th time at its next meeting in May and will keep going after that.

"The U.S. economy is firing on all cylinders right now, and there is little to no slack left," said Sherry Cooper, chief economist at Harris Bank. "This makes it increasingly unlikely that the Fed will pause after the May 10 FOMC meeting."

The Commerce Department reported that sales of new single-family homes rose 13.8 percent last month to a seasonally adjusted annual sales rate of 1.213 million units. The increase represented a recovery from a 10.9 percent February sales plunge.

But the median price of homes sold last month dropped to $224,200, down 2.2 percent from the market prices of March 2005. It marked the first time home prices dropped over a 12-month period since December 2003.

Home prices last year were soaring as eager buyers bid more to get into a sizzling home market. However, analysts think sales, which set records for five straight years, will decline this year by about 10 percent under the impact of rising mortgage rates.

"With interest rates continuing to rise, all signs point to a further weakening in sales just down the road," said Patrick Newport, an economist at forecasting firm Global Insight.

Rates on 30-year mortgages rose last week to 6.53 percent, the highest level in nearly four years, with economists forecasting that they could be about 7 percent by the end of this year.

Home sales were up in all areas of the country last month, led by a 35.7 percent surge in the West and followed by gains of 10.9 percent in the Midwest, 6.9 percent in the South and 4.7 percent in the Northeast.

The government also reported that orders to U.S. factories for big-ticket manufactured goods soared by 6.1 percent last month, the biggest gain in 10 months. Two-thirds of the increase reflected a 71.1 percent jump in demand for commercial aircraft.

The overall increase, which followed a 3.4 percent February advance, was more than three times the advance Wall Street had been expecting. Manufacturing is expected to remain strong in coming months as businesses restock lean inventories and boost spending to expand and modernize.

"Businesses remain confident in the economic outlook and are committing to significant capital investments," said David Huether, the National Association of Manufacturers' chief economist.

In contrast to the big surge in new home sales last month, sales of previously owned homes edged up a much smaller 0.3 percent, the National Association of Realtors reported Tuesday.

Both reports, however, showed that the number of unsold homes on the market at the end of the month rose to record levels, a development that was expected to depress price gains in coming months.

The number of new homes remaining on the market last month rose to a record 555,000, up 2.8 percent from February.

U.S. Economy: Durable Goods Orders, Home Sales Surge (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. economy powered ahead in March as manufacturing orders surged and new home sales rose by the most in more than a decade.

Orders for durable goods rose 6.1 percent, the Commerce Department said in Washington today, more than three times the median forecast of economists surveyed by Bloomberg News. Home sales increased 13.8 percent, the most since April 1993, to an annual rate of 1.213 million.

DOJ_NMG_0026813

The reports sent yields on 10-year Treasury notes to the highest since 2002 and traders increased bets the Federal Reserve will lift interest rates twice more before the end of June. Improving business demand and little slowdown in housing run counter to the Fed's forecast that growth will moderate after the first quarter.

``The numbers we're getting all indicate that the economy has maintained a large amount of momentum and that's obviously a concern to the Fed and will likely force their hand," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors in Holland, Pennsylvania.

Labor markets are ``tightening" and companies are struggling with higher energy prices because they're finding it difficult to pass those costs on to their customers, the central bank said today in its regional survey of the economy. Three of the 12 regional Fed banks described the economic expansion as ``solid," while others said the rate of growth was ``modest, moderate or steady."

First Quarter

The durable goods report, which measures bookings for items made to last at least several years, is one of the final pieces of information feeding into economists' forecasts for economic growth in the first quarter, which will be reported on April 28. Excluding transportation equipment, orders rose 2.8 percent.

The world's biggest economy probably expanded at a 4.9 percent pace in the first quarter, the fastest since the third quarter of 2003, according to economists surveyed by Bloomberg.

Today's figures come on the heels of data yesterday that showed consumer confidence at a four-year high and an unexpected increase in sales of previously owned dwellings.

``If one were looking for additional weakness in the economy, it's not going to come from housing," said Gerald Zukowski, deputy chief economist at Nomura Securities International Inc. in New York. ``We are seeing the economy generate a fair amount of momentum."

Shares of U.S. homebuilders advanced. The Standard and Poor's index of 16 homebuilding companies rose 1.5 percent, compared with rise in the S&P 500 of 0.3 percent.

New Home Sales

New home sales, recorded when a contract is signed, are considered by economists a leading indicator of the housing market. Economists expected new home sales to rise to a 1.11 million rate from February's originally reported 1.08 million, according to the median of forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey.

At the same time, the median price of new homes sold dropped 2.2 percent to $224,200 from the same month last year, marking the first such year-on-year drop since December 2003.

American companies are using growing profits to replace outmoded equipment and add factory space. They are also likely to increase production and orders to replenish stockpiles that have dwindled to near-record lows, helping sustain economic growth as consumer spending moderates, economists said.

``It looks like second-quarter business spending will be gang-busters," said Chris Rupkey, senior financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi UFJ Ltd. in New York.

Aircraft

Boeing Co., the world's second-biggest maker of commercial aircraft, received orders for 112 planes in March, up from 25 the previous month. Boeing today said first-quarter earnings rose 29 percent, helped by the biggest jump in airliner deliveries in five years.

Caterpillar Inc., the world's largest maker of earthmoving equipment, reported yesterday that profit jumped 45 percent in the first quarter compared with the same time last year as sales rose 17 percent in North America. The company has raised prices as much as 13 percent in the past two years as their plants ran at full capacity to keep up with orders.

Economists expected orders to rise 1.8 percent in March, based on the median of 68 forecasts. Estimates ranged from no change to a 4.8 percent rise. The increase in durable goods orders for February was revised to 3.4 percent from 2.7 percent.

Treasury notes fell, pushing the yield on the 10-year note up 3 basis points to 5.10 percent, as investors speculated the Fed will raise its benchmark rate to 5.25 percent by the end of June. Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke testifies to Congress on the economic outlook tomorrow.

Forecasts

Business spending probably rose at an annual rate of 13 percent in the first three months of the year, helping the economy expand 5 percent, according to a forecast by economists at JPMorgan Chase Bank in New York. The increase in investment would be the biggest since the second quarter of 2004.

Inventories of durable goods increased 0.7 percent after a 0.4 percent drop in February. Unfilled orders, a gauge of future production, jumped 2.8 percent, the biggest increase since last November.

``We are seeing substantial orders," Robert Akins, chief executive officer of Cymer Inc., a maker of lasers used in producing semiconductors, said in an interview last week.

Chipmakers ``have finally reached the maximum capacity of their factories and they are ordering new equipment to equip the old factories as well as the new ones," he said.

Cymer said on April 18 that its first-quarter profit jumped almost fourfold. The following day, its biggest customer, Veldhoven, Netherlands-based ASML Holding NV, forecast increased shipments of chip-making machines this quarter on rising demand for processors used in cell phones and music players.

Durable Goods Orders In US Beat Forecasts (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

US durable goods orders surged by 6.1 per cent in March, more than three times faster than analysts had been expecting.

The figures suggest that US industry remains in extremely strong shape and increase the chances that the Federal Reserve may need to continue raising interest rates beyond 5 per cent.

The Federal Reserve's Beige Book, a summary of reports on economic activity by regional agents, said that orders or revenues in the manufacturing sector continued to come in ahead of levels seen a year ago. In addition: "A majority of districts note that labour markets, at least for skilled workers, are tight or tightening."

The Fed said retail sales – excluding the vehicle sector – also appeared firmer. Activity in the service sector had also been expanding, the Fed added.

But it continued to say that higher energy costs were not feeding through into broader inflation. "Businesses continue to have limited ability to raise their selling prices," the Fed said.

The bulk of the rise in durable goods orders was due to a 14 per cent increase in transport orders, with civil aircraft sales climbing 71 per cent. Boeing reported bookings for 112 aircraft in March, up from 25 in February.

Excluding the volatile transport sector, orders rose by 2.8 per cent. Economists had expected a rise of just 1 per cent.

"Overall this is nothing but good news," said Paul Ashworth, an analyst at Capital Economics.

Economy's Surge Stirs Questions About When Slowdown May Come (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

The latest readings suggest the nation's economy is carrying significant momentum into the second quarter, raising new questions about when a slowdown might come after a torrid start to the year.

By most accounts, the economy surged in the first quarter after a brief lull late last year. When the government releases its first estimate tomorrow, economists expect it to say the economy grew at a roughly 5% annual rate in the quarter.

But over the rest of the year, Federal Reserve officials expect growth to moderate to a long-term rate of 3% to 3.5%, slow enough to keep inflation at bay but fast enough to keep unemployment from rising. That would permit the Fed to stop the campaign of interest-rate increases it began in June 2004.

This week, however, the economy has been sending signals that it might not be ready to settle down. The housing market, though softer, is holding up better than many skeptics predicted and consumer confidence remains surprisingly strong, despite soaring gasoline prices, and concerns about President Bush's handling of the economy. Meanwhile, solid job creation and wage gains are providing a cushion for consumer spending, and orders for capital equipment are picking up.

DOJ_NMG_0026815

Yesterday, the Commerce Department said new-home sales jumped 13.8% in March from a month earlier, erasing much of the 15.8% decline seen over the two previous months. It also reported that orders for durable goods -- items such as tractors and washing machines that are meant to last three years or more -- rose 6.1% last month on the back of strong aircraft orders at Boeing Co. More important, orders for capital goods, excluding aircraft and defense, usually a good indicator of future business spending, broke out of a recent slump last month to post a 3% gain.

"What we're seeing now is telling us about the momentum going into the second quarter," said Julia Coronado, senior economist at Barclays Capital. "It seems to be pretty strong."

The flow of indicators these days is particularly important because the Fed has said that prospects for further increases in short-term interest rates -- beyond an expected quarter-point increase next month to 5% from 4.75% -- will depend on what new economic data show. At their last meeting in March, Fed officials appeared to think they could pause after rates reached 5%.

But the spate of strong data has prompted futures markets to raise the probability of further increases to more than 50%, and the inflation-wary bond market has sold off recently. Yesterday, bond prices fell again, and the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 5.107%.

The Fed's latest roundup of business conditions, also released yesterday, suggested no slowdown is yet under way. "Economic activity continued to expand in March and the first half of April," the Fed said in its "beige book" report. Only one of the 12 Fed districts -- New York -- said growth slowed. Even so, evidence of broader inflationary pressure remained scant. The Cleveland district said many raw-material prices had risen, but "retail prices remained relatively flat."

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke testifies on the economy to the Joint Economic Committee of Congress today, but he isn't expected to give clear signals about what the Fed's next interest-rate move is likely to be.

To be sure, despite the recent robust data, economists say a strong finish to the first quarter is more likely to be a prelude to slower growth in the second. Oil prices and interest rates are rising, and the extent of the housing market's correction is still uncertain. As a result, few analysts are willing to raise their growth forecasts.

Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at New York consulting firm MFR Inc., said he still expects growth to slow to a 3% annual rate in the current quarter. "Could the second quarter be a little stronger than that? Yes, but not way higher," he said.

Businesses are helping to spur the economy. On their way to record corporate profits last year, businesses increased their investment at a 16% annual pace in the fourth quarter, the fastest clip since mid-2004. Ms. Coronado of Barclays expects that spending on equipment and software, a closely watched measure of investment, rose at an 11% annual rate in the first quarter and will grow at a 9% rate in the current quarter.

Google Inc. recently said that its capital spending, which was $838 million in 2005, will grow even faster than its revenue this year. Manufacturing bellwether Caterpillar Inc. recently raised its profit forecast for 2006 to between $4.85 and $5.20 a share, up from $4.04 a share in 2005. Announcing the sunnier outlook, Caterpillar Chief Executive James Owens said "strong underlying fundamentals are in place, and we believe this is a business cycle that has staying power."

In yesterday's Fed report, business investment appeared to be strong. "Production capacity for mining equipment in the Chicago district is reportedly booked through 2007," the report said.

With prospects on the business side looking solid, one of the major assumptions built into forecasts for slower growth has been that consumers will cut back on spending. Peter Hooper, chief U.S. economist at Deutsche Bank, said, "We really do need to see some slowing in consumer-spending growth in the second quarter to give the Fed room to pause" its rate raising at 5%. He predicted that would happen thanks to the combined impact of higher gasoline prices and slowing home-price appreciation, "although the risks have risen" that the Fed will raise rates beyond 5%.

The housing market has yet to show signs of a prolonged slump, but even with March's upturn a slowdown is still apparent. New-home sales in March, while up from February, were 11.5% below their peak last July. Sales of existing homes, which make up 80% of the housing market, are only 4.8% lower than when they topped out last June.

However, inventories of new homes on the market rose to 555,000 in March, up 24% from a year ago, and the unadjusted median sales price for a new home actually fell 2% from a year earlier, suggesting builders have used discounts to get homes sold. Existing-home prices have declined slightly so far this year, giving consumers less home equity to finance other purchases.

DOJ_NMG_0026816

In another sign of weakness in the housing market, Dallas-based home builder Centex Corp. yesterday said orders fell 11% in the fiscal quarter ended March 31. CEO Timothy Eller said cancellations were up, too. The company slashed its earnings outlook for fiscal 2007 to a range of $8.50 to $10 a share, down from an earlier estimate of $10.75 to $11.25.

Still, the strong labor market, which has lowered the unemployment rate to 4.7% and shows few signs of reversing course, is likely to reassure consumers. Yesterday's Fed report found that job markets were still tightening, and wage pressures were rising. The Dallas district cited "reports of difficultly finding workers who meet basic qualifications of employment, such as background checks and drug tests."

One New York-district employment agency said "salaries are up at least 15% from a year ago for experienced office workers," and a Boston district firm said there was a "war for talent."

Growth Accelerated In March, But A Slowdown Is Expected (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

The economy ended the first quarter on a high note, according to two Commerce Department reports released yesterday, but economists cautioned that higher energy costs and interest rates might sap some of that vitality.

Two measures of housing and manufacturing activity rose sharply in March, the Commerce Department said, indicating that the economy picked up steam. The Federal Reserve's beige book report presented a similar upbeat view but noted that higher energy prices were hurting businesses and that home sales were cooling in much of the country.

Analysts said the reports suggested that the economy grew at about a 5 percent annual rate in the first quarter, after a 1.7 percent increase in the fourth quarter. The Commerce Department will release its estimate of gross domestic product for the first quarter tomorrow.

"Neither the economy, nor the housing market has gone flat," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist for the PNC Financial Services Group. "But it will continue to deflate a little bit."

New-home sales rose to an annual pace of 1.21 million in March, up from 1.07 million the month before and 1.2 million in January. Sales increased in all four regions of the country.

But the market was weaker when compared with a year ago. The selling rate in March was down from a pace of 1.31 million in March 2005, while the median price — meaning half the homes sold for more and half for less — slipped 2.2 percent from a year ago, to $224,200.

And the number of unsold homes on the market has grown, rising by 24.4 percent over the last 12 months, to 555,000. At the current sales pace it would take five and a half months to sell those properties, up from 4.2 months a year ago.

The jump in inventories was the biggest in 33 years, and the drop in prices the steepest since January 2003, said Ian C. Shepherdson, chief United States economist at High Frequency Economics.

Sales "are going to drop in the next couple of months," he said, noting that mortgage applications, an early indicator for the housing market, have fallen 22 percent in 12 months.

Orders for durable goods, big-ticket products that are meant to last for more than three years, increased by 6.1 percent, to $230.6 billion, after a rise of 3.4 percent in February and a decline of 8.9 percent in January.

A 71.1 percent increase in orders for civilian airplanes and related parts accounted for a big part of the gain, but the increase in orders was a robust 2.8 percent excluding the transportation sector, which is heavily influenced by the month in which customers place orders for planes with Boeing. Other sectors that showed increases were capital goods, machinery and communications equipment.

If businesses continue to show such strength they could offset some slowdown that analysts expect in housing and consumer spending, but not all of it, economists said.

They note that oil prices have risen 18 percent since the start of the year, to $71.93 a barrel, and that the national average price for a gallon of unleaded gasoline has increased sharply, to $2.92, from $2.50 a month ago, according to the American Automobile Association. The average interest rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage topped 6.5 percent last week, up from 6.21 percent at the start of the year, according to Freddie Mac.

DOJ_NMG_0026817

"The economy has shown tremendous resilience in the face of energy prices so far," said David Greenlaw, an economist at Morgan Stanley. "But this latest spike will have a noticeable effect in the next couple of months."

An economic slowdown could force the Federal Reserve to end its nearly two-year campaign to raise short-term interest rates, now at 4.75 percent, after just one increase to 5 percent at its meeting on May 10.

Bond investors believe a second increase, in June, is likely. The yield on the 10-year United States Treasury note rose to 5.10 percent yesterday, from 5.07 percent on Tuesday.

Strong Data Good For Stocks (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

Wall Street can't seem to make up its mind about interest rates.

New signs that the economy is on solid footing have caused investors to rethink expectations about the future course of interest rates in recent days -- and what higher rates mean for stocks.

Last week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to a six-year high amid hopes the Federal Reserve would stop raising its target rate after one more quarter-point increase to 5% at their May meeting. Now, after several reports indicating the economy is stronger than previously thought, more investors think the Fed is likely to increase rates to 5.25% or more.

Fed-funds futures contracts show a 64% chance policy makers will boost rates to 5.25%, up from 40% on Monday.

Wall Street's response to the new landscape this week has been erratic. Stocks tumbled Tuesday as investors worried that higher rates could slow the economy too much and hurt corporate profits. Wednesday, investors seemed more receptive to the notion that the economy is strong enough to withstand more than one rate increase.

The Dow industrials gained 71.24 points to 11354.49, a fresh six-year high, buoyed by an 8% pop in General Motors after Merrill Lynch, upbeat about the auto maker's turnaround plan, upgraded the stock to "neutral" from "sell." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 3.67 to 1305.41, and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 3.33 to 2333.63.

Investors clung to the idea that the economy will stay resilient despite the prospects for more rate increases than previously thought. "People have been getting prematurely bearish because of rising rates," said James Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. "They've been looking at how much rates have come up instead of how low they still are."

The Fed has increased rates 15 times in the past two years, and the yield on the 10-year Treasury bond has moved to its highest level in nearly four years. But rates on the 10-year note, at 5.1%, are still below their historical average of about 5.5% to 6%, said Mr. Paulsen, and aren't high enough to tamp down growth spurred by years of cheap money.

Some analysts aren't as sanguine about higher rates, though, largely due to two weak spots in the economy: housing and the consumer. Despite a report Wednesday that new-home sales surged in March, "the primary weakness right now is the housing market, and that is going to have an impact on consumers and the rate at which they plan to spend," said Stuart Freeman, chief equity strategist at A.G. Edwards & Sons, since consumers tend to feel wealthier when the value of their homes is on the rise.

Higher mortgage rates later in the year will cause the housing market to cool even more, putting more pressure on a consumer struggling with high levels of debt and gasoline prices hovering near $3 a gallon.

A Commerce Department report Wednesday showing that new-home sales in March surged 13.8%7 to an annualized rate of 1.213 million units, the biggest increase in 13 years, raised questions about whether the housing market was cooling.

But a look inside the report showed new-home sales, which slid 10.9% in February, weren't as hot as the headline number indicated. Sales were down 7.2% from a year ago. And a factor driving the jump was a dip in prices. The median home price slid to $224,200 in March from $239,900 the previous month and down from $229,300 a year ago.

In another report, the Commerce Department said orders for new durable goods8 jumped 6.1% in March, far exceeding the 1.6% gain expected by economists. Excluding the 14% rise in volatile transportation goods, new orders rose 2.8% in March, the biggest since August.

Treasury bonds slumped on the reports, sending yields to their highest level since June 2002. The 10-year Treasury bond slid 6/32 point, or $1.88 per $1,000 invested, to yield 5.107%. Crude-oil futures slid 95 cents to $71.93 a barrel on the New York

Mercantile Exchange after a report by the Energy Information Administration showed petroleum inventories fell less than expected last week.

Investors also weighed the Fed's latest "beige book" report, which said the economy's growth is "solid" and "moderate" and that the labor market is "tight or tightening." The report also found that the housing market is cooling off in most of the central bank's 12 regions.

In major market action:

Bonds slipped10. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 6/32 point, or $1.88 per $1,000 invested, to yield 5.107%. The 30-year bond lost 5/32 to yield 5.178%. Yields move inversely to prices.

U.S. Stocks Rise On Earnings; Dow Average Reaches 6-Year High (BLOOM)

By Dune Lawrence

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The Dow Jones Industrial Average climbed to a six-year high, leading gains in U.S. stocks, as earnings at Anheuser-Busch Cos. and Colgate-Palmolive Co. beat analysts' forecasts and sales of new homes surged.

Hovnanian Enterprises Inc. and Pulte Homes Inc. set the pace as homebuilders rallied on a government report showing the biggest monthly jump in sales since 1993.

``Earnings have been quite positive, and I think that's the number one reason to buy stocks and the number one reason why this market has held together," said Alfred Goldman, chief market strategist at A.G. Edwards in St. Louis.

Energy stocks declined as oil prices fell for a third day. Rising interest rates also hampered the advance, as the housing data and a jump in durable-goods orders sent the yield on 10- year Treasury notes to its highest since June 2002.

The Dow average rose 71.24, or 0.6 percent, to 11,354.49, its highest since Jan. 19, 2000. The Dow, which first reached a six-year high last week, got an added lift from General Motors Corp. after Merrill Lynch & Co. said the carmaker has enough cash to pay workers who accept buyout offers.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 3.67, or 0.3 percent, to 1305.41, while the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 3.33, or 0.1 percent, to 2333.63. It was the first time all three indexes rose this week.

The market's advance on higher earnings had stalled as increases in consumer confidence and sales of previously owned homes reignited concern that the Federal Reserve would keep lifting interest rates.

Earnings Scorecard

About 72 percent of S&P 500 companies that have reported first-quarter profit have beaten analyst estimates, more than the 57 percent average since 1992, data from Thomson Financial show. More companies will release earnings this week than any other week during the so-called reporting season.

Anheuser-Busch climbed $2.27 to $44.90. The world's largest brewer reported better-than-expected first-quarter profit on the biggest sales gain in more than a year. Net income was 64 cents a share. JPMorgan analyst John Faucher, who is top-ranked by StarMine, estimated 54 cents a share, including a 2-cent cost for stock-option expenses.

Colgate-Palmolive, the world's largest toothpaste maker, rallied $1.60 to $58.95. The company said first-quarter profit, excluding some items, increased to 70 cents a share as new brands lifted sales in Latin America. The average estimate of analysts surveyed by Thomson was 66 cents.

Sales of new homes in the U.S. jumped the most since April 1993, up 13.8 percent to an annual rate of 1.213 million, the Commerce Department said. Economists expected sales at a 1.11 million rate, according to a Bloomberg News survey.

Builders Soar

The Bloomberg U.S. Homebuilders Index rose 1.6 percent. Pulte, the country's second-largest builder, gained $1.14 to $39.04. Hovnanian, New Jersey's largest homebuilder, added 92 cents to $40.63. D.R. Horton Inc., No. 1 U.S. homebuilder, added 51 cents to $31.33.

DOJ_NMG_0026819

The durable goods report showed orders jumped 6.1 percent last month as businesses invested in new equipment to meet demand. The increase in bookings for expensive items made to last at least several years was the most since May 2005 and up from a gain of 3.4 percent in February, the Commerce Department said. Excluding transportation equipment, orders rose 2.8 percent. Economists expected gains of 1.8 percent and 1 percent, respectively in a Bloomberg survey.

Beige Book

A regional survey of the economy by the Fed added to concern over accelerating inflation. Labor markets across the U.S. are ``tightening" as most of the country expands, said the Fed's dozen regional banks in the so-called beige book report.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note climbed 3 basis points, or 0.03 percentage point, to 5.10 percent in New York, according to bond broker Cantor Fitzgerald LP. Higher yields may make fixed-income investments a more attractive alternative to equities and raise borrowing costs for companies.

``Solid earnings reports are helping to put in a bit of a floor in the market," said Jeff Kleintop, who helps manage $50 billion as chief investment strategist at PNC Advisors in Philadelphia. ``But the sensitivity here to the economic data given the question about the outlook for Fed tightening, that seems to be the overriding influence."

GM, Oil Stocks

GM, the world's largest automaker, advanced $1.74, or 8.1 percent, to $23.15 for the top gain in the Dow average and highest price since Feb. 6. Merrill raised its rating to ``neutral" from ``sell,' saying GM has enough money in its pension and retiree health-care funds to pay workers who accept its buyout offers. GM may get 50 percent of 63,000 union workers eligible for full or early retirement to leave, analyst John Murphy wrote in a report.

About four stocks rose for every three that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.77 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 8.4 percent more than the three-month average.

Oil for June delivery slid 1.3 percent to $71.90 a barrel in New York, bringing the loss this week to 4.3 percent. The Energy Department said U.S. refineries increased output of gasoline and other fuels.

Energy shares weighed on the market for a third day after reversing earlier gains. An S&P 500 measure slid 1.4 percent. Valero Energy Corp., the No. 1 U.S. refiner, slumped $3.20 to $63.10. Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's largest publicly traded oil company, lost 85 cents to $63.10.

Baker Hughes Inc. was the exception among energy stocks. The No. 3 oilfield-services provider said first-quarter profit soared 89 percent to $339.2 million as customers spent more searching for oil and gas. The company also raised its 2006 profit and sales growth forecast. Baker Hughes advanced $3.07 to $79.

PepsiCo, AT&T Earnings

PepsiCo Inc., the world's No. 2 soft-drink maker, added 36 cents to $57.86. The company said first-quarter profit rose 12 percent to $1.02 billion, or 60 cents a share, on demand for Frito-Lay snacks and Gatorade sports drinks. UBS Securities LLC analyst Caroline Levy, who is top-ranked by StarMine Corp., estimated earnings of 59 cents a share.

AT&T Inc., the largest U.S. telephone company, rose for a second day after reporting profit that exceeded analysts' estimates. The stock gained 56 cents to $26.16 today.

Sprint Nextel Corp., the third-largest U.S. wireless services company, dropped 68 cents to $24.35. Sprint said first- quarter profit, excluding some costs, was 35 cents a share, missing the 37 cents expected by analysts in a Thomson survey. The company added fewer customers than analysts estimated.

Bank of America Corp., the second-biggest U.S. bank, rose 62 cents to $47.71. The company said it will repurchase up to $12 billion of its shares within the next 18 months to help boost a stock price that has lagged peers.

Buffett's Day

The earnings news was mixed for Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc., which was the biggest shareholder in both Moody's Corp. and Anheuser-Busch as of December.

Moody's slid $7.65 to $62.78. The company, whose founder created credit ratings, said first-quarter revenue rose 13 percent to $407.9 million, the slowest pace since December 2004.

Berkshire Hathaway shares still jumped the most in seven months, adding $1750, or 2 percent, to $88,700.

Wall Street Gains After Positive Earnings Reports (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

US stocks enjoyed a strong day, after positive earnings reports offset fears of higher interest rates following strong economic data.

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 3.67 points, or 0.3 per cent, at 1,305.41. The Nasdaq barely moved, gaining 3.3 points, or 0.1 per cent, at 2,333.63, while the Dow Jones Industrial Average finished the day 71.24 points, or 0.6 per cent higher at 11,354.49.

"We're in a reverse-psychology market," said Alfred Goldman, chief market strategist at AG Edwards, who commented that prices were declining on strong economic data and rising on weaker news.

"The question investors will ask is whether this 43 month old bull-market is running out of energy," he said. "I'm still optimistic, but I'm starting to lose sleep at night."

General Motors clawed back its losses of earlier in the week after Merrill Lynch upgraded the company's stock to 'neutral' from 'sell.' It gave a sanguine assessment of GM's ability to complete a restructuring plan. GM jumped 8.1 per cent to $23.15.

Anheuser-Busch was also a strong gainer. The brewer reported quarterly earnings per share of 64 cents, beating analysts' forecasts of 56 cents. The news pushed its shares up 5.3 per cent to $44.90 Berkshire Hathaway, the largest shareholder in Anheuser-Busch, rose 2 per cent to $88,700.

Office Depot soared to an all-time high following the company's announcement that sales for the first quarter grew 3 per cent. This raised earnings per share to 48 cents, above analysts' forecast of 44 cents per share. The stock jumped 8.7 per cent to $41.52 on the news

Despite an increase in first quarter profit of 23 per cent, Moody's suffered losses on Wednesday. The company that operates the credit-rating service of the same name dipped 12 per cent to $62 as expenses rose and revenue growth slowed below analyst expectations.

Sprint-Nextel was one of the most heavily traded stocks after the telecommunications company announced a fall in first-quarter net income from $472bn to $419bn after merger-related costs and higher marketing expenses.

The shares fell 2.7 per cent to $24.35, bucking the trend in an otherwise buoyant communications sector.

One company leading the positive trend in the sector was American Tower which gained 4.4 per cent to $34.65 after it announced that quarterly losses had been reduced.

The company, which leases space on its communications towers to the likes of Cingular, said that sales gained 74 per cent in the first quarter compared with the same period last year.

Monster Worldwide, the owner of online jobs recruitment website Monster.com, rose on quarterly results that were significantly stronger than expected, up to $42.3m from $20.6m in the same period last year. Monster shot up 6.9 per cent to $55.86.

Bernanke Won't Hint At Ending Rise In Rates (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke is going to disappoint a lot of listeners when he addresses Congress today and provides no guidance on when the central bank will stop raising interest rates to keep inflation under control.

Financial market analysts and investors have longed for such a signal and thought they saw it last week when a summary of Fed officials' last policymaking meeting in March suggested they might be done after lifting their benchmark short-term rate once more in May.

But that expectation has wilted as several new government reports have shown the economy is growing briskly and inflation may be moving higher. Fed policymakers almost certainly will raise their benchmark rate again at their May 10 meeting but will be unable to indicate then whether they are done or see more increases in store.

DOJ_NMG_0026821

"Anyone looking for clues about when the Fed will stop tightening is bound to be disappointed" by Bernanke's testimony today, said Ed McKelvey of Goldman Sachs U.S. Economics Research. "He simply does not know."

Rather, Fed officials will need to see how the economy and inflationary pressures behave after the May meeting before they decide whether to raise interest rates in June. Bernanke, testifying before Congress's Joint Economic Committee for the first time as Fed chairman, is likely to lay out the economic and inflationary risks he sees while keeping his interest rate options open, several analysts predicted yesterday.

Just yesterday, the Commerce Department reported that new orders for big-ticket durable goods -- items such as computers, cars and appliances -- rose 6.1 percent in March.

And sales of new homes surged 13.8 percent in March, after slumping in February, the National Association of Realtors said yesterday.

"The strong momentum undermines the notion that the Fed might be able to halt its rate hikes after just one more move," said Nigel Gault, an economist at Global Insight Inc.

The figures released yesterday prompted several analysts to estimate that the economy grew at faster than a 5 percent annual rate in the first three months of the year, a robust rebound from its weak finish at the end of last year.

"The economy is pumping on all cylinders," Richard W. Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas said in an interview yesterday. But, he added, economic growth in "the second half [of the year] probably will be a little slower."

Fed officials are raising interest rates to make sure strong economic growth doesn't cause inflation to take off. Higher rates make it harder for consumers and businesses to borrow, which restrains their spending, slowing growth and making it harder for businesses to raise prices.

The Fed has raised its benchmark federal funds rate -- the interest rate charged on overnight loans between banks -- 15 times since June 2004, to 4.75 percent last month. The rate has caused other short-term rates, such as those on home-equity loans, adjustable mortgages and credit cards, to rise as well.

But long-term interest rates, such as mortgages, are determined by global financial markets. Mortgage rates have risen in recent weeks but remain low by historical standards.

The housing market has already started to cool a bit, with price appreciation slowing, inventories of unsold homes growing and mortgage applications dropping, which implies that sales will droop as well. Many Fed officials expect this will help slow overall economic growth in coming months to an annual rate below 3.5 percent, which should keep the lid on inflation. But some policymakers don't see much of a slowdown yet, with consumer spending, business investment and exports all rising.

Housing is sending "mixed signals," Fisher said. But, "the rest of the economy is doing so well, it's mitigating the fall-off in one sector."

Meanwhile, inflation flared higher in March, in part because of higher energy prices. But other prices rose as well, for housing, clothing, medical care, recreation, air travel and education.

Fed officials cannot use interest rates to keep oil and gasoline prices from rising, since they are largely determined in global markets according to supply and demand pressures. But Fed policy can make it harder for businesses to pass their energy costs to consumers through higher prices.

Looking for signs of such pass-through inflation, economists look at core inflation measures, which exclude prices for energy and food. The Labor Department's core consumer price index rose 0.3 percent in March, the largest increase in a year.

"The March CPI was a mite disturbing . . . as pressures in the core index were not easily isolated to one or two troublesome items and were therefore consistent with the possibility of a pickup in this [energy price] pass through," McKelvey said.

"However, one month does not make a trend," he added, implying that core inflation could recede in following months. But several analysts say that is unlikely because of trends in rental housing prices, which are rising.

Rents fell dramatically while the Fed was cutting interest rates during and after the 2001 recession. Lower rates induced more renters to become homeowners, which fueled the housing boom and lowered demand for rentals. Now, with mortgages rising, rents are climbing, as well.

DOJ_NMG_0026822

Much of the increase in the March core CPI reflected rising shelter costs for renters and homeowners, a senior Labor Department economist said. The "shelter" category, which also includes rising hotel rates, accounts for 42 percent of the core CPI.

Because of rising rents, "we suspect the markets could be negatively surprised as core CPI hangs higher longer than current expectations," wrote David Shulman, in a recent forecast published by the Anderson School of Management at the University of California at Los Angeles. And, he said, the higher-than-expected core CPI "will likely put upward pressure on U.S. interest rates."

Why War Is Hell On President's Party (USAT)

By Ross K. Baker

USA Today, April 27, 2006

Though the midterm congressional elections are seven months away, speculation has already reached a fever pitch about how the public, half a year from now, will evaluate the record of the Bush administration and the GOP on everything from the Iraq war to changes in Medicare.

Congressional experts point to the relatively small number of seats in the House of Representatives — less than 10% of them by some reckoning — likely to be in play because of a combination of partisan gerrymandering and the formidable advantages enjoyed by incumbents. Larry Sabato, a respected election analyst, concluded recently that in their quest to take control of Congress, “Democrats are facing an uphill struggle.” Coupled with these tactical advantages enjoyed by the GOP, critics also downplay Democratic chances because of that party's lack of clear alternatives to the president's policies.

If there were not battles raging in Afghanistan and Iraq in which Americans were dying and being wounded, perhaps the experts' predictions of token GOP losses would be on solid footing. But this midterm must be judged not by peacetime elections, but by those that have taken place with armed conflict as a backdrop. In those elections, the party of the president has suffered major losses. It will again in November if no clear end to our Iraq engagement is on the horizon. Even if success is within our grasp this fall, war fatigue alone might unhorse the Republicans.

The party of Franklin Roosevelt, the architect of the nation's recovery from the Depression and the author of victory in World War II, suffered such a humiliating defeat in the elections of 1942, the first midterm after Pearl Harbor. To add to the humiliation, just before elections FDR had made a cross-country trip to boost morale and gave one of his “fireside chats” brimming with optimism, in much the same fashion as President Bush's recent forays to shore up support for the war.

The reason for the Democrats' loss was straightforward: The war was not going well. The battle for the contested island of Guadalcanal in the Pacific was still in doubt. The Japanese were still entrenched on the Aleutians, in Alaska, and were battling for control of Southeast Asia's island of New Guinea. Like the current situation in Iraq, there was some encouraging news as well, such as the raid by U.S. bombers on Tokyo in April 1942 and the Battle of Midway in June. But our allies were struggling. The Russians were still on the defensive around Stalingrad, and the British were reeling from a failed large-scale raid on German-occupied France.

Unlike today's White House officials, some people high up in Roosevelt's administration were openly pessimistic. FDR's assistant secretary of the Navy warned, “We could lose the war;” his director of military manpower lamented, “The tide is running against us.” FDR lashed out at the press whose reports on the war, he said, “had done the country a great deal of harm.”

The conventional wisdom then held that the Republicans would make modest gains. Pollster George Gallup predicted that the Democrats would probably not lose more than a single House seat. But when the votes were counted, the Republicans had won 44 House seats and nine in the Senate. The Democrats retained control but suffered a severe setback. The Democratic defeat put Time magazine in mind of the previous wartime midterm, in 1918, when, on the very threshold of armistice, Woodrow Wilson's Democrats lost 19 House seats and six in the Senate.

A pattern emerges from all elections of the past century conducted in wartime: The contest turns into an expression of discontent with war.

DOJ_NMG_0026823

Harry Truman's Democrats suffered a loss of 29 House seats and six Senate seats in 1950, the first midterm after U.S. involvement in Korea; Lyndon Johnson's Democrats lost heavily in 1966, the first U.S. midterm elections during the Vietnam War; and Richard Nixon's midterm in 1970, while the Vietnam War still raged, saw losses for his Republicans in Congress.

Each war is different, and the political circumstances around each election are distinctive. Dissatisfaction in 1942 did not carry with it the threat of a pullout from Europe or the Pacific. We had been attacked by the Japanese and had war declared on us by the Germans. In 1918, the Democrats lost their majority in Congress with victory in sight, according to John Dos Passos in his history of the Wilson years — because of the president's appeal to the voters to show their support of his war policies by electing a Democratic Congress. Here again, the experts, notably The New York Times, were wrong in their prediction of a victory for the president's party.

For Americans, war weariness sets in early. Lightning campaigns such as the ejection of Iraq from Kuwait or the invasions of Grenada and Panama do not test the patience of the public. But even those wars that are ultimately successful but protracted impose a dreadful political cost on the incumbent.

Today, the very many safe congressional seats do provide a buffer for Republicans that might stand up under Democratic attacks on corruption, immigration, health care, or a bungled response to a hurricane that struck a year before the elections.

But a war of uncertain duration, even one in which the trend lines are promising, might be too great a surge for members of the president's party to withstand. Combat fatigue is not a condition found only on the battlefield; it is also an affliction that has often been diagnosed in the voting booth.

Clinton Is Democrats' Favourite For White House But .... (AFP)

AFP, April 26, 2006

Senator Hillary Clinton is the favourite among Democratic voters to be the party's candidate in the 2008 presidential election, according to a poll.

But only 12 percent of Democrat electors believe the wife of ex-president Bill Clinton can overcome the hostility of US Republicans to take the White House, according to the Financial Dynamics poll for The Hotline political newsletter.

The New York senator had support from 38 percent of Democrats, a 24 percentage point lead over nearest rival, Senator John Kerry, the losing Democratic candidate in the 2004 election.

"The depth and breadth of Hillary Clinton's support among Democrats is daunting for other potential Democratic candidates in 2008, especially coupled with her enormous fundraising edge," said The Hotline editor Chuck Todd.

But Clinton is divisive figure. Many conservatives dislike her because of her attempts to influence policy while her husband was president.

The poll said that Senator John McCain was the leading Republican candidate among Democrats.

Fifty-five percent of the 603 people questioned had a favourable view of the Vietnam War veteran who fought George W. Bush for the Republican candidacy in 2000, a higher rating than many Democratic party chiefs received.

The poll, carried out April 19-23, had a margin of error of four percentage points.

Percentage Of Uninsured Americans Rising (AP-Y2)

By Theresa Agovino

AP2, April 26, 2006

The percentage of working-age Americans with moderate to middle incomes who lacked health insurance for at least part of the year rose to 41 percent in 2005, a dramatic increase from the 28 percent in 2001 without coverage, a study released on Wednesday found.

Moreover, more than half of the uninsured adults said they were having problems paying their medical bills or had incurred debt to cover their expenses, according to a report by the Commonwealth Fund, a New York-based private, health care policy foundation. The study of 4,350 adults also found that people without insurance were more likely to forgo recommended health screenings such as mammograms than those with coverage, and were less likely to have a regular doctor than their insured counterparts.

The report paints a bleak health care picture for the uninsured. "It represents an explosion of the insurance crisis into those with moderate incomes," said Sara Collins, a senior program officer at the Commonwealth Fund.

Collins said the study also illustrates how more employers are dropping coverage or are offering plans that are just too expensive for many people.

About 45.8 million Americans did not have health insurance in 2004, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The percentage of individuals earning less than $20,000 a year without insurance rose to 53 percent, up from 49 percent in 2001. Overall, the percentage of people without insurance rose to 28 percent in 2005 from 24 percent in 2001.

The study also found that 59 percent of uninsured with chronic conditions such as asthma or diabetes either skipped a dose of their medicine or went without it because it was too expensive. One-third of them

One-third of those in that group visited an emergency room or stayed in a hospital overnight or did both, compared to 15 percent of their insured counterparts.

Collins said those statistics are significant because giving up medicines typically leads to more expensive health problems later. Treating people in expensive settings such emergency rooms places a financial burden on the health care system, she added.

"People not being able to take care of themselves should send out a big red flag," said Collins.

HCA Inc. hoisted a red flag on Tuesday, when the the nation's largest for-profit hospital operator said its earnings fell 8.5 percent in the first quarter after an increase in the uninsured admissions cut into revenue gains. Uninsured admissions rose 13 percent during the quarter, and the company said its provision for "doubtful accounts" rose to $852 million from $683 million a year earlier.

The Commonwealth Fund's study was bolstered by analysis of government data funded and released by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, a private organization that provides health care grants.

That study found that cost prevented 41.1 percent of uninsured adults from seeing a doctor, compared to 9.2 percent of individuals with coverage.

Meanwhile, 51 percent of women without health insurance haven't had a mammogram in two years, compared to 22.8 percent of women with insurance.

And 76.3 percent of uninsured men between the ages of 40 to 64 haven't had the PSA test, which detects prostate cancer, in two years. That compares to 52.2 percent of their insured counterparts.

Researchers at the University of Minnesota School of Public Health used data from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to reach the study's conclusion.

Iranian Leader Warns U.S. Of Reprisal (WP)

By Molly Moore And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

PARIS, April 26 -- Escalating the threats between Washington and Tehran, Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned Wednesday that his country would strike U.S. targets around the world in the event it is attacked over its refusals to curb its nuclear program.

"If the U.S. ventured into any aggression on Iran, Iran will retaliate by damaging U.S. interests worldwide twice as much as the U.S. may inflict on Iran," Khamenei said in a speech to a workers' assembly, according to the official news agency IRNA.

His statement adds to a campaign of defiance by senior Iranian officials in advance of a report expected Friday by the U.N. atomic watchdog agency, which analysts predict will cite Iran for defying U.N. Security Council demands to halt its uranium enrichment program.

The heightened tensions between the United States and Iran have helped drive oil prices to record highs and have set in motion intense diplomatic meetings aimed at heading off greater destabilization in the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0026825

In a spate of statements this week, Iranian officials have also threatened to cut oil production, export nuclear technology, bar international nuclear monitors, make their nuclear program entirely secret and withdraw from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

While Bush administration officials have said they have no plans to attack Iran, they have repeatedly said they have not ruled out that step.

U.S. military experts are confident that U.S. forces could carry out extensive airstrikes against Iranian targets, but there is disagreement about how much of a setback such raids could impose on the Iranian nuclear program, much of which is housed underground.

Two main options are under consideration, say people familiar with Air Force thinking. The first would be a quick series of strikes against several dozen nuclear-related facilities, lasting only a few days and followed by a U.S. statement that the bombing would resume if Iran retaliated.

The second option envisions a lengthier, more ambitious campaign of waves of strikes by bombers and cruise missiles aimed at hundreds of targets, hitting not just nuclear-related facilities but also the headquarters of intelligence agencies, the Revolutionary Guard and other key government offices.

Many experts worry that Iran, dominated by Shiite Muslims, would retaliate against U.S. and British forces in neighboring Iraq by mobilizing Iraqi Shiites. It might also attack U.S. and British installations in Saudi Arabia and Bahrain through the help of Shiites in those countries. In other scenarios, Iranian agents would stage terrorist strikes against civilians in the United States, Europe and elsewhere.

The recent statements are "a war of words," said Gary G. Sick, a professor of Middle East policy at Columbia University and longtime monitor of Iranian politics. "Neither side has anything to gain by an attack on the other, but there is a chance of an accident triggering something and that's what makes the situation so dangerous."

The Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency's report due Friday to the U.N. Security Council on the status of Iran's uranium enrichment program will shape debate in the council that could begin as early as next week. At issue would be possible international responses to Tehran. An IAEA official declined to comment on the contents of the pending report.

Iran dispatched an envoy to Vienna on Wednesday to meet with representatives of the IAEA, but neither side expressed optimism about a last-minute breakthrough. Iranian leaders have said they will not stop their uranium enrichment efforts, but rather plan to expand them.

"I think it's pretty clear what that report is going to say," White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters Wednesday, "which is that this is a regime that is in noncompliance with its obligations; this is a regime that is not abiding by the agreement it made with the Europeans to suspend all its enrichment and enrichment-related activities."

Under an agreement reached with Britain, France and Germany, Iran had suspended enrichment work while negotiations continued toward an agreement under which Iran would receive economic and political incentives in exchange for a permanent shutdown of controversial aspects of its nuclear program. It recently restarted enrichment.

Iran says its nuclear program is exclusively directed toward generating electricity. But U.S. officials accuse it of using the program as a cover to develop nuclear weapons. The Security Council has instructed Iran to stop its uranium enrichment program out of concern that it puts the country a step closer in the years-long process of building a nuclear bomb.

Iranian authorities, playing to a domestic political audience, have cast the U.N. demands as an effort by the West to trample on its sovereign right to develop a civilian nuclear program. "The Iranian nation and its officials are peace-seekers and the Islamic republic would not invade anybody," Khamenei said Wednesday.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has also created concern abroad by repeatedly calling for the end of the Jewish state. On Monday, Ahmadinejad said the "fake" state "cannot survive" and urged Israeli immigrants to return to their home countries. He has often called the Holocaust a myth.

"Of all the threats we face, Iran is the biggest," Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said Tuesday as Israel observed Holocaust Remembrance Day. "The world must not wait. It must do everything necessary on a diplomatic level in order to stop its nuclear activity."

He added, "Since Hitler we have not faced such a threat."

Iran Leader Warns U.S. Against Attacking (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, April 26, 2006

Iran's supreme leader warned the United States on Wednesday that his nation would hit back twice as hard if America attacked its nuclear sites.

Even as it threatened to ravage U.S. global interests, Iran sent its top nuclear official to Vienna, Austria, for talks with the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency ahead of a Friday Security Council deadline for Tehran to halt its uranium enrichment activities.

"The Americans should know that if they invade Iran, their interests around the world would be harmed," supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told workers gathered ahead of May Day, the international workers' holiday, state television reported.

"Iran will respond twofold to any attack," Khamenei said.

The United States repeatedly has said it has no plans to attack Iran but all options remain on the table as it pursues a diplomatic solution to Iran's insistence on enriching uranium — a process that can produce fuel for generators or fissile material for nuclear bombs.

Britain on Wednesday ruled out military force against Iran. "This is not Iraq. Nobody is talking about military action," Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said in a speech in London.

But Straw said how the world deals with the standoff over Tehran's nuclear program will be a test for the relevance of international diplomacy.

The Security Council has given Iran until Friday to suspend enrichment. If it does not, the council is likely to consider punitive measures against the Islamic republic.

Iran has rejected the ultimatum, but senior negotiator Gholamreza Aghazadeh was discussing the issue in talks Wednesday with the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is preparing a report on Iran's compliance with the Security Council demand.

In Vienna, diplomats were skeptical of any proposals that Aghazadeh was carrying, saying they were unlikely to alter the negative tone of the IAEA report to the Security Council. Still, one of the diplomats — who demanded anonymity because he was not supposed to be discussing the confidential talks — said the two sides agreed to a second round of talks in the evening after an afternoon meeting attended by IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei.

The chief U.S. delegate to the IAEA, Gregory L. Schulte, has said he expects a negative report from ElBaradei.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shrugged off the possibility of the council's penalizing Iran.

"The enemies could not impose their wrong decision against us under cover of the Security Council and the IAEA," Ahmadinejad said, according to state television.

Ahmadinejad said Iran remained committed to negotiations.

"We are ready to discuss (the nuclear program) to show that it has not been diverted" to military purposes, the president said.

The United States has asked for the Security Council to meet May 3 to discuss how to respond to the report.

While the IAEA has found no "smoking gun" proving Iran wants nuclear arms, a series of IAEA reports have revealed worrying clandestine activities such as plutonium processing and documents including drawings of how to mold weapons-grade uranium metal into the shape of a warhead.

Iran deepened international concerns by announcing April 11 that it had enriched uranium with 164 centrifuges. It has informed the IAEA that it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges in the last quarter of 2006 and later 54,000 centrifuges for large-scale enrichment of uranium.

While tens of thousands of centrifuges need to be running in "cascades" for a full-fledged enrichment programs, experts estimate that Iran could produce enough nuclear material for one bomb if it had at least 1,000 centrifuges working for over a year.

On Tuesday, Iran issued its toughest warning on the issue. Nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said that if the Security Council imposes sanctions, Iran would stop cooperating with the IAEA and conceal its nuclear activities.

"If you take harsh measures, we will hide this program. If you use the language of force, you should not expect us to act transparently," Larijani said.

DOJ_NMG_0026827

Iran appears to be drawing strength for its defiance from the evident reluctance of Russia and China to endorse sanctions. The two powers hold vetoes on the Security Council.

"We see no alternative to the negotiations process," Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said Tuesday. China has repeatedly urged all parties to show flexibility and pursue a peaceful settlement.

A Defiant Iran Banks On A Split At UN (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - With neither side blinking, Iran and the international community are preparing to take the next step in their showdown over Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

The confrontation returns Friday to the United Nations Security Council, where the Iranian regime is hoping a divide-and-conquer strategy will prevent the UN body from taking any coercive action to limit its nuclear program. It may be a bold gambit: Just a month ago, the Council acted - unanimously - to give Iran 30 days to show it had ceased uranium enrichment.

But the Security Council, in fact, is split over the need for action against a defiant Tehran - increasing the likelihood that steps such as economic sanctions will be taken not by the UN, but by a "coalition of the willing" of the US and equally adamant allies.

"Of course we have a strong preference for action by the Security Council, for legal reasons ... and [because] it sends a clear message to the Iranian people that action is against the regime and not them," says a French diplomat who requested anonymity because of the delicate nature of the negotiations. "But at the same time, we can't remain forever doing nothing in the case Iran goes forward with its process."

The United States as well has been emphasizing its preference for united Security Council action against Iran. But it is also floating with allies the possibility of steps outside the UN if the Security Council proves unable to bridge its differences - essentially with the US, Britain, and France on one side, and Russia and China on the other.

Beginning Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to attend a two-day meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Sofia, Bulgaria, where the issue of Iran and its relevance to the Atlantic alliance is expected to be raised, according to NATO officials.

The 30-day pause in deliberations on Iran was designed to give the Iranian government an opportunity to cease uranium enrichment, reassure the world that it is not proceeding along a path to nuclear armament, and stave off further international action.

But if anything, Iran has used the days preceding a return to the Security Council to rattle the international community: not only to boast of a perfected enrichment process, but to do it with veiled references to secret enrichment sites and to accelerated nuclear development.

The Iranian game plan appears to be to set up a confrontation with the West that not only divides the international community but shatters any consensus against its nuclear program, analysts say.

"They seem to be trying to replay the good-cop-bad-cop strategy the US and EU [European Union] used against them, but in their own way where they play both the good cop and the bad cop," says Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert with the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

He points to Iran's diplomatic forays to Russia and Persian Gulf states, as well as toward Sudan, even as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad taunts the West. And he says Iran is trying to look reasonable and cooperative to friends (like Russia) and Muslim countries, while also appearing to stand up to Western powers.

The Iranian strategy may be working, both at home and when it comes to the UN. Domestically, the outspoken Mr. Ahmadinejad is winning points with his anti-Western stance, even as he fails to deliver on the bread-and-butter issues that brought him to power.

"This could be part of his domestic political calculations," says Joseph Cirincione, director for nonproliferation at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington. "The more he postures as standing up to a US positioning itself for war, the more he consolidates his power."

Then there's the UN: A month after the Security Council approved a watered-down statement on Iran, world powers seem no closer to consensus on diplomatic action, such as "smart" sanctions aimed at Iranian officials.

Initially, the US, Britain, and France are set on seeking something more from the Council than the simple "presidential statement" that was approved a month ago. This time they want a so-called "Chapter 7 resolution," which would designate Iran a threat to international security - a step that would open the door to sanctions and eventually even military action.

In the days leading up to Council deliberations, the US is reiterating that it is not seeking sanctions at this time. "The resolution we are contemplating ... would not be a sanctions resolution," the US ambassador to the UN, John Bolton, said Tuesday. "So from our perspective, we are going to take it one step at a time."

But for China and Russia, a Chapter 7 resolution puts the Council on a course of action, including sanctions, even if the text does not specifically call for it. And it also starts looking increasingly like the diplomatic road the US took before going to war with Iraq, some experts say.

That helps explain why neither veto-wielding nation is likely to go along with a tough new resolution. "I think the Chapter 7 route is dead on arrival," says Mr. Cirincione. "The US can keep talking about it, but our own policies have doomed it."

Specifically, he says the US appears to be "following the playbook on Iraq," by insisting it wants a diplomatic solution even as it continues to hold out the possibility of military action. "That may not be what's happening," he says, "but to a number of countries out there, it looks that way."

US officials appear to be aware of this perception. Secretary Rice this week said the US is "aware Iran is not Iraq." But at the same time, she warned that the Security Council's relevance to international security is on the line in the Iranian issue.

"We're starting to hear the US use the Iraq language - that if the Security Council doesn't act, it becomes an irrelevant organization," says Mr. Takeyh of the Council on Foreign Relations. "The strategy may be to put together a coalition of the willing to apply sanctions, but you can't go that route without denigrating the Security Council first."

House OKs Tighter Sanctions Against Iran's Nuclear Aims (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

The House yesterday overwhelmingly passed a bipartisan bill that toughens sanctions against Iran until the country dismantles its nuclear programs, with supporters saying the move is a "key component of our war on terror."

Lawmakers voted 397-21 for the Iran Freedom Support Act, created "to hold the current regime in Iran accountable for its threatening behavior and to support a transition to democracy in Iran."

The bill sends the message "the United States expects Iran to be a responsible member of the international community," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican.

But opponents from both parties argued the bill undermines diplomacy and is a first step to war with Iran.

Rep. Ron Paul, Texas Republican, said the measure reminds him of a 1998 congressional resolution that called for regime change in Iraq, which he thinks was the first step to the "very unpopular, expensive" Iraq war.

Rep. Earl Blumenauer, Oregon Democrat, noted all lawmakers "hate this regime," but he favors "strong, smart, constructive, diplomatic efforts" -- characteristics that he says are not present in the bill.

"I am very worried about where this all ends," he said.

Supporters repeatedly said the bill "does not authorize the use of force."

"If the U.S. fails to act with clarity ... the potential consequences of inaction could be catastrophic," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican. "This is real."

Several supporters mentioned Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's recent statement that Israel "must be wiped off the map."

Rep. Eric Cantor, who is Jewish, said Congress must take such threats seriously. "This bill should be the first step and not the last," the Virginia Republican said.

That's what opponents fear.

"It is bad for Iran to have a nuclear weapon, but there are things that are worse," such as giving the country a reason to use one, said Rep. Jim Leach, Iowa Republican.

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich said the Bush administration has "made a mess of international relations," with the war in Iraq.

"Don't we have enough problems in Iraq to clean up before setting the stage for another conflict with Iran?" the Ohio Democrat asked.

Under the bill, the mandatory sanctions must remain in place until Iran dismantles its weapons programs and presents no threat to the national security of this country or its allies.

It also calls for sanctions against countries that supply Iran with materials for weapons of mass destruction and denies U.S. assistance to countries invested in Iran's energy sector.

Bush administration officials previously said the sanctions bill could harm its own negotiations with Iran.

Mr. Pence said the president is not opposed to the resolution, sponsored by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican.

A Senate version is pending in the Foreign Relations Committee.

House Backs Tighter Iran Sanctions (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, April 26, 2006

The House on Wednesday approved legislation to tighten sanctions against Iran, rejecting administration arguments that tougher sanctions could be an obstacle to international efforts to prevent the Tehran government from developing nuclear weapons.

The bill, said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, sends "a strong message that the United States expects Iran to be a responsible member of the international community."

The vote was overwhelming, 397-21 in favor, but there was also a vocal minority in opposition who drew comparisons to a 1998 congressional resolution calling for regime change in Iraq.

Many voted in good faith for that resolution, said Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, "not knowing that later on it would be invoked as a cause for the prosecution of war against Iraq."

Supporters emphasized that the legislation does not authorize the use of force in Iran and was a proper response to the Tehran government's nuclear ambitions. A nuclear Iran, said Rep. Christopher Smith (news, bio, voting record), R-N.J. "will be a devastating blow to peace and security, not only in the Middle East, but in the entire world."

The legislation, sponsored by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (news, bio, voting record), R-Fla., in effect alters the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act of 10 years ago by strengthening sanctions against Iran while taking away restrictions on Libya, which is now cooperating with the West in eliminating weapons of mass destruction.

It states that weapons of mass destruction-related sanctions against Iran remain in effect until Iran has verified that it is dismantling its WMD programs. It requires that sanctions be imposed on any person who exports or supplies to Iran goods or technology that help Iran obtain WMDs.

The measure also states that the names of individuals, governments and companies that have invested at least $20 million in Iran's energy sector be published in the Federal Register. It denies U.S. aid to countries that are invested in Iran's energy sector, but gives the president the authority to waive such a ban on national security grounds.

It also authorizes the president to provide assistance to peaceful pro-democracy and human rights groups in Iran.

The administration, in a letter to House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., last month, said the bill could limit the flexibility needed to reach a diplomatic solution to the deadlock over Iran's nuclear program.

The State Department's legislative affairs chief, Jeffrey Bergner, wrote that it could inhibit the administration's ability "to build and maintain an international consensus to confront Iran's violations collectively."

"By sanctioning foreign countries and companies that have economic relations with Iran, this bill sanctions the very countries we need for a strong diplomatic effort," said Rep. Earl Blumenauer (news, bio, voting record), D-Ore.

Rep. Mike Pence (news, bio, voting record), R-Ind., a supporter of the legislation, said the bill had since been changed to give the administration more of the flexibility it sought.

The bill must still be taken up in the Senate, where prospects are unclear.

Hu Refuses To Back Iran Sanctions (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

President Bush directly appealed to Chinese President Hu Jintao last week to support economic sanctions on Iran for not abiding by international controls on its nuclear program, but Mr. Hu refused to do so now, Bush administration officials said.

"They left open the possibility that they could support sanctions in the future," said one official familiar with the summit discussions between the two leaders at the White House last Thursday.

Some administration officials were encouraged by Mr. Hu's response. Others said it was typical of Beijing's lack of support for the United States on the issue.

On Capitol Hill yesterday, the House voted to tighten sanctions against Iran until it complies international nuclear controls. The bill urges holding Iran "accountable for its threatening behavior and to support a transition to democracy in Iran."

The bill received overwhelming support, with a vote of 397-21, despite opposition from the White House, which thinks unilateral action could inhibit the administration's ability to build an international coalition.

The high-level request of Mr. Hu was part of the administration's push within the United Nations and the international community to gather support for sanctions against Iran. U.S. officials say Iran has violated agreements by enriching uranium, although it is short of the level needed to create nuclear weapons.

A report to the U.N. Security Council from Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), will be sent to council members as early as today.

Officials said the report is expected to repeat earlier appeals for Iran to come into compliance with IAEA controls. The report also will not provide any language that could be used by Tehran to claim that its uranium enrichment outside of those controls has been permitted.

Submission of the IAEA report then is expected to set off a U.S.-led effort within the Security Council for a Chapter 7 resolution that could be passed within the next three months. The resolution would set the stage for economic sanctions or possibly even the use of force in the future to force Iran's compliance with international controls.

Officials said Russia is leading international opposition to sanctions and that China continues to support Moscow's position. The Russian government does not want to impose sanctions because of its sales of technology and military goods to Iran.

Moscow agreed earlier this month to send Tor-M1 anti-aircraft missiles to Iran that U.S. officials say could be used against U.S. or allied aircraft, if force is used to knock out Iran's nuclear facilities.

Moscow also has signed an agreement with Iran to upgrade Iran's Kilo-class submarines with the addition of SSN-27 anti-ship cruise missiles, weapons that could be used against U.S. Navy ships in the Persian Gulf, or that could also be used by Iran to disrupt oil shipments through the Hormuz Strait.

The administration hopes to persuade China to support the Chapter 7 resolution or at least to abstain from voting against it, the officials said.

However, Iran is using its oil sales to China to influence Beijing's political posture on the Iranian nuclear program, the officials said. China is buying regular shipments of Iranian oil that are needed to keep China's modernization effort going.

The governments of Britain, France and Germany, along with some other European states, appear ready to support sanctions, as a result of the failure of the talks with the Iranian government to resolve the standoff diplomatically, the officials said.

Azerbaijan Leader Staying Out Of Iran Fray (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, April 27, 2006

President Ilham Aliev of Azerbaijan opened a three-day visit to the United States on Wednesday by saying he would not allow his country to be used by the U.S. for any operations against neighboring Iran.

Aliev, scheduled to meet with President Bush on Friday, cited a "very clear" agreement with Iran that the two countries would not permit their territory to be used for operations against the other.

His visit comes at a time of rising U.S. tensions with Iran over its nuclear program, and Aliev said he would remain at arms' length from that conflict.

"Azerbaijan will not be engaged in any kind of potential operation against Iran," he said in remarks at the private Council on Foreign Relations.

The Caspian nation, which shares a border with Iran and Russia, is strategically important to the U.S. because of its location and its role in supplying the West with oil.

Azerbaijan wants to remain an "island of stability" in the region, Aliev said. At the same time, he said Azerbaijan had sent troops to Iraq, Afghanistan and Kosovo, and would "do its best to stand shoulder-to-shoulder" with the United States on security.

The president, who took office in October 2003, has the potential to be an intermediary between the Bush administration and Iran. Iranian Defense Minister Mustafa Mohammad Najjar, on a visit to Baku last week, said Aliev could use his talks in Washington to "explain" Iran's views to the United States.

Aliev said he did not think Iran would be a "major aspect" of his talks in Washington, which are due to include a meeting with Vice President Dick Cheney. But he said "if the question of regional security arises we will discuss it."

Azerbaijan is committed to peace in the region, he said. "We need to try to provide peace and stability."

"At this time," he said, "it is best to concentrate on a peaceful resolution" of the dispute over Iran's nuclear programs, which the United States and European allies say seek development of a nuclear bomb.

On another issue, Aliev conceded there was need for political reform in his country, a former Soviet republic that became independent 16 years ago. Referring to Azerbaijan's energy boom, Aliev said "economic reform without political reform will lead to severe problems." He said his country was moving forward on both fronts.

Human rights groups have criticized the nation for restricting political and human rights and questioned whether U.S. criticism would be muted due to Azerbaijan's role in supplying the West with oil.

Freedom House on Tuesday said Azerbaijan restricts political and human rights and is among the lowest-ranked countries in the private rights group's annual surveys.

"President Bush has made democracy promotion a priority of his presidency," Freedom House executive director Jennifer Windsor said in a statement. "His upcoming meeting with President Aliev presents an important opportunity for him to discuss Azerbaijan's democracy deficit."

Aliev, in response to questions Wednesday, rejected the description of his government as a "regime" and said, "We have all the major freedoms."

In his remarks, Aliev spoke most about a dispute with Armenia over the Nagorno-Karabakh enclave of Azerbaijian. Ethnic Armenian forces occupy the region, in what Aliev called an occupation. He said Azerbaijan's recovery of the territory was not subject to negotiations.

Rice Confirmed To Attend Southeast Asia Security Meet (AFP)

DOJ_NMG_0026832

AFP, April 27, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has confirmed she will attend Southeast Asia's annual security meeting here in July, Malaysian Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar said.

Syed Hamid said that Bangladesh would also make its first appearance as an observer at the regional meeting, where discussions will focus on issues including global terrorism and energy prices.

"I spoke to Condoleezza twice. She confirmed that she will be coming and is looking forward to attending the meeting. There will be full attendance by all the participants," the minister told reporters.

"There will also be a new member attending the ARF, that is Bangladesh," he said of the ASEAN Regional Forum which brings together the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and its key partners including China, Russia and Japan.

Rice shunned the ARF meeting in Laos last year, instead sending her deputy in what was seen as an attempt to pressure ASEAN into pushing its recalcitrant member Myanmar to introduce democratic reforms.

Under pressure from the international community, ASEAN at its annual summit last December signalled its impatience with Myanmar and sent Syed Hamid on an inspection visit there as its envoy.

Syed Hamid said this year's meeting will look at security and economic issues, as well as efforts to create a sense of regional unity among nations with different cultural, linguistic and religious backgrounds.

"Especially the question of energy will be discussed at great length because of the soaring prices of fuel, how it impacts the economies of ASEAN as well as our dialogue partners," he said.

"There is a desire on the part of ASEAN to be seen as cohesive and united. Of course the problem of Myanmar is there but I think this should not in any way impair ASEAN progress."

U.S. Trade Deals Embitter Latin Americans (AP)

By Joshua Goodman

AP, April 26, 2006

With the rise of China and stiff competition from Europe, the United States has been flexing its economic muscle in its own backyard.

Since 2003, when attempts to secure a hemispheric-wide free trade zone broke down, U.S. negotiators have signed bilateral, free trade agreements with nine Latin American nations. Two more, with Ecuador and Panama, are in the pipeline.

Despite skepticism among U.S. labor groups and Congress, those agreements have been an unqualified success for American exporters. For example, U.S. exports to Chile have almost doubled, to $5.2 billion last year, in the two years since the two countries signed a deal, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative said.

But among Latin Americans, the dollar diplomacy has left a bitter taste.

"Nobody who sat across the negotiating table from the United States came out of the talks feeling they got a fair deal," said Peter Hakim, president of the nonpartisan Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington. "And many feel they've been outright cheated."

Part of the failure to impress is attributable to a surge of leftist leaders in Latin America, who've deftly capitalized on the region's traditional protectionism and mistrust of Washington.

But even economists concede that free trade has barely helped the region reduce widespread poverty, which has remained stagnant for decades.

Moreover, the pacts may end up hurting farmers and rural peasants who make up almost half of Latin America's 500 million people. By permanently locking in trade preferences, countries entering trade deals are effectively turning a blind eye to the $17 billion that U.S. farmers receive annually in government subsidies, making it extremely tough to compete.

Not surprisingly, support for U.S. free trade deals in Latin America may be turning.

In Ecuador, Indian protesters last month paralyzed much of the country for nearly two weeks demanding that President Alfredo Palacio suspend trade talks with the United States that have been ongoing for years.

And even the signing of a deal is no guarantee of its implementation. Legislatures in Costa Rica and Peru have stubbornly refused to rubber stamp recent deals even as calls by opposition politicians for national referendums have grown louder.

DOJ_NMG_0026833

Still, despite the push by Argentina and Brazil to create a South American trade zone, for much of the region the price of saying no to Uncle Sam remains too high. Even if that means betraying popular goals of regional solidarity.

The experience of the Andean Community trade bloc — comprised of Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Venezuela — is a case in point.

The recent trade deals by Colombia and Peru with the United States sounded the death knell for the 39-year-old trade bloc, at least in spirit. For example, in providing a quota for American soy products, Colombia effectively shut out Bolivia from what has been until now its top soy market, worth $170 million a year.

Citing Peru and Colombia's defections, President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela, a staunch opponent of U.S. free-trade deals, announced last week that he was pulling out of the trade bloc.

It remains to be seen how strongly the Venezuelan pullout could affect the $8 billion in annual trade among bloc members, and Venezuela's commerce minister said over the weekend that the withdrawal would be gradual, over five years.

The Andean Community says that trade among member countries has risen on average by 13.5 percent a year since 1990, when it began gradually lifting tariffs and liberalizing trade.

U.S. Probe Targets U.N. Department (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United Nations confirmed yesterday the U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating suspected wrongdoing in the office that handles procurement for U.N. peacekeeping operations.

In a further blow to the troubled peacekeeping department, a report by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) to be delivered to Congress today describes the procurement office as understaffed, poorly trained and badly lacking the oversight that would uncover corruption, fraud and waste.

Eight senior staff members were suspended with pay earlier this year, after an inquiry by the U.N. inspector general's office uncovered lax management and possible corruption.

Each will be reinstated or disciplined after a U.N. task force investigates nearly 500 procurement-related tips.

"The United Nations currently has an aggressive internal investigation into all aspects of the U.N. global procurement operations," said Undersecretary General for Management Christopher B. Burnham.

"There is also an ongoing investigation by the [U.S. Attorney for the] Southern District [of New York] into the procurement office, and the United Nations is cooperating fully."

The officials involved likely have diplomatic immunity, but Mr. Burnham said U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan would lift that protection if authorities request it.

Reports by the GAO will be presented today to the House International Relations Committee, where the United Nations is likely to draw sharp criticism from lawmakers who are exasperated by the Iraq oil-for-food scandal and frustrated by the slow pace of management reforms.

The United States last year contributed about $8 billion to the U.N. regular and peacekeeping budgets, and the Bush administration and lawmakers are intent on improving the international organization's accountability.

"Brazen corruption in procurement shocks the conscience of everyone paying attention," said Rep. Henry J. Hyde, Illinois Republican and chairman of the House International Relations Committee. "The January release of a [U.N. Office of Internal Oversight] peacekeeping procurement report illustrates that corruption has risen to crisis levels."

The 56-page review by the GAO finds deep flaws in the management, coordination, and oversight in the procurement office that spent about $1.6 billion last year on everything from trash disposal in the Balkans to fresh food rations in Sudan to helicopters and cargo planes in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The research was conducted over a 10-month period with U.N. assistance.

The GAO audit found key procurement departments understaffed. Although eight missions have been added in seven years and the peacekeeping budget has tripled, the procurement staff and related oversight bodies remained stable.

DOJ_NMG_0026834

"U.N. resources are unnecessarily vulnerable to mismanagement, waste, fraud and abuse," the GAO report says, "because the procurement process is improperly managed; has not committed to maintaining a professional, trained work force; and has failed to adopt a full range of ethical guidelines."

An audit by Deloitte Consulting late last year also revealed shortcomings in peacekeeping procurement. Some of the deficiencies were identified as far back as 1992, when Mr. Annan ran the peacekeeping department.

The Bush administration lately has been pressing for reforms in the procurement and management divisions, but according to the GAO report, its efforts are long-delayed.

The U.S. Mission to the United Nations was without an ambassador-level officer for administration and management for 13 months, until Mark Wallace arrived in March.

The GAO auditors said that left meetings unstaffed, or attended by diplomats of a lower rank who lack "impact and influence."

"This key vacancy represents a missed opportunity for the United States in the formation of the U.N. management reform agenda agreed upon at the World Summit in 2005," the GAO report says.

The report recommends several reforms, including stronger oversight of the field, a database with contractors' performance histories and better mechanisms for vendors to report the irregularities that might indicate patterns of bid-rigging or influence.

There are 270 U.N. procurement officers spread over 19 far-flung peacekeeping missions, many of those in conflict areas with limited local resources.

Peacekeepers Targets Of New Sinai Attacks (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

EL ARISH, Egypt, April 26 — Two suicide bombers attacked members of a multinational peacekeeping force in the northern Egyptian Sinai on Wednesday, two days after a triple bomb attack killed nearly two dozen in a resort south of here.

The suicide blasts were small, officials said, killing only the attackers while damaging two security vehicles. But their timing — so soon after Monday's attacks — and the location in one of the Egypt's highest security zones raised concerns that the country might again be faced with the kind of sustained terrorist threat it struggled to suppress a decade ago.

The bombings on Wednesday — against members of a multinational peacekeeping force established in 1982 after a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel — came as investigators rounded up suspects and sorted through evidence in the triple bomb attack on the southern Sinai resort town of Dahab.

The latest attacks added to a general sense of anxiety, both inside and outside the government, over challenges facing the Arab world's most populated country. The government has been buffeted on multiple fronts, from sectarian strife in Alexandria, where a Muslim resident recently attacked three Coptic Christian churches, sparking days of riots, to a protest by thousands of judges demanding independence from the executive branch, to the emergence of the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood as the only organized political opposition.

The string of bombings in the Sinai — at a time when the government has increasingly moved to stifle political opposition — has also prompted many people to charge that the authorities are so focused on political control they have undermined their ability to fight terrorism.

"The problem is you cannot separate what's happening now from the general atmosphere in Egypt," said Dr. Emad Gad, an analyst at the government-financed Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "There is a state of apprehension. Part of the problem rests in the fact that the Egyptian security agencies are concerned about confronting civil society interactions."

While the government insists it has made every effort to combat domestic terrorism, it has appeared stumped over to how to safeguard its tourist industry in the Sinai, one of the pillars of the nation's economy.

Magdy Rady, the chief government spokesman, said Wednesday night that the government recognized that it needed to address security in the Sinai in a comprehensive way — from improving roads to building schools — and said the government had developed a master plan to address the many concerns of the region. But he disputed the notion that the spate of attacks suggested a government failure, saying they occurred as tourism and the economy had begun to improve.

"The prime minister said something very true, that it seems like there are some people who do not like for Egypt to wake up," Mr. Rady said. "We were approaching a record in tourism. We are heading to a 6 or 7 percent growth rate, part of it because of investment, part because of tourism, and all this terrorism will affect this."

The aftermath of the Dahab attack demonstrated the nearly impossible task the government faced in trying to deter terrorism. While security at hotels has been tightened around the country, those responsible for Dahab went after the softest of targets — the middle of a crowded pedestrian walkway. Men, women and children were killed and maimed.

There have been multiple bombings in the Sinai in the last two years, and investigators say that what is worrisome is that they all appear connected — including Dahab and the suicide blasts.

Investigators said the attacks seemed to be the work of locals, mostly people from the Northern Sinai region who know the area and can avoid the intense security and checkpoints that are routine here, and have decided that they are willing to kill to undermine the government. An Interior Ministry statement said it had information that the attackers in Dahab and Northern Sinai were Sinai Bedouins.

"It is obvious that there is a link, especially since there are still suspects at large from the first attacks," said a top security official who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

The first attack on Wednesday occurred about 11 a.m. when a suicide bomber exploded a device near a van carrying two Egyptian officials and two peacekeepers with the multinational force, not far from their base in Al Gorah, about 15 miles west of the Gaza Strip.

The second bomb blew up five minutes later beside an Egyptian police vehicle responding to the first attack, officials with the multinational force said, adding that the bombers were the only ones injured in either attack.

But the bombings, while far less bloody than those in Dahab, sent a chill through Cairo.

For the first time since Hosni Mubarak became president, Egyptians are pressing his government in ways they have never dared to before, and the protests continue despite beatings and arrests by the security forces. As the suicide bombers were attacking the peacekeeping forces, for example, some of Egypt's most prominent judges were in the eighth day of a Cairo sit-in to demand independence from the executive branch.

"There are cracks everywhere, and what we have seen in the recent weeks are symptoms of deeper cracks in the regime," said Saad Eddin Ibrahim, who was once jailed for his own democracy work.

"The people are no longer as afraid of the regime as they used to be," he said. "Part of it is because of their ineptitude of handling big problems in the country whether social, political, or economic."

Mr. Rady, the government spokesman disagrees, saying that it is because of Egypt's successes that it has been the target of attacks.

"Even though there are some trespasses, we are heading the right way in many things, and every time we are about to accomplish something, there is a hit that brings us back a bit," he said. "We are adamant to head for our target despite all these problems. But there is someone trying to pull us back."

Two Bombers Target Forces In Egypt (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

CAIRO, April 26 -- Bombers targeting Egyptian police and a U.S.-led multinational peacekeeping force killed only themselves in a pair of attacks Wednesday in northern Sinai, two days after blasts at a resort in the southern part of the peninsula left at least 18 civilians dead.

The attacks displayed the Egyptian government's continuing difficulty in pacifying the rugged Sinai region, which has become a stronghold for violent groups, government officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0026836

In the first attack Wednesday, a man approached a vehicle operated by the Multinational Force and Observers or MFO, which has monitored the Sinai as an element of the 1979 Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. The bomber blew himself up, perhaps as he tossed an explosive at the vehicle, according to Mahmoud Fishawy, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

The blast broke a window of the vehicle, which was carrying two police agents and soldiers from the Norwegian and New Zealand contingents. Neither the Egyptian police officers nor the peacekeepers were injured, Fishawy said.

A second bomber was riding a bicycle and tried to block a police car carrying two Egyptian police officers on their way to investigate the first explosion. The bomber also blew himself up, said Fishawy, labeling it a suicide attack. Neither of the police officers was hurt.

The peacekeeping force has operated largely in safety. Last August, however, a roadside bomb detonated near an MFO vehicle and slightly wounded two Canadian peacekeepers.

The Wednesday attacks followed the deployment of extra police officers and soldiers and additional checkpoints in the Sinai after Monday's explosions in the town of Dahab, where three bombs exploded on a seaside promenade.

The Egyptian interior minister, Habib al-Adli, said the bombings this week were linked to an attack last July in Sharm el-Sheikh, which killed 64 people, and to one in 2004 in Taba and another nearby resort close to the Israeli border, which killed 34 people.

Egyptian officials have blamed the bombings on Islamic extremists who have their roots in a disaffected Bedouin population that has complained of government repression and neglect. Massive police roundups of suspects that followed the Taba and Sharm el-Sheikh bombings also stirred discontent, officials said. In an announcement about Wednesday's bombings, the Interior Ministry specified that the second attacker was Bedouin.

"Sinai is a place where the government has not been present," a senior government official acknowledged. "Bedouins know the area better than any security official."

President Hosni Mubarak, a longtime U.S. ally, recently hinted he would extend emergency laws that have been in force since 1981, on the grounds that easing them would pose "a serious danger." The laws, originally justified as a means to fight terrorism, permit authorities to detain Egyptians indefinitely without charges, try civilians in military courts and restrict public gatherings, speech and political activity. Opposition groups and pro-democracy forces say the laws are used to buttress Mubarak's 25-year reign and stifle reform in advance of a move to transfer power to his son, Gamal.

In addition to the Sinai attacks, Egypt has recently experienced a spike in violence between Muslims and Coptic Christians, a minority in Egypt. Two weekends ago, the fatal stabbing of an elderly Coptic man by a Muslim assailant ignited three days of sectarian street battles in the Mediterranean port city of Alexandria.

Moreover, police killed at least 10 Egyptians during parliamentary elections last year when security agents blocked access to several polling stations, and on Dec. 30 last year, 23 Sudanese migrants were killed when police cleared an encampment in Cairo set up to protest refugee repatriations.

The bombings Wednesday took place near the peacekeeping force's base near the town of Rafah, on Egypt's border with the Gaza Strip.

A statement from the force's headquarters in Rome said the first assault took place at 11 a.m., as a peacekeeping vehicle left the el-Gorah base. The Egyptian police had visited the base to handle travel paperwork for the peacekeepers, the Interior Ministry said. The second bombing attempt took place 35 minutes later on a road between Rafah and el-Gorah.

The multinational force includes 1,800 troops from 10 countries: the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Italy, France, Colombia, Hungary, Uruguay and Fiji. Although not technically a member, Norway provides the force with three officers.

Putin Talks Of Sending Oil To Asia, Not Europe (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

MOSCOW, April 26 — President Vladimir V. Putin said Wednesday that Russia should direct future oil and natural gas exports to Asia because "unprincipled competition" had blocked its energy companies from expanding elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0026837

With the bold warning that Russia has other export options, Mr. Putin waded into a debate in Europe over the plans of Gazprom, the natural gas monopoly, which is trying to enter the retail gas market.

Mr. Putin couched his words in a discussion of a new Siberian pipeline to ship oil to China, Japan and other Pacific Rim markets. He spoke before a meeting on energy issues with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany in the Siberian city of Tomsk.

This week, the Russian oil pipeline operator Transneft said that it would break ground on Friday on a 1,400-mile pipeline from eastern Siberia to the Pacific Ocean. The pipeline, which will be able to carry 1.5 million barrels a day, could divert exports to Asia that now go to Europe.

The swagger in Mr. Putin's remark suggests his government believes it now has a strong negotiating hand with Europe on energy issues.

After Gazprom briefly cut natural gas exports to Ukraine in January, European leaders questioned Russia's reliability as a supplier.

It is certainly a large one. At the end of trading on Wednesday, the stock market value of Gazprom was $267 billion, more than BP, Europe's largest energy company. The value put Gazprom in second place after Exxon Mobil of the United States. Gazprom is now the fourth-largest company in the world after Exxon, General Electric and Microsoft.

"We often encounter unfair competition on international markets," Mr. Putin told a business forum held before the summit with Ms. Merkel.

"Despite the great demand for energy resources, attempts are made, under all sorts of pretexts, to restrict us," he said. "Remember that the nations of the Asia-Pacific region are developing at an enormous rate, and they need our cooperation."

Ms. Merkel, who was brought up in East Germany, has taken a firmer line with Mr. Putin than her predecessor, Gerhard Shröder. Still, the German companies E.On and BASF were expected to sign a big natural gas deal with Gazprom at Tomsk.

Outside of Germany, Gazprom's business is not progressing smoothly. British news media reported this month that regulators had held eight meetings on how to block a possible bid by Gazprom to buy Centrica, Britain's largest gas distributor.

Thus, Mr. Putin's comments about "unprincipled competition" seemed to reflect, in part, unhappiness at Gazprom, though Prime Minister Tony Blair's office said Wednesday saying that it would not interfere in a Gazprom bid for Centrica.

Gazprom's deputy director, Aleksandr I. Medvedev, said Tuesday on the BBC "Hardball" program that Gazprom was considering buying Centrica but was not in talks with it.

Because of Gazprom's wealth from high energy prices, "it is very difficult to find a company which is not on our watch list," Mr. Medvedev said. Gazprom says there are many companies in Europe it would like to acquire: "Let me calculate," said Mr. Medvedev. "It will not be enough to have all the fingers on my hand."

Across Europe, Gazprom has found its association with the Russian government a liability in making acquisitions, analysts say.

As the Centrica plans soured, Gazprom's chief executive, Aleksei B. Miller, warned European ambassadors that Gazprom would turn to Asia if it felt unwelcome in Europe.

Still, energy analysts say it is unlikely that Russia could intentionally curtail exports to Europe because of the high cost of unused export capacity. Instead, Europe's supply after the Siberian pipeline opens will hinge on whether Russia pumps enough oil to satisfy both markets.

Putin Uses Asia In Power Play On EU (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

MOSCOW -- President Vladimir Putin warned that Moscow would shift its energy focus to Asia if Europe resisted its expansion plans, ratcheting up the tension in an escalating row over Russia's international energy ambitions.

His comments come amid growing concerns in European countries about becoming overly dependent on Russian energy, as natural-gas giant OAO Gazprom looks to acquire distribution and marketing assets across Europe. Last week, Gazprom officials told European Union ambassadors that it would redirect exports to other markets if its European ambitions were thwarted.

"People are using various pretexts to limit us to the north, the south and the west," Mr. Putin told a meeting of regional governors in Tomsk, Siberia. "Unfortunately, we are very often coming across methods of unfair competition in world markets." The countries of the Asia-Pacific region "need cooperation with us," he added.

Russia has long said it wants to diversify its energy exports. Last month Gazprom announced plans to build two pipelines that could eventually supply China with 60 billion to 80 billion cubic meters of gas a year, with first deliveries in about five years.

But many analysts say that for the time being, Gazprom's threat to sell its gas elsewhere is empty rhetoric. Most of its pipelines flow westward; indeed, it recently started building one under the Baltic Sea to Germany, in partnership with BASF AG and E.On AG. A Gazprom official said this week that the company's share of the European market was set to grow to 33% by 2010 from 26% now.

"If you take into consideration where world gas reserves are, Europe will remain Russia's core gas market for the foreseeable future," said Kakha Kiknavelidze, an analyst at Brunswick UBS bank in Moscow.

The president's comments came hours before a summit in Tomsk with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who represents Russia's biggest natural-gas customer. Ms. Merkel is expected to press Mr. Putin on the security of Russian energy supplies, an issue that has become contentious since Russia briefly shut off natural-gas supplies to Ukraine in January over a pricing dispute.

Gazprom's warning to the EU last week followed reports in British media that the United Kingdom government had considered changing merger rules to stop Gazprom from taking over Centrica PLC, Britain's biggest natural-gas supplier, a move Gazprom said it might consider. U.K. officials later said authorities wouldn't try to block such a bid.

The storm over Centrica prompted accusations by Gazprom that Europe was trying to politicize the energy issue. Gazprom made a similar charge over the International Energy Charter, which the EU wants Russia to ratify. That would break Gazprom's monopoly by requiring it to allow third-party access to its export pipeline network. So far, Gazprom remains opposed.

Putin Reroutes Oil Line To Avoid Landmark Lake (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

MOSCOW, April 26 — President Vladimir V. Putin ordered Wednesday that an oil pipeline being built across Siberia be rerouted away from the northern shore of Lake Baikal, one of the world's natural landmarks.

Mr. Putin's edict reversed a controversial government decision last month to allow Russia's pipeline monopoly, Transneft, to build the line within a half mile of Lake Baikal, the world's most voluminous body of fresh water.

The pipeline, a $11.5 billion, 2,500-mile project, will pump Russian oil to markets in Asia.

Rare public protests followed the approval in March of the initial route, with rallies from Moscow to Irkutsk, the Siberian region bordering the lake.

"It was not a huge wave," Aleksandr Shuvalov, deputy executive director of Greenpeace Russia, said of the protests, "but it was a wave."

The pipeline's route, so close to Lake Baikal, had raised concerns that any accident in a remote, seismically active region could send oil spilling into a lake holding more than 20 percent of the world's fresh water and an abundance of unique wildlife species. Not only environmental groups, but also Russian scientists opposed Transneft's planned route.

A commission of specialists from the Russian Academy of Sciences initially opposed the route on environmental grounds. Its recommendation was rejected and a new review ordered with new specialists.

Mr. Putin's decision on Wednesday was an unexpected reversal and appeared choreographed for state television networks. Meeting with federal and regional officials in Tomsk, a Siberian city, he publicly chided Transneft's director, Semyon M. Vainshtok, after asking if there was an alternative to the contested route.

"Since you hesitate, it means that there is such a possibility," Mr. Putin told a visibly uncomfortable Mr. Vainshtok. "If there had not been such a possibility, you would have said 'no' without any doubt."

DOJ_NMG_0026839

Mr. Putin then ordered that the route hew more closely to one previously recommended by the Academy of Sciences but rejected by a regulatory agency. He said a new route should be charted at least 40 kilometers, or nearly 25 miles, from Lake Baikal. That would put it outside of Baikal's watershed, environmental groups said.

Mr. Shuvalov called it "a victory of common sense."

The reversal underscored Mr. Putin's highly centralized power and his penchant for dramatic gestures. Wielding a pen in front of an oversize map of the Baikal region, he swept aside decisions by several government agencies, as well as those by Transneft, which had warned that finding another route would be prohibitively expensive.

Mr. Vainshtok and other officials from Transneft could not be reached for comment. They had said that the planned route would be safe and that moving it could add nearly $1 billion to the cost of the pipeline. When Mr. Vainshtok, in the televised exchange, suggested that the pipeline would have to move "much farther north," Mr. Putin responded curtly.

"If there is at least a tiny chance of polluting Baikal," he said, "we, thinking of future generations, must do everything not only to minimize this threat, but to exclude it."

Natalya Podkovyrzina, a leader of Baikal Wave, an environmental group in Irkutsk, said it was not yet clear if the pipeline could easily be built where Mr. Putin said. "Forty kilometers to the north is a mountainous area, highlands and impassable taiga," she said. Mr. Putin decided to move the pipeline as Russia, with Ukraine and Belarus, commemorated the 20th anniversary of the nuclear accident at Chernobyl. The authorities broke up a protest against nuclear energy in Moscow, briefly detaining a dozen Greenpeace protesters who had chained themselves to a fence at St. Basil's Cathedral, in Red Square.

Sudan's Bashir Rebuffs U.N. On Peacekeepers (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, April 26 -- Sudan's president has rejected a U.N. appeal to allow its peacekeepers into the Darfur region to help stem a tide of violence that has left more than 100,000 dead and more than 2 million displaced over the past three years, a senior U.N. official told the Security Council on Wednesday.

The remarks represented a setback for a U.S.-backed proposal to send more than 15,000 U.N. and NATO peacekeepers to Darfur to replace an underequipped African Union force of more than 6,000 troops. The Bush administration has accused Sudan and a government-backed militia of committing genocide in Darfur.

Hedi Annabi, the United Nations' second-ranking peacekeeping official, told the 15-nation council in a closed session that Khartoum formally rejected a request to send an assessment mission there. "Such an assessment remains an indispensable step in the planning process," said Annabi, who briefed the council on a recent meeting with Sudan's president, Lt. Gen. Omar Hassan Bashir, in Khartoum.

Annabi warned that Sudan's opposition could doom U.N. peacekeeping plans. He suggested the council look outside the United Nations for troops if it decides to intervene in Darfur without an invitation from the government.

"The government of Sudan remains opposed to a transition to a United Nations operation in Darfur and has so far been unwilling to cooperate with our planning efforts," Annabi told the council.

The Bush administration accused Khartoum of stalling. "This is just delaying and delaying and delaying, and it's consistent with the pattern that the Sudanese government has followed for years in this," said John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Annabi said the Sudanese leader left open the possibility of some U.N. role in assisting peace efforts if Khartoum makes peace with two Darfurian rebel groups. Peace talks underway in Abuja, Nigeria, are to conclude Sunday.

If those talks fail, and the Security Council were to decide to intervene without Khartoum's approval, Annabi said that "such a mission is better undertaken by means other than a U.N. operation." The Bush administration has secured NATO approval for a plan to send several hundred NATO advisers to bolster the African Union peacekeeping mission, as a first step in the transition to a U.N. mission, officials said. The Bush administration also sponsored a resolution Tuesday imposing a travel ban and freezing the assets of a senior Sudanese air force officer and three other Sudanese nationals for committing war crimes or impeding the peace process in Darfur.

Darfur's two main rebel groups, the Sudan Liberation Army and the Justice and Equality Movement, launched an insurgency in early 2003, alleging Khartoum was discriminating against the region's black African tribes. In an effort to quell the uprising, Sudan recruited, trained and supported local Arab militia, known as the Janjaweed, who have murdered, raped and terrorized hundreds of thousands of civilians suspected of backing the rebels.

While the death toll is unknown, U.N. officials and outside analysts estimate that 100,000 to 400,000 may have died from violence, disease and hunger.

Senior U.N. officials say that violence in Darfur has escalated in recent months, forcing more than 200,000 civilians from their homes since December. New York-based Human Rights Watch reported last week that the Sudanese government has launched a new military offensive in South Darfur, targeting villages in rebel controlled territory. On Monday, Sudanese Antonov aircraft and helicopter gunships fired indiscriminately at civilians during a raid in South Darfur, according to the rights group.

"Khartoum's new attacks on civilians show the Security Council needs to move quickly on a U.N. protection force for Darfur," said Peter Takirambudde, Africa director for Human Rights Watch. "They also show that the sanctions, while welcome, may not hit hard enough -- or high enough -- and civilians will continue to pay the price."

U.S. Options On Darfur Are Running Out (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — As the violence in the Darfur region of Sudan grows ever more deadly, Bush administration officials now acknowledge that they have few if any promising policy options for containing the carnage.

If there is no agreement by Sunday on a way to resolve the crisis, the long-running peace talks are to be disbanded. But hopes for an agreement are low.

One proposal, to send 20,000 United Nations peacekeepers to Sudan, has been stymied by Khartoum's adamant opposition. Without the government's agreement, the Bush administration acknowledges, dispatching troops to Darfur would rightly be viewed as an invasion.

"Sudan policy has run off the road into a ditch," said John Prendergast, a former senior Africa specialist for the government.

This comes as public outrage, sporadic before, is growing over the continuing bloodshed in Darfur, which the United States characterizes as genocide. States, including Maine, New Jersey and Illinois, and cities and private groups across the United States are cutting financial ties to companies that do business with Sudan.

A coalition of advocacy groups called SaveDarfur.org has organized a large rally in Washington for this weekend featuring speakers from Congress, the administration, Hollywood and religious organizations.

An estimated 200,000 people have died in Darfur since the violence began three years ago, and more than two million others have been driven from their homes. For the administration, the greatest hope centers on the peace talks in Abuja, Nigeria, which have limped along for almost two years.

The United Nations and the African Union, sponsor of the talks, have given the government of Sudan and the Darfur rebels until Sunday to reach agreement on a draft treaty that the mediators wrote and handed to both parties on Tuesday.

Both sides agreed to look at it but were otherwise noncommittal. While the two sides have agreed on some issues during previous sessions, the remaining disagreements are thick with complexity and emotion.

"We will respect the deadline, and if there are no indications that a deal is possible, we will wind up" the talks, said Sam Ibok, leader of the African Union mediating team.

Robert B. Zoellick, the deputy secretary of state, said in an interview on Wednesday, "There's a fighting chance" to reach agreement by Sunday. Jan Pronk, the chief United Nations envoy in Sudan, said the mediators might be willing to extend the talks a few days if significant progress was being made, but probably not much more than that. "It's now or never," he said.

Mr. Zoellick added, "If there is no peace accord, then it becomes a different mission."

The plan to send up to 20,000 United Nations peacekeepers to Darfur, to replace the 7,000 African Union soldiers stationed there now, presents formidable obstacles.

DOJ_NMG_0026841

The United States and Europe have largely financed the African Union mission, but both have concluded that it is inadequate for the job. In February, the Security Council agreed to begin planning to send United Nations troops. The Bush administration said at the time that it would support the idea of having NATO take the lead in overseeing an interim African Union force until the arrival of United Nations troops.

But Sudan has remained opposed, and Khartoum has lobbied other African states, with some success, to view the idea as an affront to Sudanese sovereignty. Some of those other states would have to take part in any United Nations mission.

Now the Sudanese government is refusing even to grant visas to the United Nations team that wants to visit Darfur to assess the possible mission. But Sudan said it might change its mind if a Darfur peace agreement was reached.

Mr. Zoellick, in a speech this month to the Brookings Institution, said, "Either you get approval of the government," or "you invade, and that's a very big, serious challenge."

In an interview on Wednesday, Mr. Pronk said Sudan was even more opposed to President Bush's NATO proposal.

"Wise diplomacy," Mr. Pronk said, means "you don't talk about NATO. It is viewed here as intervention, new colonialism."

What is more, few countries have expressed any willingness to send forces or equipment as part of the United Nations mission — and then only if Khartoum agrees. The State Department says Morocco, Pakistan, Ukraine, Russia and others have made tentative commitments.

"The United Nations has been flummoxed at every juncture," said Mr. Prendergast, who was director for African affairs in the National Security Council during the Clinton administration. Now he is a senior adviser for the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit organization.

The conflict in Darfur began in February 2003, when rebel groups attacked government positions, accusing the leaders in Khartoum of ignoring their region. The government struck back with a fury, enlisting local militias to massacre civilians and destroy entire villages. The world was slow to acknowledge the problem, but in September 2004, the Bush administration stated that the carnage constituted genocide.

African Union troops began arriving in Darfur last year, and for a while the violence diminished. But in recent months it has picked up with new ferocity and has spread to Chad, where Sudanese militias are raiding Chadian villages along the border. Sudan, a senior administration official said, had also supplied weapons to rebels that attacked Ndjamena, the capital of Chad, earlier this month.

As he gave the warring groups a copy of the draft Darfur agreement on Tuesday evening, Salim Ahmed Salim, the chief mediator, said: "This is decision time. No more procrastination, no more antics, no more delaying tactics. The eyes of the world are on you."

But a senior United Nations official noted another serious problem, even if the parties agreed: the proposed agreement calls for an immediate cease-fire, but the African Union troops in Darfur have already shown they are incapable of enforcing a cease-fire.

"If there are violations on the ground," the official said, "the whole thing could fall apart."

Maoists Declare Three-month Truce In Nepal (FT)

By Binod Bhattarai In Kathmandu

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

Maoist rebels in Nepal declared a unilateral three-month truce on Thursday ahead of the country's first parliamentary meeting since King Gyanendra handed over power to a seven-party alliance on Monday.

The Maoist party chairman Prachanda said the ceasefire was an attempt to "encourage" the seven parties to declare an "unconditional" constituent assembly election to re-write the constitution for a "democratic republic".

"The people's liberation army will not engage in offensive actions during the ceasefire and will remain in defensive positions," the Maoist chief said in an emailed statement.

On Wednesday, the Maoists lifted their blockades on highways following assurances by the leaders of the seven parties that they would hold a constituent assembly election.

DOJ_NMG_0026842

The parties are organising a formal “victory rally” in the centre of Kathmandu later on Thursday when top leaders are expected to publicly articulate their commitment to such a move when parliament convenes on Friday.

Crumbling under three weeks of relentless anti-monarchy protests, the king ended 14 months of direct rule on Monday and agreed to let the seven parties implement their road map for peace in Nepal.

This road map is a result of the November 2005 “understanding” between the seven parties – that collectively control 90 per cent seats in parliament – and the Maoists. It is an agreement to end “absolute monarchy” and hold a constituent assembly election for writing a new constitution.

On Wednesday, the Maoists warned that they would re-impose the blockades if the parties do not declare a constituent assembly election on Friday when the parliament meets after a four-year “recess”.

The Maoists had returned to war in January after the royal government did not reciprocate a unilateral ceasefire they declared in September 2005. Over 13,200 people have been killed after the Maoists began their bloody campaign to topple the monarchy in February 1996.

Nepal’s parliament was dissolved in May 2002 and the king sacked the elected prime minister. Since February 2005, the country had been under the king’s direct rule after he sacked the third prime minister he hand-picked, citing the government’s failure to control the Maoist rebellion.

Nepal's Rebels Now Face Difficult Choices (WP)

By John Lancaster

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

KATHMANDU, Nepal, April 26 -- From the grounds of Nakhu prison here, Matrika Yadav watched with a sense of elation, he said, as protesters streamed down a nearby road, chanting slogans against King Gyanendra. The Maoist ideologue was convinced that the end of the country's monarchy, nearly 2 1/2 centuries old, was near.

Now, he said, he's not so sure.

Earlier this week, Gyanendra capitulated to the protesters, agreeing to reinstate parliament in a decision that turned the streets of the capital into a huge victory party on Tuesday. His retreat opened the door for the writing of a new constitution that could eliminate the monarchy.

That is the goal of Maoist rebels whose 10-year insurgency has claimed at least 12,000 lives. But for Yadav and other leaders of the rebellion, Gyanendra's eleventh-hour concession to an alliance of mainstream parties, which had orchestrated weeks of protests in loose cooperation with the rebels, was cause for suspicion, not celebration.

"The parties were caught in his trap, against the will of the people," said Yadav, 48, the highest-ranking Maoist in government custody in Nepal. "If they would have waited for a few more days, the downfall of the monarchy was inevitable."

The writers of the new constitution could agree to retain the monarchy in some form.

Yadav's conflicted reaction to the massive display of people power, which brought the Himalayan kingdom to the brink of anarchy, illustrates the dilemma of a rebel movement that wants to retain a voice in above-ground politics but not at the price of abandoning its weapons or dreams of communist utopia.

Some analysts here say they believe that the tumult of recent weeks could open the way for an end to the insurgency, by creating a new political framework in which the Maoists can work peacefully. On Wednesday, the rebels declared a three-month unilateral cease-fire, to start Thursday, saying they wanted to facilitate a constituent assembly that will draft the constitution.

In a 90-minute interview at the prison Wednesday afternoon, Yadav, a slight, boyish-looking man in rimless eyeglasses and blue windbreaker, denounced the mainstream parties as "status quo-ist and feudal" and said some Nepalis could be forced to undergo "reculturization" in labor camps following the inevitable triumph of the revolution.

At the same time, he insisted that the Maoists were still willing to work with the mainstream parties -- "synergy is a must" -- and would cooperate, up to a point, in holding elections for a constituent assembly.

"We strongly honor the opinion of the people, and what we are saying is the opinion of the people," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0026843

The Maoist party's struggle to reconcile its hard-line ideology with popular will was evident in its muddled response to Gyanendra's announcement late Monday that he would meet the seven-party alliance's demand to reinstate parliament, dissolved nearly four years ago.

On Tuesday, the Maoists' leader, who goes by the name Prachanda, denounced the king's proclamation as "a sham and a conspiracy against the Nepali people" and called for the protest movement to continue. By Wednesday, the rebel leader had softened his stance and agreed to suspend a blockade against the capital, at least until the parliament holds its first meeting on Friday.

In a statement, Prachanda said the decision came in response to an appeal from the incoming prime minister, G.P. Koirala, who earlier Wednesday promised that the new parliament was committed to holding elections for the constituent assembly. In writing a new constitution, the assembly could decide, among other issues, the future of the monarchy.

Although Maoist leaders have at times professed respect for democratic principles, their actions and ideology have not been consistent with that path. After Nepal became a constitutional monarchy in 1990, the Maoist party took part in mainstream politics until 1996, when its leadership proclaimed the experiment with democracy a failure and took the movement underground.

Maoist leaders now espouse "the Prachanda path," which blends the teachings of Chinese revolutionary leader Mao Zedong with homegrown remedies tailored to the specific social conditions of Nepal, such as caste discrimination.

The party's armed wing, equipped with homemade bombs and rifles looted from police, is thought to consist of about 7,000 full-time fighters, with as many as 25,000 militia supporters. They have the run of Nepal's mountainous countryside and at times have staged mass attacks on army outposts and other government installations.

At the same time, Maoist ideologues have retained their links to mainstream parties. At a meeting in New Delhi last November, the rebels and the parties formed a loose alliance aimed at rolling back Gyanendra's "royal coup" of Feb. 1, 2005, when the monarch assumed dictatorial powers that he said were needed to defeat the rebels.

About 70 Maoists are behind bars at Nakhu prison, a dingy single-story building surrounded by razor wire and sandbagged sentry posts on the capital's hilly outskirts. The most prominent inmate is Yadav, a grain trader's son with an eighth-grade education who joined the Maoist party at 19 and eventually rose to membership in its 27-member politburo.

During a cease-fire in 2003, he was part of a five-man team that tried unsuccessfully to negotiate a peace settlement with the government. He was arrested the following year in India and turned over to Nepali authorities.

On Wednesday afternoon, Yadav sat behind a wire-mesh screen in the visitors area of the prison, good-naturedly fielding questions from two American journalists as a fellow inmate translated his words into English.

While acknowledging the success of the mainstream parties' efforts to generate turnout for the protests, he said the Maoists deserve most of the credit for the king's capitulation because it was only under threat of rebel violence that Gyanendra agreed to go as far as he did. "To say this is the outcome of peaceful demonstrations, peaceful movement, is nothing but an illusion," he said.

Yadav described prison life as cramped but bearable, with frequent games of chess and table tennis interspersed with classes on communist ideology. The prisoners are permitted televisions and radios.

Yadav's time behind bars has apparently done nothing to cool his revolutionary ardor. "Marxism has failed nowhere," he said. "It has only been defeated for some time."

Headaches Piling Up For Britain's Blair (AP)

By Beth Gardiner

AP, April 26, 2006

In a single disastrous day, one of Prime Minister Tony Blair's closest allies came under fire over a prisoner release scandal, his deputy admitted an extramarital fling, and his health secretary endured jeers from nurses.

The headaches are piling up for Blair and his Labour Party ahead of local elections that could reduce the British leader's chances of hanging on to power if they go badly.

DOJ_NMG_0026844

"There's an accumulation, a silting up of problems," said Patrick Dunleavy, a political scientist at the London School of Economics. "It's a very bad dynamic for Labour."

Conservative Party leader David Cameron pounced on Blair after the nation's top law enforcement official admitted officials released more than 1,000 foreign convicts from prison without considering whether they should be deported.

Calling for Home Secretary Charles Clarke's resignation, Cameron said Wednesday: "He has presided over systemic failure, he's failed to deal with it and he ... misled people about the scale of the problem."

"I don't agree with that," Blair responded, although he failed to offer a staunch defense of Clarke and hustled out of the room as the home secretary rose to speak.

Clarke disclosed Tuesday that 1,023 foreigners who should have been considered for deportation had instead completed prison sentences and gone free between February 1999 and March 2006, without officials considering whether they should have been ejected from Britain. He said 288 were freed even after top officials were alerted to the problem last summer.

Blair said the system for reviewing foreign prisoners' cases "has been seriously and fundamentally at fault" but is now functioning properly.

Crime and immigration are key political issues, so the disclosures have the potential to do real damage to Blair. Clarke is a crucial ally in Blair's power struggle with Treasury chief Gordon Brown, who is eager for the prime minister to step aside so he can take over.

The government has been badly damaged by Labour's admission last month that it secretly received nearly $25 million in undisclosed loans from wealthy backers. Blair denies he nominated some supporters to the House of Lords in exchange for financial support of the party.

Support for Labour hit 32 percent, its lowest point in 19 years, in a poll published Tuesday.

Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott's acknowledgment of an extramarital affair with a secretary 25 years his junior was another blow, adding a sordid element to the government's problems.

Prescott's office confirmed the Daily Mirror newspaper had accurately reported his admission that "I did have a relationship with her which I regret."

The newspaper printed photos showing Prescott, 67, with his arm around Tracey Temple, 43, and Temple unbuttoning his shirt at an office Christmas party.

Things failed to improve as Wednesday wore on. Health Secretary Patricia Hewitt faced loud jeers of "Shame!" and "Resign!" as she spoke at a convention of nurses furious about changes the government is pushing through the National Health Service.

Health workers blame Blair's introduction of private contractors and financing deals into the public service for its big budget gaps and layoffs. The prime minister has said he will not back down.

Dunleavy said he believed Clarke would ultimately be forced to resign over the foreign prisoner releases.

Combined with a poor Labour showing in the vote next week for local council members, a Clarke resignation could increase pressure on Blair to step down this summer, Dunleavy said. However, he said he thought the prime minister was unlikely to do so unless his problems get a lot worse.

Clarke said he offered to quit last year over the releases of the foreign prisoners. The prime minister's office said Clarke repeated the offer this week, but Blair felt he should stay on.

Conservative lawmakers booed and jeered as Clarke stood in the House of Commons to make a statement Wednesday.

"I do apologize, I have apologized, I continue to do so," he said.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Jury Ends 3rd Day, No Verdict (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-Jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui case completed a third day of deliberations Wednesday without deciding whether the Sept. 11 conspirator should be executed or imprisoned for life.

After 6 1/4 hours of work on Wednesday, the nine men and three women had deliberated for 16 hours over three days. They were to return Thursday morning.

Jurors have asked only one question - a request on Tuesday for a dictionary. U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema denied the request, saying that giving them a dictionary would be like placing extraneous evidence in the jury room. She said jurors could submit a written question if they needed specific definitions.

The jury has only two choices: death or life in prison without possibility of release. If jurors cannot reach a unanimous decision, Brinkema automatically will sentence him to life.

The 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent is the only person in this country charged in al-Qaida's Sept. 11, 2001, suicide-hijacking attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Earlier this month, this jury found Moussaoui eligible for execution. Although Moussaoui was in jail on immigration charges on Sept. 11, the jury ruled that lies he told federal agents in the month before Sept. 11 kept them from identifying and stopping some of the hijackers.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April 2005 to conspiring with al-Qaida to fly jetliners into U.S. buildings. But he denied, as he had for four years, having any role in the Sept. 11 attacks. At his guilty plea, he said he was to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House at some later date if the U.S. refused to release a radical Egyptian sheik imprisoned for other terrorist crimes.

During the trial, Moussaoui stunned the courtroom by testifying for the first time that he was to have hijacked a fifth plane on Sept. 11 and flown it into the White House.

Judge Nixes Moussaoui Juror Interviews (AP)

By Stepehen Ohlemacher, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The judge in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial turned down a request from reporters from 14 news organizations Wednesday to ask jurors to discuss their verdict once the trial ends.

"I do not believe it is appropriate for the court to serve as an intermediary between the media and the jurors," U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in a letter to the news organizations. "Accordingly, I will not communicate your request to the jurors."

The reporters, backed by a half-dozen other news organizations, delivered a letter to the judge early Wednesday asking her to tell jurors - whose identities have remained secret - of the public's interest in knowing how the jury reached its verdict. They requested that the message be delivered as the jurors prepare to leave the courthouse at the end of the trial.

The reporters' letter offered willing jurors a place away from the courthouse for interviews and, for those concerned about their safety, the possibility of doing it off-camera.

The letter was signed by reporters from The Associated Press, Agence France Presse, Bloomberg News, CNN, Hearst Newspapers, the Los Angeles Times, the Minneapolis Star Tribune/McClatchy Newspapers, National Public Radio, Newsday, the New York Times, Radio France, Reuters, the Richmond Times-Dispatch and the Washington Post.

The jury ended its third day of deliberations Wednesday without reaching a decision on whether Moussaoui should be executed or spend life in prison for his role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Brinkema has kept a tight lid on the jury, warning journalists against interviewing or photographing jurors while the trial is in progress. She assured jurors that their names will never be made public by the court.

On Monday, as she finished giving the jury instructions for deliberations, Brinkema warned jurors that reporters might try to contact them once the trial is over.

"Under the First Amendment of the Constitution, we cannot prevent the media from trying to interview you, except they don't know who you are," Brinkema told the jurors. "You are not required to speak. But I am not gagging you because I can't. You have got a First Amendment right to speak as well."

Hundreds Of Detainees Abused, Report Finds (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Three human rights groups said Wednesday that they had found credible evidence that U.S. troops and government civilians in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had abused, tortured or killed at least 460 detainees.

The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved. The findings are in a report by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch.

At least 600 U.S. service members or civilians have been implicated in the cases of abuse. About 400 of them have been investigated, and only one-third of those who have been investigated have faced punishment of any kind, researchers said.

Also Wednesday, Army officials confirmed that criminal charges were being considered against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan for his role in the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Col. Joe Curtin, an Army spokesman, said no decision had been made.

Jordan is the former head of the interrogation center at Abu Ghraib. If he's charged, he would be the highest-ranking officer charged in a case of detainee abuse.

The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers.

It shows that detainee abuse has been more widespread that government officials have admitted and the American military and other government agencies have made only limited attempts to investigate and punish those responsible, the rights groups charged.

"Our findings show that the abuses and torture revealed in the Abu Ghraib photos were not the isolated acts of individual soldiers," said Meg Satterwhite, the faculty director of the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice.

The Pentagon wouldn't address specific findings in the report. A spokesman said the Defense Department had investigated more than 600 allegations of abuse and had held more than 250 service members responsible.

Of the 12 major reviews of U.S. military detention operations that have been conducted, "none of them found that the department directed, sanctioned, encouraged or condoned abuse," said Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman.

"When there have been allegations of wrongdoing, they are taken seriously, investigated thoroughly and individuals are held accountable when appropriate," he said.

Tom Malinowski, the Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, said recent interviews with troops suggested that detainee abuse was less widespread than it was two years ago. But he and other researchers said civilian and military leaders needed to send a strong message that abuse wouldn't be tolerated and would be punished.

The 27-page report was based primarily on government documents, interviews with witnesses and victims, military investigation reports, court documents, detainee accounts provided by attorneys, official military statements and news accounts.

It said the alleged abuses included assault, humiliation, sexual assault or abuse, and stress techniques.

According to the report:

-Fifty-four military service members have been convicted by courts-martial in prisoner abuse cases. Of these, 40 were sentenced to prison time. The average sentence was four months. Ten of those sentenced received terms of more than a year.

More important, according to the researchers, only three officers have been convicted by courts-martial for detainee abuse. The highest-ranking was a major. No officers have been held accountable for any criminal acts committed by troops under their command.

-Of the 20 civilians referred to the Justice Department for criminal prosecution in cases of abuse, only one - a contractor - has been indicted.

-Most of the punishments meted out have been administrative, such as reduction of rank, fines or temporary confinement to base.

The researchers charged that their findings illustrated a lack of accountability over detainee abuse throughout the military and the civilian chain of command.

Judge Allows Detainee's Transfer To Harsher Prison (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0026850

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL STATION, Cuba — A war crimes tribunal judge decided Wednesday against second-guessing detention camp authorities in their decision to confine to maximum security and solitary confinement the 10 terrorism suspects who have been charged.

Navy Capt. Daniel O'Toole rejected a request by the Army defense lawyer for accused bomb maker Sufyian Barhoumi that his handicapped client be returned to the communal detention camp where he had been living until four weeks ago in recognition of his good behavior.

The defense lawyer, Capt. Wade Faulkner, had argued that the unexplained move of the 32-year-old Algerian to the harshest of the seven prison camps here had so upset Barhoumi that it undermined their lawyer-client relationship and had prevented them from preparing for trial.

Barhoumi's case offered the first witness testimony in the 4-year-old tribunal.

Barhoumi lost most of his left hand to a mine explosion in Afghanistan in 1999, and because of that has had trouble using the sink and toilet in his Camp 5 cell. He had previously been in Camp 4, along with other cooperative inmates. There are 490 detainees scattered across the archipelago of prisons at Guantanamo Bay.

"There is a huge difference between Camp 4 and Camp 5," Barhoumi told the tribunal, holding up his mangled left hand to show the scarred, blistered stump with only one finger.

He said the strong air-conditioning and limited time outdoors in Camp 5 had adversely affected his physical and psychological condition and had worsened the pain in his hand.

An official of the military joint task force that administers the prisons was the tribunal's first witness. Court rules prohibit him from being identified by anything other than "Colonel B." He said he was following Geneva Convention and Army regulations on the treatment of pretrial prisoners by holding them in closed, concrete cells at the maximum security Camp 5.

He conceded that Barhoumi and two other defendants moved at the same time might lament their lost freedom of movement and recreation time. But he said his first priority was to ensure that a detainee wasn't exposed to harm by himself or by other prisoners.

"The real baseline for my whole motivation in everything is running a peaceful, safe and secure camp," the colonel said. "I have to ensure his safety."

The Navy lieutenant prosecuting Barhoumi agreed it would be risky to leave pretrial detainees in the medium security camp where they might be vulnerable to prisoners who feared they would provide testimony detrimental to their own interests.

"You don't know that there's a threat to the detainees in Camp 4 until he's lying in a pool of blood," warned the prosecutor, who also cannot be identified.

Colonel B said that since he had taken command of the detention group he had expanded the time a compliant Camp 5 inmate was allowed outdoors to exercise from 30 minutes to two hours. The 175 detainees housed at Camp 4 can play sports and commune with others for as much as 14 hours a day.

Barhoumi said he interpreted the move as punitive and an effort to discourage his cooperation.

"Camp 5 is known for being a punishment place. Everybody knows that," said the tall, bearded defendant, who wore a wrinkled plaid shirt and blue pants.

"Don't you see why he might be upset and perceive it as punishment?" Faulkner asked Colonel B, who saw it as a possibility with some prisoners and not with others.

The prison official said moving Barhoumi and two others also previously at Camp 4 was part of his plan for consolidating Guantanamo Bay prisoners into three main camps. The wire-mesh pens used as cells at Camps 2 and 3 are gradually being emptied. Two other sparsely populated camps, Echo and Iguana, are used for visits between lawyers and their clients and to house detainees pending their release.

One of the 10 charged detainees remains at a disciplinary unit at Camp 1.

Barhoumi showed no reaction to O'Toole's ruling, which found no evidence that the transfer was punitive or damaging to his relationship with his lawyer. U.S. courts traditionally accord "wide-ranging deference" to corrections authorities in determining how best to detain prisoners ahead of trial, O'Toole said.

The chief defense lawyer, Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan, criticized what he said was another example of the tribunal officers' "legal cherry-picking."

Sullivan, other defense lawyers and human rights watchdogs have said the court set up by the Bush administration to prosecute suspected Al Qaeda figures refuses to consistently accord detainees rights assured by any recognized legal system, such as the Geneva Convention, the U.S. Constitution or the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

DOJ_NMG_0026851

Barhoumi was arrested with two Saudi detainees also appearing before the tribunal this week — as well as with senior Al Qaeda figure Abu Zubaydah — in a March 28, 2002, raid in Faisalabad, Pakistan.

Barhoumi, Jabran Said bin al Qahtani and Ghassan Abdullah al Sharbi have been charged with conspiracy to commit terrorism by plotting to build remote-controlled bombs to attack U.S. forces that had invaded Afghanistan in October 2001.

Qahtani boycotted his initial hearing Tuesday after a brief appearance before O'Toole to condemn the United States as "the enemy of God" and to say he would rather be killed than cooperate.

Sharbi's first court hearing is set for today, but he is reportedly refusing to cooperate with his military attorney.

Wilting Dreams At Gitmo (WP)

By P. Sabin Willett

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

I brought flowers to the isolation cell when I visited Saddiq this month. He likes to draw roses and often asks for gardening magazines.

Saddiq is one of the many mistakes at Guantanamo Bay. In 2005 our military admitted that he was not an enemy combatant, but the government hasn't been able to repatriate him. (By a curious irony, Saddiq's opposition to Osama bin Laden makes him too hot to handle in his native Saudi Arabia.) So he lives behind razor wire in Camp Iguana, with eight other men whom the military cleared long ago but who are nevertheless forbidden newspapers, visits from loved ones, English-language dictionaries -- and flowers.

For some time we lawyers have been asking the military for a garden. Gardens are commonplace in prisoner-of-war camps, and these men aren't even enemies. They live in a pen, but it has a small patch of ground. Why not? The military refused.

I was trying to explain this to Saddiq, along with other inexplicable things (such as how it is that innocent men can be held for years in an American prison), when he said, "We planted a garden. We have some small plants -- watermelon, peppers, garlic, cantaloupe. No fruit yet. There's a lemon tree about two inches tall, though it's not doing well."

"The guards gave you tools?"

He shook his head.

"Then -- how do you dig?" I was struggling to grasp this.

"Spoons," he said. "And a mop handle."

The soil in Camp Iguana is dry and brittle as flint. And I've seen the spoons they give our clients.

"But the spoons are plastic -- aren't they?"

Saddiq nodded. "At night we poured water on the ground. In the morning, we pounded it with the mop handle and scratched it with the spoons. You can loosen about this much." He held his thumb and forefinger about a half-inch apart. "The next day, we did it again. And so on until we had a bed for planting." He shrugged. "We have lots of time, here."

"But the seeds?" I asked. "Did they give you seeds?"

After four years at Guantanamo, Saddiq rarely smiles, but his face seemed to brighten then. "Sometimes, with the meal, they give us a bit of watermelon or cantaloupe to eat. We save the seeds."

One day the sordid history of Guantanamo will be written. There will be chapters on torture, chapters on the how the courts turned a blind eye, chapters on cruelties large and petty, on the massive stupidity and uselessness of the place. Many pages will illustrate the great lie of Guantanamo -- that it is a "terrorist detention facility" -- with accounts of goatherds and chicken farmers and stray foreigners sold by Pakistani grifters to the United States for bounties. Saddiq may have one of the oddest chapters of all: jailed first by the Taliban as an enemy of its regime, then by us.

For all that, as the poet Gerard Manley Hopkins wrote, "There lives the dearest freshness deep down things." Maybe the History of Guantanamo will have a few uplifting footnotes. America denied them seeds and trowels and they created life anyway. We tried to withhold beauty, but from the grim earth of Guantanamo they scratched a few square meters of garden -- with spoons. Guantanamo is ugly, but man's instinct for beauty lives deep down things.

When our meeting was over, the flowers had wilted. Saddiq picked up the little nosegay. "May I take these back to Camp Iguana?"

But flowers are contraband. He wasn't allowed to keep them.

The writer, a Boston lawyer with Bingham McCutchen, represents Saddiq Ahmad Turkistani, who is about to begin his fifth year of imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay.

Jailed Islamists Get 'Counseling' (WT)

By Anton La Guardia, London Daily Telegraph

DOJ_NMG_0026852

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- British security chiefs are studying a novel Saudi approach to combating terror -- using clerics to debate "jihad" with imprisoned militants and convert them to more moderate beliefs.

The Saudi authorities said about 400 of 700 extremists had been re-educated and released from prison.

The Islamic "counseling" program is part of what British experts regard as Saudi Arabia's "model counterterrorism campaign."

Senior British officials, including Eliza Manningham-Buller, the chief of MI5 intelligence agency, have visited the kingdom to devise a similar "counter-radicalization" strategy for Britain.

Saudi Arabia is one of the few countries where the fight against terrorism has yielded real success with a softer approach.

Al Qaeda's campaign in Saudi Arabia, Osama bin Laden's birthplace, started spectacularly with suicide bombings against Western compounds in Riyadh three years ago, but has abated.

Saudi security forces say they have killed or captured 25 of 26 persons on their original 2003 list of "most wanted" terrorists, including local leaders of al Qaeda.

Only four persons on a follow-up list of 36 militants are thought to be still at large in the kingdom. The rest have been killed or captured or have fled, mostly to Iraq.

"Every day, their numbers, capability and resources are less and less," said Gen. Mansour al-Turki, spokesman for the Saudi Ministry of Interior. "Terrorism in Saudi Arabia has been degraded."

The government has fired about 1,000 hard-line clerics, prevented Saudis from going to fight in Iraq and invested heavily in technology, such as a new control room for security forces in Riyadh.

Now more than 100 Muslim clerics, psychiatrists and psychologists help counsel inmates across the country.

The counseling is offered only to militants who have not been directly involved in terrorist acts, but are thought to sympathize with or provide support to extremists.

After a psychological assessment, they have one-on-one sessions with clerics to debate radical ideology, including the meaning of jihad, or holy war, and the doctrine of "takfir," which declares Muslims who disagree with them to be infidels.

Prisoners in the program are given more access to their family, who sometimes have transportation and lodging paid for by the government. If deemed suitable for release, they are then offered more help, for instance, in finding work.

"These people are very isolated in their cells. They are encouraged not to deal with anybody outside the cells. That is how their minds are controlled," Gen. al-Turki said.

"When they are arrested, we give them a chance to think for themselves, and most of them realize they chose the wrong path."

Money Laundering And Terrorist Financing Transcend Borders (VOA)

Money laundering and terrorist financing are global problems that transcend borders. Terrorist supporters funnel money through charities and international criminal gangs constantly adapt their techniques, while law enforcement agencies try to stay one step ahead.

Osama bin Laden. Terrorists use smuggled money to finance their operations.Terror groups are often fed by a rhetoric of hatred. But like many organizations, they rely on money to keep their operations going. Terrorists are financed by smuggled funds, criminal activities or any other number of ways -- even by governments themselves, according to U.S. officials.

Targeting that support is a key action for law enforcement, as top U.S. Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser explains: "By taking the steps that we're taking by disrupting, dismantling these financial networks that are supporting these activities, we are degrading the ability of these organizations to get to the stage where they only have a few more dollars to spend to complete a terrorist attack."

But it's impossible to say how much money goes into terrorism each year. And stopping that flow is extremely challenging, according to David Caruso, founder of the Virginia-based Dominion Advisory Group, an anti-money laundering consulting firm.

According to Caruso, "Governments and the private sector have really not been able to determine how much funds are used to finance terror. For example, the 9/11 [i.e., September 11, 2001] tragedy did not take relatively a lot of money. So it's very difficult for governments and financial institutions to detect."

New Methods of Financing

And terrorists are constantly looking for new methods to avoid detection and secure funding, says Jeffrey Breinholt, deputy counterterrorism chief at the U.S. Department of Justice.

DOJ_NMG_0026853

"It's important to view terrorists as being organized criminals," says Breinholt. "Terrorists are nothing if not adaptable and opportunistic. And so if we accept that as a notion, that large terrorist groups that we are targeting -- al-Qaida, Hezbollah, Hamas -- they will be ones that will pay very much attention to things that arise that are new opportunistic crimes."

Financial support for terrorism can also come from charities, front companies or couriers who smuggle money across international borders. Other avenues include diverted aid money or exploiting informal, cash-based money exchanging venues, which are popular in the Middle East and South Asia.

Treasury Under-Secretary Stuart Levey recently told a U.S. Senate committee that individual donors in Saudi Arabia are funding terrorists outside of that country. In an exchange with committee Chairman Richard Shelby, Levey said, "Is money leaving Saudi Arabia to fund terrorism abroad? Yes." Senator Shelby asked, "Some of that money going to Iraq?" Levey replied, "Undoubtedly, some of that money is going to Iraq. And it's going to Southeast Asia and it's going to any other place where there are terrorists."

Vincent Cannistraro, a former CIA counterterrorism officer explains the appeal to individuals. "The kinds of operations that are conducted mostly by al-Qaida but by similar groups, whether in Morocco, Algeria, whether they do it through affiliates in Europe, they are not terribly expensive operations to conduct. Where do they get the money? Contributions from people who believe in them. There is certainly a tendency for some wealthy Islamic businessmen to write checks," says Cannistraro.

Tracking Money

But while many governments are working hard to fight terrorism and stop terror

The illegal flow of money buys terrorists arms.financing, Under-Secretary Levey says some are doing just the opposite. He says, "State sponsors of terrorism, like Iran and Syria, present a difficult problem because they provide not only money and safe haven to terrorists, but also a financial infrastructure through which terrorists can move, store and launder their funds."

Treasury official Daniel Glaser says Iraq is one country where the United States is working to build a transparent system that is safe from exploitation. He says, "When you have a modern payment system, it decreases the reliance on cash. And cash, for obvious reasons, facilitates anonymous transactions."

Money laundering expert Caruso describes the enormous challenges in tracking the illicit flow of money. "Simply the size and complexity of the global financial system, just what occurs on a daily basis, legitimately, it's 24 hours a day, when you look at Asia, Europe, Latin America, the U.S. And to track all that, it's an impossibility," says Caruso.

Patrick O'Sullivan, a money laundering advisor at the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime in Vienna, says money launderers have used new technologies to their benefit and have evolved their techniques. He says, "Over the last 10, 15 years, really, a lot has been done worldwide to put systems in place to prevent and detect money laundering. So that has made it more difficult to launder money in traditional ways. So methods have tended to become more sophisticated."

Though stopping those bent on terrorism and wrongdoing poses a huge challenge, Justice Department official Breinholt says law enforcement must evolve with the changes. "The trick is not necessarily having laws in place to eliminate all of that, but being flexible enough to enact new laws in response to what we see from our experience," says Breinholt.

He also notes that as progress is made and officials close one channel, terrorists and other criminals open new ones in every corner of the globe. And success in closing those avenues depends on how quickly authorities adapt to the new challenges.

In our next report on terrorism, we'll examine how terrorists use the Internet to spread their beliefs and coordinate their operations.

Boss: FBI Adapting To Fight Terrorists With No Central Command (NSDY/AP)

By Pat Milton, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- Since the Sept. 11 attacks law enforcement has witnessed the emergence of a new threat, homegrown terrorist cells, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Wednesday.

The self-generating terrorist is not trained in the camps of Afghanistan, doesn't receive orders from a central hub and is not financed by sympathizing terrorist nations, Mueller said.

"What we see is a new threat that is decentralized," Mueller said. "We have seen homegrown terrorist cells not answerable to a particular leader but to an ideology."

Mueller was speaking to a group at the luncheon of the annual James M. Fox memorial lecture series.

Fox, a veteran agent known as a spy-catcher, was head of the New York FBI office during the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. He left the FBI in 1993, a year and a half after nailing mob boss John Gotti on racketeering and murder charges. He died May 16, 1997, at age 59.

DOJ_NMG_0026854

Mueller told those at the lecture luncheon that the United States' success in driving terrorists from Afghanistan, cutting off their funding and disrupting their operations has forced them to change. He said homegrown terrorists are recruiting friends, financing through street crime and self-executing.

The shift has forced law enforcement to adapt its traditional strategy of pursuing terrorists: identifying the leaders, tracking them and eventually uncovering a plot's operators.

Now investigators must rely more than ever on community outreach, intelligence and cooperation with local police departments, Mueller said.

"I cannot emphasize enough the importance of local law enforcement; from Los Angeles to New York it remains a key factor," he said, noting that the New York Police Department has 1,000 people assigned to terrorism investigations.

A terrorist's goal today is more likely a soft target such as a bus or shopping mall rather than a well-protected government building, Mueller said.

But Mueller said he believes the disruption of al-Qaida, the terrorist organization led by Osama bin Laden, intelligence sharing and law enforcement cooperation has the United States safer from an attack.

Still, as law enforcers adapt to the homegrown terrorists, they have not written off al-Qaida or any other terrorist organization.

"We cannot forget," he said, "that people overseas are plotting against the United States and would want nothing more than to replicate September 11th."

Lodi Terror Probe Continues After Verdict, Mistrial, Prosecutor Says (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, April 27, 2006

LODI, Calif. - Residents in this Central Valley town had hoped to set aside the suspicions that divided them in the 11 months since federal agents arrested a young man, his father and two Muslim religious leaders amid terrorism allegations.

But the government's chief prosecutor said Wednesday that the investigation is continuing - a day after a federal jury convicted 23-year-old Hamid Hayat of providing material support to terrorists by attending a training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and lying about it to the FBI.

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott is considering seeking a new trial for Hayat's father, Umer, 48, after a separate jury deadlocked Tuesday on whether he lied to FBI agents to protect his son.

The investigation has also resulted in two clerics and another man being deported to Pakistan for immigration violations.

But that might not be the last of the charges facing Lodi residents, Scott said after Hamid Hayat's conviction and Umer Hayat's mistrial were announced.

"Certainly there are people of interest to us," Scott said, declining to elaborate in a telephone interview Wednesday. He referred questions to FBI agents, who also said the probe was continuing but refused to give more details.

"There are aspects of this (case) which remain under investigation," said Drew Parenti, the agent in charge of the Sacramento office.

Lodi Mayor Susan Hitchcock and police Capt. Gary Benincasa said the FBI has not shared any additional suspicions with them, and neither has seen indications of terror-related activity.

Scott's comment about a continuing investigation "reopens an old wound," aggravating suspicions of and within the Muslim community that had just begun to heal, said Hitchcock.

"This is going to cause everyone unease," she said. "I hope they're speaking from real knowledge, not just hearsay or something like that, because the city of Lodi is ready to move on. This is not something we want to be known for. We want to be known for our fine wines."

The FBI began looking at Lodi Muslims because of the activities of two clerics at the local mosque.

"The original, the first thing that drew our interest was the two religious leaders in Lodi," Scott said. One had given anti-American speeches after 9-11, the other's father led a suspicious religious school in Pakistan.

"Now, whether there was some plan afoot directly linked to them, I don't know that we'll ever know that," Scott said. "But I do know that they were there, they had extremist views, (and) we now have a jury that has found beyond a reasonable doubt that a member of that mosque went to Pakistan and took training and came back to this country with the intent to kill Americans."

The Hayats were secondary targets of the investigation, developed after the FBI recruited an informant to infiltrate the 2,500-member Pakistani community in Lodi, 35 miles south of Sacramento.

Both U.S. citizens, Umer Hayat sold ice cream from a battered van while his son held a seasonal job packing cherries.

DOJ_NMG_0026855

"We just want them both to come home. His (Hamid's) mom has cried too much," Sahana Khatab, Umer Hayat's sister-in-law, said at the family's home in a converted garage. "We're just sad. The whole family's sad. We're just sitting down and praying for them."

Some Lodi residents said they were relieved by the verdicts but disconcerted that there might be other terrorism-related activity in their quiet agricultural community.

"I strongly believe that there are (terrorist) ties here. But I think there are ties all over - they just got caught here," said Holli Eddy outside a local supermarket.

Grocery stores, along with banks and hospitals, were among places Hamid Hayat said he might target as he gave an hours-long videotaped statement to the FBI in June.

Mac Garcia, who retired as a Lodi policeman and San Joaquin County investigator, said he doesn't believe there is a terrorist cell, but he can't help but be suspicious of his neighbors nonetheless.

"You see a Muslim person and just think twice because of this. It's going to linger for a long time," Garcia said.

While investigators need to be thorough, "I'm kind of concerned it might make it look like there's a lot of them (terrorists) here, and I just don't believe that. There might be some sympathizers, but I don't believe there's that kind of activity."

Malik Mukhtiar Ahmad, a member of the mosque's board, welcomed a continuing investigation because he said there is nothing to hide.

"That's their job, that's what they're paid for," he said, referring to FBI agents. "If they want to dig deeper, that's their right."

Basim Elkarra, executive director of the Sacramento office of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said if there were terrorist activity in Lodi, the FBI's 4 1/2-year probe would have found it.

He is concerned that the continuing investigation could include covert surveillance of innocent Muslims, sending another informant to infiltrate the community or the sort of interrogation he believes entrapped Hamid Hayat into making incriminating admissions while seeking to please FBI agents.

"Given the current fear and hysteria, it's not surprising that someone was convicted without any material proof," Elkarra said. "You've got someone who was naive and gullible.... The informant took him down a path and there was no turning back."

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi said she will seek a new trial before Hayat's July 14 sentencing, when he faces at least 30 years in prison if prosecutors prevail on legal issues that will determine his sentence.

"Hamid Hayat never attended a terrorist training camp. This fight is not over," Mojaddidi said.

Federal Victory In Terror Case May Prove Brief, Experts Say (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES, April 26 — Despite predictions that their victory might not hold up on appeal, federal prosecutors on Wednesday savored their victory in a Sacramento courtroom, where a jury a day earlier convicted an American born in Pakistan of providing support to a terrorist group and lying to investigators.

McGregor W. Scott, the United States attorney who oversaw the prosecution, said in a telephone interview Wednesday that the conviction of the man, Hamid Hayat, 23, showed that the government was capable of winning a jury trial on terrorism charges after a number of high-profile failures elsewhere.

"In this post-9/11 context, those of us in law enforcement have been tasked with preventing new acts of terrorism, trying to stop something from happening, rather than after the fact trying to establish what happened," Mr. Scott said. "This is a difficult task and a new mission. We have shown in this case and this trial and conviction that we can succeed in that mission."

But legal experts said the prosecution's celebration might be short-lived because a federal appeals court had twice ruled unconstitutional some aspects of the law on which Mr. Hayat was convicted. They also said Mr. Hayat's reported confessions to F.B.I. agents could be challenged on the ground they were coerced from a frightened suspect with a limited command of English.

Mr. Hayat's lawyer, Wazhma Mojaddidi, told reporters after the verdict on Tuesday that she would appeal, citing unspecified "outside influences" that affected the jury. She did not return telephone calls on Wednesday seeking comment.

Eric M. Freedman, a constitutional law expert at Hofstra University who has consulted with defense lawyers in terrorism cases, said the government's record of prosecuting terror cases since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, had been mixed, in part because several cases hinged on confessions rather than hard evidence.

"This conviction bears all the hallmarks of one that is eventually overturned as being unsupported," Professor Freedman said.

A potentially greater threat to the conviction lies in the statute on which Mr. Hayat was charged, which makes it a crime to provide "material support" for a terrorist group.

DOJ_NMG_0026856

The government charged that Mr. Hayat attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003 or 2004, returning to the United States in the spring of 2005 with the intent of waging religious war. Upon his return, he was arrested and questioned. The government said he lied repeatedly to the F.B.I. about his training and intentions before confessing to plotting against the United States.

The government never presented evidence that Mr. Hayat had participated in or planned any terrorist act. His crime, apart from lying to investigators, was providing support to violent extremist groups by attending their training camp.

That law has helped win convictions in the so-called Lackawanna Six terrorism case and the prosecution of John Walker Lindh, the American who fought alongside the Taliban in Afghanistan. But prosecutions based on the law collapsed in Tampa, Fla., where a jury last year acquitted a former professor charged with supporting extremist Palestinian groups, and in Idaho, where a college student was acquitted two years ago after being accused of aiding terrorists in Chechnya and Israel.

David Cole, a Georgetown University law professor and critic of the administration's application of antiterrorism laws, said that charging people under the material-support provision of a federal law was a "thin reed" on which to base prosecution.

"It's a conviction," Professor Cole said of the Hayat case, "and to that extent it's a victory for the government. But has this made the United States one iota safer? I don't see any evidence of it. This is very likely to be overturned on appeal."

Professor Cole said the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, which sits in San Francisco and covers the Sacramento federal court district, had twice ruled the material-support law unconstitutionally vague because it did not require proof of any overt act.

The government also charged Mr. Hayat's father, Umer Hayat, 48, an ice-cream truck driver in Lodi, Calif., of lying to investigators to conceal his son's activities. A separate jury deadlocked on two charges against the father, and the judge declared a mistrial. Mr. Scott said he had not decided on a new trial.

Lodi Terrorism Conviction Was A Rout, Jury Says (LAT)

By Rone Tempest And Eric Bailey, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

SACRAMENTO — The scorecard read like an NBA blowout.

By the time the jury finished voting on each piece of evidence, the score was 135-40 for the prosecution.

Hamid Hayat, the 23-year-old Lodi man charged with attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan and lying about it, was convicted on all four counts.

The systematic way the jurors moved through the charges during nine days of deliberation was detailed Wednesday by jury foreman Joe Cote, a 64-year-old retired medical equipment salesman from Folsom.

"We scored the entire evidence and testimony," Cote said the day after the conviction, "and it was overwhelmingly in favor of guilt."

Key to the jury's decision, Cote said, were Hayat's own words on an FBI videotape that he had attended a camp, his comments secretly recorded by an undercover informant that indicated Hayat's "willingness" to go for training and a handwritten warrior's prayer in Arabic found in his wallet.

"He got himself in pretty deep. He buried himself," said juror Starr Scaccia, 53, an administrative assistant from Roseville, in describing the five-hour videotaped interrogation.

Scaccia said she was also swayed by an Urdu language scrapbook that Hayat kept with news about militant Pakistani political parties, many of them strongly anti-American.

Despite the unanimous verdict, Cote and other jurors interviewed Wednesday said that outcome was far from certain when they began deliberations April 12.

What tipped the balance, Cote said, was when the jury had a second opportunity to review the videotaped interrogation.

The videotape was first shown early in the nine-week trial. Cote and others said that at the time they had some concerns about the leading questions and pressure tactics used by the FBI interrogators.

By the second viewing last week, he said, the jurors had been able to digest all of the other evidence. They had also received an instruction from U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell stating that "the government may utilize a broad range of schemes and ploys to ferret out criminal activity."

Going into the end of deliberations Friday, there was still one juror holding out for acquittal on the most important charge: that Hamid Hayat provided material support for terrorism by attending a terrorism training camp in Pakistan in late 2003.

Shortly after 4 p.m. Friday, Cote sent Burrell a note about the dissenting juror.

"There is impasse with a juror who does not seem to fully comprehend the deliberation process. I'm available to discuss this with you and counsel at any time," Cote wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0026857

After consulting with attorneys from both sides, Burrell ordered the note sealed and instructed the jury to continue deliberations.

Cote would not identify the balky juror but said that the note was a mistake on his part, born out of fatigue. "I think I may have chosen the wrong language," Cote said. "That was the end of the day, end of the week. My God, my brain was fried."

On Monday, the holdout juror joined the others for conviction. By Tuesday, they reached a unanimous verdict, guilty on all four counts.

That the panel went from a possible deadlock to a unanimous verdict so quickly caused Hayat's lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi to cry foul, suggesting undue pressure. "It is suspect that after only two days of deliberation," she said, "that this juror suddenly decided to convict. Especially since the only response was to continue deliberations."

But Cote and others denied any ganging up. No one put any pressure on the juror, Cote said. She came to her guilty verdict simply by "thinking about it over the weekend."

Scaccia agreed, saying the reluctant juror "was trying to do it her own way. She was working it through. She was still processing it. You've got to live with what you end up deciding. She had to take her time."

In the end, said juror Lori Macias, 46, a Fairfield real estate agent, the panel tallied up their scorecard and sided overwhelmingly with the government.

But there were times, Macias said, when watching the videotaped interrogation that jurors wondered why Hayat, instead of subjecting himself to hours of exhaustive questioning, didn't ask for a lawyer. "What person in their right mind does all that and doesn't ask for a lawyer?" Macias said. "I mean, we wouldn't have been there if he had."

Cote said the jury reached its verdict with "a heavy heart."

"There was no happiness in it," Cote said. "We all felt bad about it. But we had to do it. It's like a life wasted."

The tall, broad-shouldered foreman acknowledged he didn't believe, judging by Hayat's mild demeanor in court and his recent marriage, that the young Lodi resident posed much of a danger. But then he thought of the faces of the terrorists caught on video before last summer's London bombings. He thought they looked just as nonthreatening.

Scaccia said she hoped the jury verdict would be a deterrent in the war on terrorism. "I hope it gets the message out: Don't mess with the United States," she said. "It's not worth it."

CIA Warns Ex-agents Over Talking To Media (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

The Central Intelligence Agency has warned former employees not to have unapproved contacts with reporters, as part of a mounting campaign by the administration to crack down on officials who leak information on national security issues.

A former official said the CIA recently warned several retired employees who have consulting contracts with the agency that they could lose their pensions by talking to reporters without permission. He added that while the threats might be legally “hollow,” they were having a chilling effect on former employees.

The CIA called the allegations “rubbish”. Jennifer Millerwise Dyke, spokeswoman for CIA director Porter Goss, said former employees with consulting deals could lose their contracts for violating the CIA secrecy agreement by having unauthorised conversations with reporters. But she stressed that under current law, “termination of a contract does not affect pensions”.

The clampdown represents the latest move in what observers describe as the most aggressive government campaign against leaks in years. The Justice Department is investigating the disclosure to the media of secret overseas CIA prisons and a highly classified National Security Agency domestic spying programme authorised by President George W. Bush. Last week, the CIA fired Mary McCarthy, an intelligence officer, for allegedly leaking classified information and having undisclosed contacts with reporters.

Mr Goss has increased the number of “single issue” polygraphs – lie detector tests aimed at ferreting out leaking employees. A second former official said Mr Goss was trying to “scare everybody” by using polygraphs aggressively.

Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, former CIA general counsel, said Mr Goss was “obviously taking a much more forward-leaning stance than any of us have seen for years”. But another former intelligence official said the agency was simply returning to a “more conservative regimen” to remind employees that they work for a secret organisation.

The House intelligence committee has asked John Negroponte, the director for national intelligence who oversees the 16 intelligence agencies, to study whether retirees could lose their pensions for disclosing classified information even when not prosecuted.

The attempt to silence former employees extends beyond those who still have consulting contracts. Larry Johnson, a former CIA official who blogs at www.TPMCafe.com, said he recently received a “threatening” letter reminding him about his confidentiality agreements.

DOJ_NMG_0026858

Mr Johnson – who has criticised the White House for not aggressively investigating the outing of Valerie Plame, a former covert operative, said it was the first such letter he had received despite regularly commenting in the media on intelligence matters since his retirement in 1989. He said other former employees also received letters.

He said the CIA was also "very forceful" in intimidating a retired official who maintains ties to the agency after he signed a letter criticising the administration over the Plame leak.

Mr Gimigliano said CIA staff officers and contractors must sign a secrecy agreement which compelled them to seek prepublication permission for anything they wrote involving the CIA, intelligence matters, and classified material.

Mr Gimigliano added: "When a former officer or contractor fails to honour the legally binding agreement ... our Publications Review Board may send the individual a written reminder. That reminder includes the statement that 'permission to publish will not be denied solely because information may be embarrassing to or critical of the agency' ... Obviously, such letters contain no threats."

But Mr Johnson and other critics say the campaign is also intended to crack down on politically embarrassing comments from former officials.

"They are trying to intimidate the press and trying to intimidate employees," said Mr Johnson. "Anybody who has been critical of the Bush administration is getting letters."

Another former CIA employee who maintains links to the agency said it did not need to be blatant about threats because contractors and retirees who had relationships with agency officials understood that talking to reporters could have repercussions for future work.

"People at the agency are bright enough to see that is going on, they don't need to be reminded," the former official said.

Stanley Sporkin, former CIA general counsel during the Reagan administration and a retired judge, said it was "ridiculous" that the agency was trying to limit contacts with the media.

He said the only restriction should be that they do not reveal classified information. Something has got to be done to address this. These days it is almost like a witch hunt," said Mr Sporkin.

Tension Over Press Leaks (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Two events in the past week have thrown the spotlight on the troubled relationship between the Bush administration and the news media, raising questions that are worrisome on both sides of the divide.

The resignation of Scott McClellan as the White House press secretary was followed within days by the announcement that a senior Central Intelligence Agency employee, later identified as Mary McCarthy, had been fired for improper contacts with reporters.

Neither incident is entirely clear in its origins. McClellan said he asked to be relieved, but his stepping down was part of a continuing reshuffle ordered by the new White House chief of staff, Josh Bolten, who had made it clear he regarded press relations as a trouble area.

The firing of McCarthy, a veteran intelligence officer who had held sensitive administrative posts, came after CIA Director Porter Goss and his White House superiors had ordered an intensive crackdown on leaks to the press.

McCarthy had already initiated steps toward retirement and was apparently only days away from ending her career when she and others were asked to take lie detector tests -- and then she was dismissed.

For the first few days after the action was announced, the agency and the White House let stand the impression that McCarthy had been a source for the stories about secret U.S. detention centers in Europe that won a Pulitzer Prize for The Post's Dana Priest on April 17. But when McCarthy's lawyer said she had no part in that transaction, CIA officials confirmed that was the case -- leaving it unclear exactly what she had done to bring down the punishment.

Priest, of course, has said nothing about her sources beyond the generic description that the information came from current and former intelligence officials.

This is a troubling case for those of us in journalism. Our view is that it's the government's responsibility to keep its secrets secret and that it's our responsibility to ferret out information so the public is aware of the actions being taken in its name.

We recognize there are sometimes legitimate national security considerations for withholding information. In the case of Priest's stories, The Post agreed to the government's request not to identify the countries where the secret prisons were located.

But we also know that administrations of both parties tend to restrict information -- and that the only way for the public to learn of questionable policies or actions is for conscientious individuals to break that official code of silence.

Government has a legitimate claim to enforce the promise of confidentiality that officials sign when they go to work for an agency such as the CIA. The tool of enforcement can be humiliating and distasteful -- and a lie detector test is both. But its use is not unprecedented. When there was talk of polygraphs for top officials in the Reagan administration, the secretary of state, George Shultz, said he was prepared to resign -- and the prospect disappeared.

The tension between the legitimate claims of secrecy and the need for public accountability remains, however, and in many respects has grown worse. The main reason is the reluctance of this president and his administration to accept a broad and continuing responsibility to keep the public and the press informed on the reasons for the policies they have adopted.

President Bush's approach has been one of announcing a policy after it has been completed in his relatively closed circle of decision makers and then simply reiterating that policy in any number of prearranged settings. His news conferences and interviews are infrequent, and they rarely offer insights into the reasoning behind his conclusions.

That is why McClellan suffered both burnout and a loss of credibility in his job. Under tight orders from the top, he could do little to satisfy the curiosity -- or assuage the doubts -- of the reporters who sit frustrated in the briefing room, knowing full well that the real decision making in the White House is shielded from their view.

Unless the president comes to understand that it is in his interest -- as well as the country's -- to conduct a more open governing process, the new press secretary, Tony Snow, will find himself inevitably as much of a punching bag as McClellan became. Only George Bush can signal to the White House staff and administration that he wants a government ready and eager to explain itself to the people it is trying to lead.

When he has given that signal, there may be fewer Mary McCarthys contemplating the costs -- and burdens -- of leaking to the press.

European Inquiry Says C.I.A. Flew 1,000 Flights In Secret (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

BRUSSELS, April 26 — Investigators for the European Parliament said Wednesday that data gathered from air safety regulators and others found that the Central Intelligence Agency had flown 1,000 undeclared flights over European territory since 2001.

Sometimes the planes stopped to pick up terrorism suspects who had been kidnapped to take them to countries that use torture, the investigators added.

The operation used the same American agents and the same planes over and over, they said, though they could not say how many flights involved the transport of suspects.

The investigation, by a committee looking into C.I.A. counterterrorism activities in Europe, also concluded that European countries, including Italy, Sweden and Bosnia and Herzegovina, were aware of the abductions or transfers and therefore might have been complicit.

"The European Parliament deplores the fact that the C.I.A. has on several occasions clearly been responsible for kidnapping and illegally detaining alleged terrorists on the territory of member states, as well for extraordinary renditions" to third countries, wrote Giovanni Fava of Italy, a Socialist member of the European Parliament who led the committee.

The report, the first of several planned by the Parliament, grew out of three months of hearings, including testimony by human rights advocates and individuals who said they had been kidnapped by United States agents and flown to other countries, including Egypt and Afghanistan, where they were tortured.

As for the question of secret C.I.A. detention centers in Europe, the new report offered no hard evidence.

Its estimate of 1,000 undeclared flights exceeds the numbers previously discussed, including those in an analysis by The New York Times late last year that said the agency operated about 300 flights in Europe between November 2001 and the summer of 2005.

The report's conclusions are likely to heighten trans-Atlantic tensions at a time when Europe and the United States are already at odds over how to balance civil liberties with the fight against terrorists.

The inquiry was opened in January after The Washington Post reported that the C.I.A. had hidden and interrogated suspected members of Al Qaeda at secret prisons in Eastern Europe.

Mr. Fava said the committee hoped to send a fact-finding mission to Poland and Romania in September. Both countries have been cited as possible locations for prisons.

Mr. Fava said the investigation showed that agency planes had made hundreds of flights and several secret stopovers in Europe, violating a treaty that requires airlines to declare routes for police missions.

The C.I.A. declined to comment on the specifics, but an agency spokesman defended the practice of taking suspects to third countries, a process known as rendition.

DOJ_NMG_0026860

"Renditions are an antiterror tool that the United States has used for years, consistent with its laws and treaty obligations," said the spokesman, Paul Gimigliano. "The C.I.A does not condone or tolerate torture, transport individuals to other countries for the purpose of torture or knowingly receive intelligence obtained by torture."

Mr. Fava emphasized that it was most likely that some authorities in Europe had been aware that suspects were being detained on their territories. He pointed to testimony by a senior prosecutor in Milan, Italy, Armando Spataro, that a C.I.A. team had abducted a suspect, Abu Omar, in February 2003 in broad daylight before he was flown to Egypt.

Mr. Fava also criticized Sweden for handing over two Egyptian suspects, Muhammad al-Zary and Ahmed Agiza, to American agents who flew them to Egypt in December 2001. Their case was brought to light by Swedish television in 2004.

"Sweden has been criticized for this on numerous occasions, and we have taken a number of steps in order for it not to happen again," Barbro Holmberg, the minister for migration and asylum policy, said.

Mr. Fava said the Parliament found that Bosnian authorities had handed over six suspects of Algerian origin to C.I.A. agents without assurances that they would not be tortured, and in defiance of a ruling by the human rights court in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

EU Lawmakers Allege Numerous CIA Flights (AP-Y2)

By Jan Sliva

AP2, April 26, 2006

The CIA has conducted more than 1,000 clandestine flights in Europe since 2001, and some of them secretly took away terror suspects to countries where they could face torture, European Union lawmakers said Wednesday.

Legislators selected to look into allegations of questionable CIA activities in Europe said flight data showed a pattern of hidden operations by American agents, and they accused some European governments of knowing about it but remaining silent.

Cases of terror suspects being secretly handed over to U.S. agents did not appear to be isolated, the lawmakers said in a preliminary report on their inquiry. European human rights treaties prohibit sending suspects to states known to torture prisoners.

"The committee deplores the fact that, as established during the committee's investigation, the CIA has used aircraft registered under fictitious company names or with private companies to secretly transfer terror suspects to other countries including Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Afghanistan," according to a copy of the report obtained by The Associated Press.

The CIA declined to comment, as did European Union officials, who have said previously that there was no irrefutable proof of such hand-overs, which are known as "extraordinary renditions."

The investigation began in January after news reports that U.S. agents had interrogated al-Qaida suspects at secret prisons in eastern Europe. But the focus shifted after people gave detailed accounts of being abducted by U.S. agents in Europe and whisked away to jails in the Middle East, Asia and North Africa.

Few of those who testified at the committee hearings touched on the alleged secret prisons in eastern Europe first reported by The Washington Post in November. Italian lawmaker Giovanni Fava, who wrote the report, said the committee would look into those allegations later.

The lawmakers based their initial report on data provided by Eurocontrol, the EU's air safety agency, and more than 50 hours of testimony by EU officials, rights groups and individuals who said they were kidnapped and tortured by U.S. agents.

Eurocontrol said the number of clandestine CIA flights over Europe was likely to be higher than 1,000 because the agency checked only flight plans for fewer than 50 aircraft used by the CIA.

"We were requested by EU Parliament to make an analysis of the flight routes for these planes. There may be others," said Jean-Jacques Sauvage, a senior official of the Brussels-based agency. He said Eurocontrol did not keep track of who was on the planes.

The report said that on a number of occasions the CIA was clearly responsible for detaining terror suspects on European territory and transferring them to countries where they could face torture.

Fava told the AP it was unclear how many people were transferred by the CIA on undeclared flights. He also said there was no evidence proving complicity by European officials, but called it unlikely that some governments, such as in Italy, Bosnia and Sweden, knew nothing about the CIA operations.

He accused the CIA of breaching the Chicago Convention, an international treaty governing air traffic. It requires aircraft used in military, customs and police operations to seek special authorization to land in signatory states.

U.S. officials previously said that as of late December, some 100 to 150 people had been seized in "rendition" operations involving detaining terror suspects in one country and flying them to their home country or another where they were wanted for a crime or questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0026861

The officials, who agreed to discuss the operations only if not quoted by name, said the action was reserved for people considered by the CIA to be the most serious terror suspects. But they conceded mistakes had been made and were being investigated by the CIA's inspector general.

Fava cited as one example of "extraordinary rendition" the case of an Egyptian cleric, Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, who allegedly was abducted by U.S. agents on a street in Milan, Italy, in 2003 and returned to his homeland, where he says he was tortured.

Another case involved German citizen Khalid al-Masri. Documents provided by Eurocontrol indicated he was taken to Afghanistan in 2004 by a plane that originated in Algeria and flew via Palma de Mallorca, Spain; Skopje, Macedonia; and Baghdad, Iraq.

Al-Masri, who was born in Kuwait, told the committee that he was arrested by U.S. agents on the Macedonian border while on vacation. He said he was kept at a hotel in Skopje for several weeks before being flown to Afghanistan and jailed for five months. He said he was flown back to Europe in May 2004 and released in Albania.

Fava said the bulk of the clandestine CIA flights passed through Germany and Spain, where the United States has several air bases. Neither government had any comment.

The European Union also declined to address the committee's preliminary report.

"We have no comment. We will wait for the investigation to finish," said Friso Roscam Abbing, spokesman for EU Justice Commissioner Franco Frattini.

Probe Of Detainee Transfers Finds Many CIA Flights (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

BERLIN, April 26 -- European Parliament investigators said Wednesday they had uncovered evidence that the CIA has organized more than 1,000 flights through European airspace since 2001 as part of a secret program to transfer and detain terrorism suspects.

A parliamentary committee investigating CIA counterterrorism tactics in Europe reported that it had obtained records of the flights from Eurocontrol, the continent's primary air traffic management agency. The flights were by U.S.-registered aircraft that investigators believe were chartered by the CIA or owned by front companies working for the agency.

Investigators acknowledged that they had no idea how many of the flights were actually used to transport terrorism suspects. But they accused the CIA of violating human rights conventions and European law by concealing the purpose of the flights and not reporting passenger manifests to local authorities.

"The routes for some of these flights seem to be quite suspect," Italian lawmaker Giovanni Claudio Fava, head of the Parliament committee, told reporters in Brussels. "They are rather strange routes for flights to take. It is hard to imagine those stopovers were simply for providing fuel."

The preliminary report also criticized several European countries -- including Sweden, Italy and Macedonia -- saying they had allowed CIA officers to apprehend or detain terrorism suspects on their soil and then covered up their presence.

"No one among the national security authorities -- save for a few exceptions -- has ever cared to verify what was the real aim of those flights, who were in their crew and passengers, or rather prisoners," Fava said.

The European Parliament has been investigating the CIA flights as well as reports that the CIA detained suspected high-ranking al-Qaeda members in secret prisons in Eastern Europe.

The Washington Post reported in November that the CIA had been interrogating some of its most important al-Qaeda captives at a Soviet-era compound in Eastern Europe as part of a covert prison system that at various times has included sites in several democracies in Eastern Europe. The Post did not identify the Eastern European countries at the request of senior U.S. officials, who said the disclosure could disrupt counterterrorism efforts in those countries and elsewhere and could make them targets of possible terrorist retaliation.

The Parliament has few powers to compel testimony or obtain documents, but is scheduled to hold hearings throughout Europe during the rest of the year. On Thursday, the committee is scheduled to question authorities in Macedonia about the case of a German citizen, Khaled al-Masri, who has said he was kidnapped by security officials in Macedonia in early 2004, handed over to the CIA and taken to Afghanistan.

The committee is also scheduled to hold a hearing in Washington next month and has invited former CIA officials to testify.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Terror Case Hears Talk Of Bombing Subway Stop (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

A fuller picture emerged yesterday of an alleged plot to bomb the Herald Square subway station and of the Pakistani immigrant charged as its prime author, as prosecutors again played secretly recorded conversations between the man and a police informer.

The conversations, played for a jury in federal District Court in Brooklyn, captured the immigrant, Shahawar Matin Siraj, 23, telling the informer he expected that the blast in the subway station would bring down the Manhattan Mall on the street above.

But in another conversation, he seems to suggest to the informer that the bomb could be as small as a bottle of soda, tossed into a garbage can on the subway station's platform. He said he wanted to bomb the station in the early morning hours to cause only economic damage and kill as few people as possible, but he was willing to let the explosion kill the homeless people who spend the night there.

These contradictions were among several that emerged from Mr. Siraj's sometimes rambling, disjointed and often angry statements, which also suggested that he has a grandiose view of his own talents as a terrorist plotter. In fact, he offered a critical assessment of al Qaeda, saying its members carry out suicide attacks because they are poor planners.

"That is what I don't like about them," he said on Aug. 18, 2004, just nine days before he and a co-conspirator, James Elshafay, were arrested and charged in the plot. Mr. Elshafay, 21, has pleaded guilty and is expected to testify.

Yesterday, jurors listened attentively to the recorded conversations between Mr. Siraj and the police informer, Osama Eldawoody, 50. It was the second day that prosecutors have played selections from more than 30 hours of digital recordings from the summer of 2004.

Using government transcripts, the jurors seemed to follow the heavily accented conversations carefully, and then one of the prosecutors, Todd Harrison, would question Mr. Eldawoody about the recorded discussions.

The government has sought to portray Mr. Siraj as a dangerous man bent on carrying out a devastating attack. His lawyers, however, contend that the young man, who came to New York from Karachi, Pakistan, in 1999 to join his parents, was duped.

They have said that when a fuller picture is presented, it will be clear that Mr. Siraj was manipulated by the police informer, who they contend orchestrated the plot for money, nearly $100,000 that the Police Department paid him over two years and nine months, much of it while he was working on this case.

One of Mr. Siraj's lawyers, Martin R. Stolar, has called him "not the brightest bulb on the chandelier."

On the tapes played yesterday, Mr. Siraj seemed to alternate between shrewd, bumbling and bizarre. In one conversation, he told Mr. Eldawoody that he had masqueraded as a homeless man to examine the security in the subway station. He looked for surveillance cameras and, though he saw none, he told Mr. Eldawoody that he could not believe there was not a tighter security cordon.

"I cannot find no security over there, it's impossible," he said. "If there is no security, it means there is a high security over there. No security means high security. That's a trap."

He also said he would shave his beard and wear New York Yankee apparel to disguise himself for a later surveillance mission.

At another point in the conversation, he seemed convinced that some sort of plot had been set in motion against a mosque at East 96th Street and Third Avenue in Manhattan.

Final Arguments In Trial Of Man Who Knew Two 9/11 Hijackers (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore And Carla Baranauckas

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

A tangled four-and-half-year legal battle drew toward an end yesterday as prosecutors and defense lawyers made closing arguments in the case of a Jordanian college student accused of lying to a federal grand jury about his relationship with two Sept. 11 hijackers.

Prosecutors say the student, Osama Awadallah, on trial in Manhattan federal court, lied when he testified under oath at an October 2001 grand jury hearing that he did not know one of the hijackers, Khalid al-Midhar, and denied having written his name in a school notebook before conceding during a later hearing that he had met Mr. Midhar.

"Mr. Awadallah lied repeatedly and deliberately," said Karl Metzner, an assistant United States attorney.

DOJ_NMG_0026863

Mr. Midhar and Nawaf al-Hazmi, another hijacker, had been living in San Diego until about a year before they boarded American Airlines Flight 77, the plane that crashed into the Pentagon. Mr. Awadallah was arrested on Sept. 21, 2001, after F.B.I. agents found a scrap of paper with the name "Osama" and Mr. Awadallah's old phone number in a car that Mr. Hazmi had left at Dulles International Airport, near Washington.

Mr. Awadallah's lawyer, Jesse Berman, painted a very different picture, that of a young immigrant, 21 at the time of the attacks, with limited English, disoriented after nearly three weeks of solitary confinement and with no reason to mislead the grand jury.

"We're not saying this gave him license to lie," Mr. Berman said. The defendant, he said, was "exhausted and confused."

The two sides met yesterday in a courtroom less than half a mile from ground zero, imagery that the prosecutors invoked repeatedly as they argued that Mr. Awadallah had lied, presenting transcripts of his testimony and a detailed chronology of how his account had changed during several hearings and interviews with law enforcement.

"He didn't just lie deliberately. He lied before the federal grand jury investigating the worst terrorist attack in this country's history," Mr. Metzner said.

Mr. Awadallah has never been charged with conspiring in the 9/11 attacks or knowing about them in advance, and the outcome of his trial may rest on whether the jury remains focused on the relatively narrow perjury charge against him.

In his first grand jury appearance, Mr. Awadallah repeatedly denied knowing anyone named Khalid. But prosecutors showed him an examination booklet they discovered at his college, in which was written: "One of the quietest people I have met is Nawaf. Another one, his name is Khalid."

Mr. Awadallah at first said that some of the handwriting was not his. When he returned to the grand jury on Oct. 15, 2001, he said that he recognized it as his writing and that on several occasions he had met a friend of Mr. Hazmi's named Khalid.

Mr. Berman argued that the first photocopy of the examination booklet that Mr. Awadallah was shown was smudged, and that reading it was all the more difficult because his client had not had his eyeglasses while in custody or on the stand.

"He gave a ridiculous answer," Mr. Berman added, "but not intentionally. He had nothing to gain by lying to prosecutors."

The prosecutor, Mr. Metzner, dismissed the defense's contention that Mr. Awadallah was confused after being physically mistreated while in detention.

"You can still tell the truth if your arms hurt," he said.

If convicted, Mr. Awadallah, now 25, faces a maximum sentence of five years on each of two counts of perjury, as well as deportation. He has waited — free on bail for much of the time — as his fiercely contested case made its way through the courts.

In recent years, Mr. Awadallah has been a student at San Diego State University, where he is scheduled to graduate next month.

Terrorists In State, Candidate Says (MJS)

By Stacy Forster Sforster@journalsentinel.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, April 27, 2006

Opponents call his remarks irresponsible

Madison - There are terrorists training and raising money in Wisconsin, Republican attorney general candidate J.B. Van Hollen said Wednesday in a Capitol news conference.

But Van Hollen declined to provide any specifics about what kind of terrorist activity law enforcement was tracking in Wisconsin. He cited confidentiality, adding that his knowledge of such activity dates back to January 2005, when he resigned as U.S. attorney for the Western District of Wisconsin.

A spokesman for incumbent Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager and Van Hollen's opponent in the Republican primary, Waukesha County District Attorney Paul Bucher, both called Van Hollen's comments "irresponsible."

Mike Bauer, legal services administrator for the state Department of Justice, and Mike Johnson, a supervisory special agent for the Milwaukee FBI office, declined to comment on the status of any investigations in Wisconsin. The U.S. Department of Homeland Security did not return a call for comment.

Van Hollen and Bucher will face off in the September Republican primary. The winner will go up against the Democratic victor, either Lautenschlager or Dane County Executive Kathleen Falk, in the November general election.

Van Hollen has pledged to make fighting terrorism a top priority if elected; he proposes teams of law enforcement officials from all levels to train and share information.

While arguing that the state Department of Justice could be doing more to guard against terrorist threats, Van Hollen added that Wisconsin residents should know about terrorist activity taking place here so they can be vigilant about reporting suspicious activity.

DOJ_NMG_0026864

"We have in Wisconsin terrorists who are training and raising funds," Van Hollen said. "We don't need to be paranoid, but we need to be vigilant."

After the news conference, Van Hollen said he didn't think his comments would raise fear among Wisconsin residents.

"If people believe that we do not have terrorists in Wisconsin, and they believe we're not at risk for terrorist attacks in Wisconsin, they're uninformed," Van Hollen said. "Do we need to be paranoid about it? I don't think so."

Van Hollen said that based on information he had access to as U.S. attorney, he was aware that the FBI and other law enforcement officials were monitoring potential threats, but that there wasn't enough activity or information to act.

The FBI's Johnson said Van Hollen's comment about the FBI was "completely inappropriate" because Van Hollen doesn't speak for the agency.

Bauer of the Justice Department said Van Hollen's criticism of Lautenschlager's track record on fighting terrorism was wrong. Under Lautenschlager, Justice Department officials have been involved in several state and federal task forces with officials from across jurisdictions, Bauer said.

"It's a joint role with the federal government," Bauer said of the department's place in fighting terrorism.

The department's Division of Criminal Investigation also developed a statewide intelligence center for law enforcement, emergency services and disaster response experts to share information, the department said.

Bucher said he was "shocked" that Van Hollen had chosen to provide such information without backing it up.

"Why would you say to the citizens of the state that, 'There are terrorists training in this state, but I can't say anything about it or do anything about it?' " Bucher said.

Bucher added that he would soon introduce a plan for dealing with terrorism that is likely to include steps to foster cooperation with federal prosecutors and investigators. But Bucher said the state attorney general's role in fighting terrorism is limited because the department doesn't have primary enforcement authority for terrorism.

"The attorney general does have a responsibility to work in a cooperative atmosphere with the agencies that have the lead on this issue," he said.

Falk campaign spokeswoman Melissa Mulliken said in an e-mail that Van Hollen should provide credible information to back up his comments - "otherwise it is a political scare tactic."

Van Hollen Claims Terrorists Are In Wisconsin (DULNT)

By Todd Richmond

The Duluth News Tribune, April 27, 2006

MADISON, Wis. - Terrorists are operating in Wisconsin, state attorney general candidate J.B. Van Hollen claimed Wednesday.

Van Hollen accused Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager during a Capitol news conference of not doing enough to fight terrorism, and he followed up with a comment that, "We have in Wisconsin terrorists who are training and raising funds."

He said he learned the information while he was U.S. attorney for the Western District of Wisconsin - a post he resigned in 2005 to run for attorney general - but the terrorists weren't doing anything he could act upon.

He declined to elaborate, saying divulging any information would make him guilty of a felony. But he added Wisconsin has targets such as power plants.

Mike Johnson, a spokesman for the FBI's Milwaukee office, declined to comment. Messages The Associated Press left at the U.S. Department of Justice and at the office of Stephen Sinnot, who now serves as U.S. attorney for western Wisconsin, weren't immediately returned.

"He can't talk about specifics that he dealt with ... as U.S. attorney," said Van Hollen campaign spokesman Brian Fraley. "He can't breach the confidentiality of that office. (But) it would be naive to think there aren't terrorists in Wisconsin."

Van Hollen's opponents immediately demanded that he give up what he knows. Van Hollen and Waukesha County District Attorney Paul Bucher face each other in a Republican primary in September. The winner will face either Lautenschlager or Dane County Executive Kathleen Falk, who will square off in the Democratic primary, in November.

"If Mr. Van Hollen has indicated he has knowledge of terrorist training in this state, he better ... get a good lawyer to help him get that information to the authorities," Bucher said. "I hope he's done that. That's what I would do."

Lautenschlager campaign spokesman Dan Bachhuber accused Van Hollen of grandstanding.

"If J.B. has some information he should provide it," Bachhuber said. "I just don't know where he might be getting his information."

Falk campaign spokeswoman Melissa Mulliken issued a statement calling on Van Hollen to reveal what he knows.

"It is irresponsible for a candidate for AG to make claims he won't substantiate regarding our national security. If he has credible information he should provide it; otherwise it is a political scare tactic," the statement said.

Fraley insisted Van Hollen can't reveal any information that might hinder a federal investigation or reveal information about investigations that began when he ran the U.S. attorney's office.

State Department of Justice spokesman Mike Bauer declined to comment on terrorist activities in Wisconsin or whether the agency is probing them.

He said the head of the department's criminal investigation unit, Jim Warren, sits on the governor's Homeland Security Council, Justice agents work full time on joint terrorism task forces headed by the FBI and the agency has highly trained investigators ready to help with domestic security issues.

House Panel OKs Tougher Port Rules (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

A measure to secure U.S. ports from a nuclear attack and to increase the number of random cargo inspections won full committee approval in the House yesterday.

The $2.4 billion bill to track and protect cargo containers shipped from foreign ports passed the House Homeland Security Committee unanimously, and requires that 98 percent of all containers be screened for nuclear materials.

A Democratic proposal that would require in five years that all containers be screened for nuclear devices was rejected by a 18-16 vote.

Republicans say the timetable should be more flexible to allow radiation portal monitor technology to improve. Some critics of the technology question whether it can effectively identify nuclear materials if they are is protected by lead shielding.

"We must do everything in our power to prevent another terrorist attack on U.S. soil," said Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"That means continuing to strengthen our domestic and international security efforts through measures like the SAFE Port Act. As long as our ports remain vulnerable, so do the American people," Mr. King said. "Passing a comprehensive, bipartisan port security bill is one of the most important things we'll do this year."

The Security and Accountability For Every Port Act requires Homeland Security Department officials to collect data from importers before cargo is loaded at foreign ports.

The legislation also calls for a Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, which the Bush administration put into motion Tuesday.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff says background checks, including an immigration status check, will be required for all U.S. ports.

Nearly a half-million current port workers and longshoremen will be screened initially and cleared to access secure areas.

Security gaps were highlighted last month after a deal to turn over terminal operations at six major U.S. ports to a Dubai-owned company fell apart amid a congressional firestorm.

Although Democrats say the nuclear screening requirement is weak, the legislation has bipartisan support. It is sponsored by Rep. Dan Lungren, California Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat.

"Though the vulnerability of our seaports has become an important issue in recent months, the reality is that this legislation is long overdue," Mr. Lungren said.

In the Senate, a measure adding $1.9 billion for border and port security was attached to an emergency spending bill. The amendment sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican and chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, passed 59-39.

Mr. Gregg said the Senate measure would "basically give the people who are defending us on our borders ... the tools they need to do their job right."

Lawmakers Spar Over Cargo Radiation Tests (AP-Y2)

By Devlin Barrett

AP2, April 26, 2006

An effort to shore up the nation's port security cleared a House committee Wednesday after Republicans beat back a Democratic attempt to screen all cargo for radioactive material.

Lawmakers once united in opposition to a proposed U.S. ports deal with Dubai sparred at the hearing over Democrats' demands for 100 percent radiation screening of shipping containers.

DOJ_NMG_0026866

The bill, headed for a vote on the House floor next week, would require the Homeland Security Department to give a timetable for placing radiation portal monitors at U.S. seaports that don't already have them, and assess the security implications of screening programs for foreign ports.

Reps. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., and Jane Harman, D-Calif., sponsored the broad port security measure last month as Congress was in an uproar over now-abandoned plans by DP World to manage terminals at ports in New Jersey, New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia.

The panel rejected along party lines an amendment offered by Rep. Edward Markey (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., which would require within five years radiation screening for every container coming into the U.S.

Republicans said the deadline was unrealistic and the scanner technology is still too faulty to deploy through a mammoth port system that handles 20,000 cargo containers every day.

At that, some Democrats erupted.

Rep. Peter DeFazio (news, bio, voting record), D-Ore., slammed his fist as he called current port security programs "a joke."

"We have a faith-based honor system. People could ship a nuclear bomb here today," he said, accusing GOP leaders of buckling to pressure from business groups that oppose greater regulation.

Republicans denied any influence from lobbyists.

"Somebody said we're lackeys for the industry. I'm not a lackey for anybody," said Lungren.

Committee chairman Peter King urged both sides to cut back partisan accusations.

"Any implication that anyone on either side of the aisle is not concerned about homeland security, is not concerned about the loss of human life, it demeans and cheapens the debate," said King, R-N.Y.

Trade Group's Role In Security Program Is Challenged (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Eric Lipton

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — When Representative Harold Rogers of Kentucky decided to try to get a new transportation security project off the ground, he turned to a familiar name: the American Association of Airport Executives.

In a little-noticed provision added to a spending measure last year, Mr. Rogers, a Republican who doles out money for national security projects, designated an arm of the trade group with which he has longstanding ties as the central operator of a new federal program to perform background checks on 750,000 maritime workers.

"There is absolutely no reason to waste more time and money reinventing the wheel," Mr. Rogers, chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Homeland Security, said Wednesday in explaining his decision. He said the trade organization's Transportation Security Clearinghouse had already performed 2 million background checks on airport workers.

But the Bush administration and others are now trying to undo Mr. Rogers's handiwork, which is coming to light as Congress puts new scrutiny on the special-interest provisions, known as earmarks, that are sometimes added to measures with little debate.

They say that the earmark is threatening to further delay a program to issue new tamper-proof identification cards to the nation's port workers, a program that could eventually cover millions of transportation workers nationwide. The cards for the port workers were supposed to be available by August 2004.

Industry officials said the provision devised by Mr. Rogers leaves unclear what work would be done by the American Association of Airport Executives and what work could be bid on by contractors with expertise in issuing high-tech biometric cards.

"It is clearly an earmark, and it is very broadly defined," said Walter Hamilton, chairman of the International Biometric Industry Association. He said his group believes that other companies in the industry should be allowed to compete for the entire ID card project, estimated to be worth hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Rogers has a record of close association with the aviation trade group, receiving thousands of dollars in contributions for his election campaigns over the years as. He has also accepted trips to the group's annual meetings in Hawaii, California and Ireland, which are popular with many lawmakers and aides.

But an aide to Mr. Rogers said the political relationship had no bearing on his support for the provision, which the lawmaker said was intended to jump-start the stalled identification program.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Tuesday that in an effort to enhance port security, he intends to start the new program by the end of this year. But the administration, in proposing the 2007 federal budget, made clear that it opposed the requirement by Mr. Rogers, asking Congress to strike it.

DOJ_NMG_0026867

"This provision is proposed for deletion in order to provide sufficient flexibility in implementing this program," a memorandum submitted to Congress by the administration said. "Restrictions on such critical programs serve only to limit their effectiveness and efficiency."

The administration effort could find some support on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers who oversee national security are beginning to raise questions about it as well.

"It may be that this association could do a competent job, but it seems to me it would be preferable to have that determination made through a full and open competition rather than a directive from the Appropriations Committee," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who heads the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Since 2002, the aviation association, under a contract with the federal government, has been involved in background checks for airport employees nationwide, an arrangement that has been credited with accelerating the hiring process.

Under the current system, before hiring new employees, the airlines or airports send fingerprints to the association's clearinghouse unit, which then forwards them electronically at a rate of about 1,100 a week to federal authorities. They compile a terrorist watch list and check criminal history, looking for offenses like forgery and unlawful possession of a weapon or explosive material. Job applicants pay a $29 fee for the background check, $7 of which goes to the clearinghouse.

Carter Morris, senior vice president for transportation security policy at the association, said it was still unclear what role his organization might play in the issuance of the new cards for port workers.

Mr. Morris said it was up to the federal Transportation Security Administration to decide what role the association would play concerning the Transportation Worker Identification Credential, as the worker identity card is known.

Todd Hauptli, the airport group's senior executive vice president and its chief lobbyist, decline to comment.

Former government officials and industry executives, despite satisfaction with the trade group's performance on the aviation background checks, said that officials at the Homeland Security Department tried to stop members of Congress in 2005 from mandating that the arrangement be extended to the much larger transportation credential program.

The concern, the former officials said, is that the sole-source contract could complicate the process of competitively hiring companies to handle other necessary tasks.

Mr. Rogers and his staff had been trying for about two years to expand the work assigned to the trade association, trying to persuade the T.S.A. to use the association to process background checks on drivers of trucks carrying hazardous materials.

Lawmakers Reject Real ID (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) -- New Hampshire suddenly has become a battleground in the fight over privacy rights versus homeland security, with state legislators voting against strict new federal standards for issuing driver's licenses.

At issue is the federal Real ID Act, which is intended to keep terrorists from obtaining fake IDs. It requires states by 2008 to verify documents such as birth certificates, Social Security cards and passports when people apply for driver's licenses. State databases with driver information and photos also will be linked.

Last month, the Republican-controlled New Hampshire House voted overwhelmingly to bar the state from participating in the program. A vote in the Republican-dominated Senate is expected in two weeks after a committee endorsement yesterday. Gov. John Lynch, a Democrat, remains undecided.

The legislation has won backing from the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) as well as conservative privacy advocates and Christian fundamentalists.

"I think New Hampshire will set the dominoes falling in the states," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the Technology and Liberty Program of the ACLU, who testified against Real ID at a recent state Senate hearing alongside a member of the conservative Cato Institute.

Legislation in other states would condemn Real ID, but New Hampshire's bill is the toughest measure making real progress anywhere, Mr. Steinhardt said.

Republican state Rep. Neal Kurk, author of the bill against Real ID, gave a stirring speech during the debate.

"We care more for our liberties than to meekly hand over to the federal government the potential to enumerate, track, identify and eventually control," Mr. Kurk told the House.

A weekend rally featuring Real ID opponents in Nazi uniforms attracted lawmakers from both parties, and worried members of Congress dispatched a staff member from the House Judiciary Committee to meet one-on-one with state senators in advance of the committee vote yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0026868

Supporters of Real ID say blocking it will isolate New Hampshire, requiring residents to obtain a passport if they want to board an airplane or enter a federal building. The state also would lose a $3 million federal grant to update driver's license computers.

Jeff Lungren, spokesman for the U.S. House Judiciary Committee, said Real ID closes loopholes that allowed a September 11 terrorist with a six-month tourist visa to obtain driver's licenses in multiple states good for five years or longer.

He said it sprang from a finding of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States that "for terrorists, travel documents are as important as weapons."

Many governors and some state motor vehicle directors oppose Real ID. Most state legislatures are waiting to see regulations for implementing the law from the federal Department of Homeland Security before acting.

"It's not going to promote national security. It's not going to help us prevent illegal immigration. It's just going to help the government keep tabs on ordinary citizens," Mr. Kurk said. "Remember, the 9/11 terrorists were in this country legally and had legally obtained documents."

Fewer Fined By Airport Security In '05 (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Thomas Frank

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The number of passengers fined for security violations at airports fell dramatically last year as the federal government focused on more serious threats, according to records and government officials.

The Transportation Security Administration issued 4,459 fines against passengers in 2005, a 54% decrease from 2004. The vast majority of fines are doled out to people trying to bring weapons and other dangerous items on planes.

“The public has been getting better about what not to bring to the checkpoints,” said Salomon Gomez, the Transportation Security Administration's assistant chief council for civil enforcement. “TSA has also gotten better. We've focused more on what will really take down a plane.”

In 2004, the TSA adopted a zero-tolerance policy for passengers caught with prohibited items at airport screening checkpoints. The number of fines against passengers soared from 3,426 in 2003 to 9,741 in 2004. The policy prompted complaints from Congress about unequal enforcement and heavy-handedness.

Early last year, TSA altered its policy in an attempt to refocus on what the agency believes are greater threats to planes, such as explosives that can bring down a flight. Previously, most people who brought a small knife in a suitcase received a fine.

Those people now receive warning letters unless they have attempted to conceal the knife or exhibited threatening behavior, TSA spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said.

Fines range from $250 for minor infractions to $10,000 for passengers with explosives.

Three screeners told USA TODAY that fewer passengers are trying to carry items such as knives and tools on planes.

“The flying public is just realizing they shouldn't be carrying this stuff,” said Cris Soulia, a screener at San Diego International Airport.

The TSA bans 68 items, including flammables, martial-arts weapons, tools such as hammers and drills, and sporting equipment such as hockey and lacrosse sticks and pool cues. Most of those items can be packed in checked luggage.

The TSA is also seizing fewer of the items considered most threatening at checkpoints. For example, TSA security officers in 2004 seized nearly 700,000 incendiary items, such as ammunition or dangerous flammable materials. Last year, the total fell to about 372,000 such items. The number of seized knives, other cutting devices and clubs (baseball bats, nightsticks, etc.) also fell.

The overall number of seized items rose last year because the TSA began barring lighters.

Some security analysts say that the TSA still goes too far in what it bans on flights. Charles Slepian, a New York aviation security expert and founder of the Foreseeable Risk Analysis Center, said the TSA allows passengers to carry things such as knitting needles and canes that can do just as much harm as banned items such as sharp knives and bats.

Rep. Peter DeFazio, D-Ore., a longtime critic of the TSA's fines, applauded the decrease. “I'm not hearing complaints from consumers as we were hearing a few years ago.”

Neighborhood Watch Pentagon Steps Up Intelligence Efforts Inside U.S. Borders (WSJ)

By Robert Block And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

AKRON, Ohio -- On March 19, 2005, about 200 mainly middle-aged peace marchers made their way through the streets of this city, stopping outside a Marine Corps recruiting center and a Federal Bureau of Investigation office to listen to speeches against the Iraq war. Close behind, police in unmarked cars followed them -- acting on a tip from the Pentagon.

For weeks prior to the demonstration, analysts at the Army's 902nd Military Intelligence Group in Fort Meade, Md., were downloading information from activist Web sites, intercepting emails and cross-referencing this with information in police databases.

The Army's conclusion, contained in an alert to Akron police: "Even though these demonstrations are advertised as 'peaceful,' they are assessed to present a potential force protection threat."

The Akron protest and seven others monitored by the Army that month turned out to be nonviolent. Pentagon officials later issued an apology, admitting that some of the information in military databases shouldn't have been there. But they called that a minor slip in a critical program to protect Americans.

The government's monitoring of the protests is one example of how the 9/11 terror attacks have sparked a broad effort by the Pentagon to gather intelligence within U.S. borders. Its goals are both to protect military facilities and keep an eye out for any threat on American soil.

After 9/11, the Bush administration declared the continental U.S. a theater of military operations for the first time since the Civil War, creating a demand to better research potential threats to American forces at home. Now several parts of the vast Pentagon bureaucracy are building large databases of information from sources including local police, military personnel and the Internet. In doing so, the military is edging toward a sensitive area that has been off-limits to it since the 1970s: domestic surveillance and law enforcement.

One widely reported part of the new information battle is the National Security Agency's wiretapping of calls without a warrant between people in the U.S. and suspected terrorists overseas. The agency is part of the Defense Department. That practice is just one piece of a larger, less-discussed effort.

The military justifies the gathering of domestic intelligence in part by relying on a key distinction between "receiving" information and "collecting" it. Military regulations over the past few decades have generally barred using soldiers to gather information on American citizens. Officials have interpreted the rules to mean that receiving information from the police or federal agencies is acceptable.

"We are receiving information lawfully gathered by other agencies and then following up on it to make an assessment," says Cmdr. Greg Hicks, a Pentagon spokesman.

Further, the military says it doesn't order civilian law-enforcement officials such as the police or the FBI to do anything. Military officials say they may point out items of concern such as the Akron march but it's up to police whether to listen.

The broad Pentagon effort comes amid a surge of popular support after the 9/11 attacks for more vigilant efforts to prevent terrorism. Polls continue to show backing for aggressive moves. In a March Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1, 52% of those surveyed said they supported the NSA wiretaps without a warrant, while 46% said they were opposed.

The military moves nonetheless face both political and practical objections. Civil libertarians fear a return to the Vietnam era, when military personnel collected information on more than 100,000 Americans, infiltrated church youth groups and posed as reporters to interview activists, according to a 1975 Senate investigation. Critics say the receiving-versus-collecting distinction makes little sense if the Pentagon is taking in huge amounts of data, organizing it, analyzing it and using it to influence law enforcement.

"Today military spies can compile more information about antiwar protesters by 'receiving' it off the Web than its gumshoes used to collect by watching demonstrations," says Christopher Pyle, a former Army intelligence officer who disclosed the military's surveillance of civilian politics in the 1960s to Congress and worked to end it. Mr. Pyle is now a professor of politics at Mt. Holyoke College in Massachusetts.

Because of the secrecy surrounding the programs, the results of the Pentagon's efforts -- including any possible successes in preventing terrorism -- are unknown. President Bush and other officials have said that Americans often don't see such successes because revealing them would help terrorists. Mr. Bush's critics, aside from their civil-liberties concerns, say monitoring antiwar activities may turn out to be a waste of resources by diverting attention from known terrorists.

According to documents seen by The Wall Street Journal, the Pentagon has monitored more than 20 antiwar groups' activities around the country over the past three years. It has reviewed photographs and records of vehicles and protesters at marches to see if different activities were being organized by the same instigators. Cmdr. Hicks says the point of this monitoring is to keep military personnel away from places where they might provoke demonstrators, not to interfere with anyone's right to protest.

The peace activists don't like being watched. About 300 activists gathered at Akron's public library this February to complain to elected representatives at a public hearing. They had watched an NBC News report in December that said the Pentagon included peace group activities in a database of potential terrorist threats. Documents viewed by The Wall Street Journal show that, as the activists suspected, their Quaker-organized rally in March 2005 was on the Pentagon's watch list. Those documents show a broader effort to gather information for databases and analyze it.

'Eerie Feeling'

Pat Carano, a veteran of Ohio peace marches since the Vietnam War, told the meeting of the "eerie feeling" of being watched when he saw the unmarked police cars. "It's ridiculous," said Donna Schapps, a grandmother of four from Stow, Ohio. "Quakers are not terrorists. We believe in peace."

Strict limits on soldiers doing the work of police date back to the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878, enacted in response to a public backlash against troops maintaining civil order in the South during Reconstruction. The act generally prohibits the military from domestic law-enforcement activities.

The military's secret monitoring of dissidents during the Vietnam War led to a slew of laws, regulations and executive orders that pushed the military out of domestic spying and created walls between domestic and foreign intelligence.

After Sept. 11, 2001, those walls came in for criticism from a broad range of experts. The bipartisan 9/11 Commission concluded that U.S. intelligence agencies needed to do a better job of coordinating and connecting leads. The Pentagon itself believed it might have prevented the attacks if its ability to operate within the U.S. were less circumscribed, and decided to take a fresh look at the post-Vietnam rules.

On Nov. 5, 2001, Lt. Gen. Robert W. Noonan Jr., then the Army's deputy chief of staff for intelligence, sent a memo to Army commanders titled, "Collecting Information on U.S. Persons3."

"Contrary to popular belief, there is no absolute ban on intelligence components collecting U.S. person information," it said. Gen. Noonan noted that while the military was normally barred from using its own assets to collect information about people living in the U.S., military intelligence "may receive information from anyone, anytime...if only to determine its intelligence value.

"Remember," the memo stressed, "merely receiving information does not constitute 'collection' " under Army regulations.

Michael Varhola, an official in the Army inspector general's office, repeated the message in a January 2002 article in the quarterly Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin. Even though many types of information gathering were perfectly legal, Mr. Varhola wrote, "unfortunately some individuals find it easier or safer to avoid the issue altogether by simply not collecting the data on citizens they may need to do their complete jobs."

As such views spread, several parts of the Pentagon empire soon swung into action to formalize information-gathering efforts, though they weren't all necessarily acting in concert. In February 2002, Paul Wolfowitz, then the deputy defense secretary, formed a unit at Pentagon headquarters to manage all military counterintelligence programs. Its name was Counter Intelligence Field Activity. CIFA, whose exact size and budget remain secret, has grown to include nine directorates. Its main focus is on protecting defense facilities and personnel from terrorist attacks.

Some of the raw data feeding into CIFA headquarters comes from a reporting process called Talon (short for "Threat and Local Observation Notice"). Talon started out as an Air Force reporting form that airmen could fill out and hand in if they noticed anything unusual around the base. In May 2003, the Pentagon made Talon the standard method for service members in all the armed forces to report "nonvalidated" information about possible terrorist activity. Talon reports can now be filled out online.

Connecting the Dots

Pentagon officials compare the process to a neighborhood-watch program. Cmdr. Hicks says Talon is the place where the Department of Defense "initially stores the 'dots' of information, which, if validated, might later be connected before an attack occurs."

To connect the dots, the Pentagon has turned to data mining, the science of extracting patterns from large volumes of raw information. In theory, reports of unusual incidents such as those collected by Talon could be added to electronic records of business transactions, Internet usage and police activity to deduce where terrorists are gearing up for an attack.

A December 2002 report issued by Sen. Richard Shelby, then vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said CIFA was working with the Justice Department to develop "deep access data-mining techniques" to discover potential threats to the U.S. from terrorists.

As Mr. Wolfowitz was starting up CIFA, researchers at a separate Pentagon unit, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, began work on a massive data-capturing program known as Total Information Awareness. This program, too, envisioned mining government databases and personal records of individuals for patterns that would predict a terrorist attack. A huge public outcry over the project led Congress to cancel it in October 2003 -- but Congress created a specific exemption for tools that might aid "counterterrorism foreign intelligence."

Many computer programs and techniques developed during the Total Information Awareness project quietly survived. Some were taken up by the Army's 902nd Military Intelligence Group. The 902nd, established during World War II and known as the "Deuce," is part of the Army command structure and separate from CIFA at Pentagon headquarters. Nonetheless, the 902nd plays an important military-wide role because it is the military's largest counterintelligence unit and has hundreds of soldiers stationed around the country.

Charles Harlan, who heads the 902nd's analysis center, published an article in the Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin in January 2005 describing how his unit processed information to help the Pentagon predict attacks against the military in the U.S. He described three data-mining and artificial-intelligence programs as key to the effort -- all three of which were components of the defunct Total Information Awareness project.

The 902nd has access to Talon, but it also makes extensive use of another information system created after 9/11. This system, called the Joint Regional Information Exchange System, gathers information collected by civilian law enforcement agencies around the country. The Pentagon and local authorities including the New York Police Department and California's justice department set it up in December 2002. The idea was to give military personnel access to terror-related information on U.S. residents without violating any prohibitions on the military collecting domestic intelligence.

The Pentagon's regional information-exchange system got a boost when the Department of Homeland Security took it over and expanded it to include information from all 50 states and major urban areas.

The system doesn't just serve military personnel. A police department in one place can put a query out to other cities or states seeking information on, say, license plates or phone numbers of terrorist suspects. Many police departments purchase commercially available information about individuals, such as credit data and online viewing habits, as part of investigations. They can post this information on the exchange system.

Military members can also issue a query seeking information on any topic they like, but they can't command any civilian participant to do anything. In theory they could ask for personal data on individuals via the exchange system, but it isn't clear whether they do so and if so under what circumstances.

All of these strands came together to prompt the police's shadowing of peace protesters in the spring of 2005. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told the Senate last month that the Department of Homeland Security was the source of information in Pentagon databases about at least three antiwar protests at military recruiting centers -- two in Vermont and one in Washington, D.C.

A number of leads also came from the Talon reports. The two-page alert from the 902nd Military Intelligence Group that prompted the Akron police to follow the Quaker-organized rally attaches a nine-digit Army Talon number to that protest. It also gives separate numbers for each of seven other protests organized for the second anniversary of the Iraq war. The memo says officials at the 902nd had used some of their data-analysis techniques to look for signs of hidden coordination between the protests.

Analysts at the 902nd's headquarters in Ft. Meade also scrutinized antiwar Web sites looking for threats, including the possibility that protesters might attack military personnel.

The alert memo, signed by Army official Claude G. Benner Jr., portrayed the imminent demonstrations as "threats." It gave a detailed description of activists' Web sites, noting that some featured a "help desk" where would-be protesters could get tips on organizing a demonstration. The memo also raised the possibility that military supporters might assault the protesters. Mr. Benner warned that "the potential for a spontaneous, unprovoked attack against either the demonstrators or pro-US Military persons is assessed as HIGH."

In the end the Akron march was peaceful. A report compiled by the Army and presented last May to the U.S. Northern Command, which is in charge of joint military operations in the continental United States, threw cold water on the idea that hidden provocateurs might be organizing multiple protests around the country. "We have not noted a significant connection between incidents (i.e. reoccurring instigators at protests, vehicle descriptions)," said the report.

Cmdr. Hicks at the Pentagon says the assessment that the Akron protest posed a threat "was based on the best information available at the time, which was lawfully received from another federal agency." He declines to name the agency. Cmdr. Hicks adds: "The fact that the marches proceeded peacefully is irrelevant to leveling criticisms against the Army in this instance. Hindsight is always 20/20."

Security At Military Bases: A Job For Private Firms? (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK - Since 9/11, private security companies have been guarding some of America's most sensitive military installations, such as Fort Bragg in North Carolina, the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico, and the Picatinny Arsenal in New Jersey.

Now, concerns about accountability and the caliber of the private guards are leading some critics, both inside and outside government, to ask whether this is a job too vital for the military to outsource to civilians.

Concern has escalated since the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported this month that some private contractors had hired felons, had missing and incomplete records, and in one case, had falsified records on weapons and training. At two military bases, the GAO report found, a total of 89 private guards with criminal records were working.

The GAO's conclusion: The Army's screening procedures for the private guards are "inadequate and put the Army at risk," despite previous agency warnings about such problems during the past three years.

The Army, for its part, has pledged to improve management and oversight of private guards.

Those who see merit in contracting out military-base security say the problems are solvable and that, overall, private security guards are as professional and competent as the Army's own personnel. Private guards, they note, are supervised by the Army and trained according to Department of Defense specifications. With Army and National Guard personnel stretched thin by deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, the private companies provide an invaluable service, say supporters of the current system.

Critics, though, doubt the Army's beefed-up oversight will be sufficient, because some of the contract guards work for American subsidiaries of foreign-owned companies. In this age of terrorism and after the Dubai ports flap, they say, American military personnel should provide security at US military bases.

Some homeland security experts see a more fundamental problem. The need to outsource and the subsequent management problems, they say, are indications of the overall stresses the nation's military, security, and law-enforcement agencies face daily as they adapt to the increased demands of the post-9/11 world.

"Security resources are thin in the country right now. They're in demand, and those with advanced skill sets are drawn to the money, and they're going overseas where they can make 100 to 140 percent more," says Edward Clark, founder of Executive Interface, a homeland security risk-management company in Garden City, Mo. "The system is fairly stressed."

Beginning in the 1970s, the US government began to outsource some of its functions - from designing computer systems to selling food in federal buildings - to private contractors. The intent is to save taxpayers' money and make the government more efficient.

But Congress drew the line at military security. In 1982, it prohibited the Defense Department from hiring private security firms at military bases in the United States. Lawmakers were concerned about the "uncertain quality and reliability of private security guard services, base commanders' potential lack of control over contractor personnel, and the right of contractor personnel to strike," according to the GAO.

That changed in the wake of 9/11. Commanders ordered that entrances to all domestic bases, many of which were open to the public, had to be secured. At the same time, military engagement in Afghanistan and then Iraq strained military personnel resources.

In 2003, Congress temporarily lifted its restriction against private security guards. To hire new guards as quickly as possible, especially for the Army, the Defense Department did not put the contracts out to competitive bid, as is usually required to ensure that the government gets the lowest price.

Currently, 57 Army installations use private guards, and 46 of these hired the guards under such sole-source contracts. The GAO concluded these contracts cost 25 percent more than contracts later put out to bid.

Army officials defend sole-source contracts as the fastest way to meet a crucial need, but say that all future contracts will be put out to bid. They also suggest that the GAO report exaggerated the seriousness of the problems it found with screening and training.

"Their overall record has been outstanding," says Ned Christensen, a spokesman for the US Army Installation Management Agency.

Wackenhut Services Inc., a company working under a no-bid contract, insists that most problems the GAO cited were with firms that won the competitive bids, not those who received the sole-source contracts.

"The comments that are in that report - all of the misrepresentation, all of the failure to properly train - pertain almost specifically and uniquely to the competitively bid piece," says Wackenhut CEO James Long. "My guess is they hopelessly underbid it, couldn't run it without losing their tail, and had to start cutting corners."

But the GAO said it found problems with each company's work.

"The problems were across the board," says Michele Mackin of the GAO. "We found a lack of oversight. The Army really relied on what the contractors said they were doing and provided very little monitoring."

House Weighs Boost In Spy Chief's Budget (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP2, April 26, 2006

The House passed an intelligence bill Wednesday that would dramatically boost the money available to the new spy chief and require the Bush administration to consider blocking the pensions of government leakers.

Democrats made an unsuccessful, last-minute push to block the bill to protest that Republicans wouldn't allow adequate debate on the legality of the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program.

The legislation was nevertheless approved 327-96. It provides budgeting guidelines for 16 U.S. spy agencies and the office of National Intelligence Director John Negroponte.

The bill's total cost is classified, but intelligence agencies' spending is believed to top $40 billion a year. Under the legislation, Negroponte's office would get nearly $1 billion.

Democrats expressed outrage that Republicans would not allow any of their five proposed amendments to be considered by the full House, including measures to expand congressional oversight of the NSA program and the intelligence on Iran.

California Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record), the intelligence committee's top Democrat, supported the bill during the panel's deliberations. Yet she ultimately voted against it, saying intelligence officers aren't served by a bill "that does not protect the Constitution they are fighting to defend."

Republicans insisted on the legality of Bush's surveillance program. House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., said allegations that the operations are abusive or unconstitutional are "absolutely outrageous."

He said he is committed to active oversight on both the NSA and Iran. Hoekstra also said the bill sends a signal that the vision of the intelligence overhaul law in late 2004 "was about building qualitative, better intelligence establishment — and not building a bureaucracy."

One of the Democratic amendments would have required Negroponte to submit to Congress information about Americans who have been the subject of surveillance by the National Security Agency. A second stated that all such surveillance would comply with the Constitution.

A third would have required Negroponte's office to provide the intelligence committees with classified updates on Iran's nuclear program every three months.

The bill provides more than $990 million in the primary account that funds Negroponte's office, which was created to organize the spy agencies under one leader. It is possible other dollars for his office are elsewhere in the bill. Last year, the House approved $446 million for his office, but the bill never became law.

The legislation would limit growth of Negroponte's staff until he explains new personnel needs to Congress. He requested 1,539 people for 2007.

In a bleak assessment, Harman said, "Our intelligence reorganization is in a slow startup, and the CIA is in a free fall," adding that employees with a combined 300 years of experience have left or been pushed out.

The bill would require Negroponte to study administrative punishments for government employees who leak classified information, including the revocation of their pensions.

The administration is trying to crack down on leaks, as seen by last week's firing of CIA officer Mary McCarthy for unauthorized contact with the media. The fate of her pension, after two decades in government, is not clear.

Rep. Rick Renzi (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., offered a resolution that condemns media organizations that profit from disclosures and calls on the president to use his constitutional powers to act against leakers of classified information. The makes made no substantive or practical changes to current law.

Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said, "I think it is obnoxious, but I don't think it will have much of an impact."

The bill also would:

· Expand funding and makes recommendations for intelligence analysis, billion-dollar satellite programs, counterterrorism and training for traditional spycraft. The details were classified.

· Allow the security officers protecting CIA and NSA officials to make arrests when they believe a felony has been committed. The Washington-based Project on Government Oversight raised concerns about potential abuses in domestic law enforcement.

Harman said such powers are comparable to those given to Secret Service and other organizations that protect government officials. Still, Harman said, she hoped more safeguards would be added to prevent possible abuses.

· Require Negroponte's office to provide the intelligence committees with an inventory of all the government's most sensitive operations, such as the NSA's warrantless surveillance program.

The provision, which the House also passed last year but was never made law, comes after Republicans and Democrats complained they were not briefed on the existence or details of the NSA program.

Question Time (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, April 27, 2006

It's not exactly the full-scale congressional inquiry Bush critics have long demanded. But some time fairly soon, members of the Senate Intelligence Committee are going to have an opportunity to grill a senior Central Intelligence Agency official in public and private about the agency's controversial procedures for handling high-level terrorist suspects—and about the CIA's efforts to thwart media leaks.

Congressional staffers are already preparing for hearings the committee is expected to hold on whether the Senate should confirm John Rizzo, a veteran CIA attorney, as the agency's general counsel. President Bush nominated Rizzo to the CIA's top legal post in mid-March. Currently the CIA's senior deputy general counsel, Rizzo has been acting as the agency's top legal adviser after the previous chief lawyer left the agency in August 2004.

Congressional aides said a date for Rizzo's confirmation hearings has not yet been set. However, officials on Capitol Hill and inside the intelligence community said that everyone involved in the confirmation process is aware that the hearings are likely to become a forum in which administration critics, particularly Senate Democrats, can question a senior agency official in detail about contentious CIA procedures for detaining and interrogating prisoners, as well as the agency's practice of "rendition," in which terror suspects are transported by undercover agency operatives to foreign countries. (Domestic and foreign critics say the Bush administration's rendition policies have amounted to the "outsourcing" of torture.)

Senate critics are also likely to ask Rizzo about CIA investigations into alleged media leaks, including the probe that led to the recent firing of veteran CIA analyst Mary McCarthy for alleged unauthorized contacts and discussions of classified information with Washington Post reporter Dana Priest and at least one other journalist. Rizzo could also be asked about whether Congress should take action to plug perceived loopholes in the law currently governing unauthorized disclosures of classified information.

In his current position as CIA senior deputy general counsel, and in his previous job as deputy general counsel for the agency's Operations Division, which conducts clandestine and covert espionage activities, Rizzo was privy to key decisions and legal opinions rendered by CIA and other government lawyers regarding potentially contentious counterterror operations involving the agency, particularly following the 9/11 attacks. Aside from rendition, these operations include the CIA's own use of aggressive, or "enhanced" interrogation techniques—including some alleged techniques that human-rights activists describe as torture—and the agency's operation of what amounts to a secret network of detention centers where it is believed to be holding two to three dozen high-level Al Qaeda detainees, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks.

More than a year ago, Jay Rockefeller, the top Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, demanded that the panel conduct a thorough investigation into the administration's detention, interrogation and rendition policies. However, Senate Republicans, including committee chairman Pat Roberts, have used their majority voting power to block an inquiry.

Republicans now expect Democrats will use the anticipated hearings not only as a forum to question Rizzo about agency practices but also to pressure the administration to make broader disclosures of key legal documents relating to terrorist-prisoner handling procedures. At present, according to one official familiar with the issue, the documents have been sent to the Senate Intelligence Committee on condition that only top committee leaders—Sens. Roberts and Rockefeller—are allowed access to them. Some GOP sources predict Democrats may try to hold up the hearings, or a subsequent vote on Rizzo's confirmation, until more senators are given access to the documentation.

Both Republican and Democratic congressional sources said that despite the top-secret nature of most CIA antiterror operations, at least some of the Rizzo confirmation process is likely to include public hearings at which Rizzo is expected to be questioned on the agency's handling of terror suspects. Although the CIA has never publicly admitted that it engages in rendition, that it has any terror suspects in its custody or that it has been operating secret airlines and detention facilities to hold them, these alleged agency practices have been the subject of extensive news coverage in both U.S. and foreign media.

Alleged CIA leaks are another issue that could produce heated discussions during Rizzo's confirmation proceedings, though much of any questioning on leaks—as well as discussion of the fine detail of agency antiterror operations—is likely to be held by the committee in closed session. One main reason why the committee would deal with the leak question behind closed doors is that while the CIA publicly confirmed the firing of a senior official for alleged unauthorized media contacts and disclosures, the agency has not publicly identified the official for legal reasons. Even though the fired official's lawyer and friends now have confirmed that she is former senior CIA analyst Mary McCarthy, privacy legislation prohibits officials from publicly confirming her identity, and congressional sources said Senate investigators are likely to respect this convention.

One issue related to the administrations antileak campaign that Rizzo may also be questioned about is whether loopholes in current law make it difficult for the government to prosecute officials who leak information about CIA covert actions. According to several official and private legal experts, existing espionage and disclosure laws explicitly provide for the prosecution of people involved in unauthorized disclosure of classified information related to nuclear weapons, communications eavesdropping or the identity of undercover CIA operatives.

Federal espionage law also broadly bans the unauthorized disclosure of classified information relating to "national defense," particularly when there is evidence a foreign power might benefit. But some legal experts say that there is a serious legal question mark over whether details of undercover CIA operations constitute "national defense" information.

In an effort to plug this perceived loophole, both houses of Congress approved an intelligence-bill provision during the final months of the Clinton administration tightening the law to make it clear that prosecutors should be able to go after people involved in the leak of any "properly classified" information. After media organizations protested that approving such legislation would amount to the institution of an American version of Britain's notorious Official Secrets Act—which has allowed authorities to prosecute both government officials who leak and journalists who receive leaks—Clinton vetoed the measure.

Some House Intelligence Committee members have talked recently about reviving the antileak legislation, though congressional sources say that senators—including majority Republicans—are less enthusiastic about moving on this issue. It remains unclear whether the McCarthy firing will add more or less momentum to demands for tighter antileak legislation. Official sources familiar with the McCarthy case say, however, that the vagueness of current espionage law is one reason why they believe prosecutors may have serious problems producing any kind of criminal leak case against McCarthy; it is unclear whether she is even facing a serious criminal investigation.

Even some human-rights advocates acknowledge the current law regarding protection of CIA operations may be too vague. "If they wanted [a new law] on covert operations, they're probably entitled to one," said Morton Halperin, a long-time civil-liberties campaigner and former Clinton White House official.

Deal Reached To End WTC Project Impasse (AP-Y2)

By Amy Westfeldt

AP2, April 26, 2006

Breaking an impasse that threatened to hold up the rebuilding at ground zero, state officials and developer Larry Silverstein reached an agreement Wednesday under which Silverstein gave up control over the planned, 1,776-foot Freedom Tower.

The deal came after months of sometimes-bitter negotiations over the future of the World Trade Center site.

Officials with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the property, had been pressing Silverstein, who holds the 99-year lease on the site, to give up some control over the project. City and state officials had argued that Silverstein lacked the money to build it all and was running the risk of an embarrassing failure.

"With today's agreement, we can now move forward with rebuilding the World Trade Center," Silverstein said. He said the construction trucks will start rolling on Thursday.

Silverstein agreed to give control of the $2.1 billion Freedom Tower and another planned skyscraper to the Port Authority. He will still build three other towers at the site.

Officials said the deal ensures all five planned towers will be built by 2012.

"We have an agreed-upon framework and we can move forward," Gov. George Pataki said. "This is the last stumbling block to putting shovels in the ground" on the Freedom Tower, the skyscraper that will rise on the site of the twin towers.

Pataki said the plan "will make certain that the rebuilt World Trade Center will anchor the financial capital of the world and make our nation proud."

A Change Of Course At Ground Zero (NYT)

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

On Tuesday, New York City heard some of the best news it's had about Lower Manhattan in the past four years. Larry Silverstein, the developer who held the lease on the World Trade Center when it was attacked, announced that he would accept a deal that would reduce his role at ground zero and clear the way for the Port Authority to build some version of the Freedom Tower.

The devil, as always, is in the details, but the Port Authority affirmed yesterday that it, too, was ready to sign the agreement, in which Mr. Silverstein cedes control over a third of the site but retains the right to build on three of the most valuable parcels.

The widespread relief over this agreement is a perfect testament to how badly blocked the redevelopment effort in Lower Manhattan has been in the last two years. There have been many obstructions, including Mr. Silverstein himself. After months of negotiations, the mayor and the governors of New York and New Jersey lined up solidly against the developer last week and offered him two good options and one solid deadline. Mr. Silverstein did the right thing by accepting one of these options, which should turn out to be a profitable deal, not only for his own company but also for the public.

And now for the Freedom Tower. In a sense, this agreement brings us full circle — not to Sept. 11, 2001, but to the early 1960's, when the Port Authority was preparing to build the World Trade Center. Nothing seems to come easily at ground zero, yet it's possible now to hope that the public's interests and the interests of the developer of the Freedom Tower — whatever form that building finally takes — are likely to be roughly synonymous. The Port Authority's new role will also help clarify and perhaps speed up the financing for the 9/11 memorial, which should be the top priority for us all.

A Plan To Rebuild By 2012, And Doubts On The Big Rush (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

The new plan for ground zero calls for the accelerated construction of a sprawling commercial complex: 8.8 million square feet of office space in four towers 58 to 70 stories high. All would open within a year of each other, by 2012.

Gov. George E. Pataki and others say the conceptual plan, officially approved yesterday by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey after months of gridlock, will rejuvenate Lower Manhattan and ensure that it remains the financial capital of the world.

But some construction and real estate industry executives, and some urban planners, hear echoes of the hoopla surrounding the original World Trade Center project more than 30 years ago. They are questioning whether the rapid building of so much speculative office space would have the same destabilizing consequences for the downtown market as the twin towers had in the 1970's.

Some experts are even wondering whether there will be enough steel, concrete and curtain wall to build the four towers by 2012 at the same time that two baseball stadiums, the $2 billion Goldman Sachs headquarters, the $1.7 billion expansion of the Jacob K. Javits Convention Center, Moynihan Station, 10,000 apartments and various subway projects are under construction.

Yesterday, the influential Regional Plan Association and the Fiscal Policy Institute welcomed the plan, but they, like many developers, continued to question the wisdom of building the tallest of the skyscrapers, the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower, intended to be a symbol of the city's resilience.

They said the tower would stand too far from public transportation and was unlikely to attract corporate tenants, who view it as a potential terrorist target. Some government officials suggested that the site be brought up to street level and then put into mothballs next year.

"The Freedom Tower is a disastrous idea that should be scratched," said Susan S. Fainstein, a professor of urban planning at Columbia University.

Kathryn S. Wylde, president of the Partnership for New York City, was far more upbeat. "This agreement will provide a significant boost to the economy of Lower Manhattan by eliminating much of the uncertainty regarding the area's economic future," she said, adding that businesses would be lured by the neighborhood's comparatively low business costs.

But one thing is certain: the cost of the buildings, now estimated at $6.3 billion, is going to jump. Jones Lang LaSalle, the real estate company advising the Port Authority, has built inflation into the numbers. Construction costs are continuing to escalate, at the rate of 1 percent a month.

"I don't know how long it'll continue," said Frank J. Sciame, the former chairman of the New York Building Congress, "but that's the case for the next year or two."

The World Trade Center, a 10 million-square-foot office complex built by the Port Authority, opened in late 1970 during one of the worst real estate markets since the Depression. To provide anchor tenants for the 110-story towers, state agencies moved into two million square feet of space in one tower, and the Port Authority took 900,000 square feet in the second.

The trade center also offered subsidized rents to lure tenants out of surrounding buildings, angering local landlords.

It was not until the mid-1980's that the state began relocating to other buildings. And a breakthrough came in 1985, when Dean Witter Financial Services leased 24 floors in Tower 2, opening the way for other financial firms. Still, occupancy fluctuated wildly until 1998, when companies fleeing high rents in Midtown pushed the occupancy rate to 98 percent.

In late 2002, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg outlined his vision for downtown and drew on some of the lessons of the trade center. He said that it made no sense to rush ahead to rebuild the 10 million square feet of lost office space.

"If we are honest with ourselves," he said, "we will recognize that the impact on our city was not all positive. The twin towers' voracious appetite for tenants weakened the entire downtown market."

But last fall, Mr. Bloomberg started calling for the ground zero project to accelerate. And the plan approved yesterday moves the completion date for the four office towers to 2012, from 2015.

DOJ_NMG_0026877

Government agencies — city, state, federal and the Port Authority — are expected to account for 25 percent of the 8.8 million square feet, only slightly less space than they took up in the twin towers in 1972.

"The need to relocate government offices to the World Trade Center in the 1970's was a sign of the economic failure of that project," said David Dyssegaard Kallick, a senior fellow at the Fiscal Policy Institute. "It would make more sense to ensure that we fully fund the public spaces, like the memorial and the performing arts center. Then, allow for the gradual development of the office space with market demand."

One downtown landlord, who expects to lose his government tenant to the new trade center complex, said, "They're about to make the same mistake they did in the 1970's."

The executive, who was granted anonymity because he did not want to damage his relationship with his largest tenant, a government agency, predicted: "They'll pull all the city, state and federal agencies out of other buildings and put them in there. It'll take a long time for other owners to relet their buildings."

Barry M. Gosin, chief executive of Newmark Knight Frank, a real estate firm, also said the timetable was too short. "They'll be competing with themselves," he said. "They should leave a few sites zoned and ready to go when demand dictates."

But Bill Rudin, a third-generation developer and a major downtown landlord, said that his family was one of the few in real estate who supported the trade center in 1970, and that he supported the new ground zero plan. He said that while a few downtown companies would move to the new towers, most would come from outside the area.

"There is a need for this type of space," he said. "In the last year or so, we've seen Midtown tighten and companies being priced out. Where are they going to but downtown?"

Mayor Bloomberg said yesterday that he was still concerned about building all four towers simultaneously, which "may very well lead to too much office space coming on the market at one time." But, he added, the empty holes at the trade center site have become a "great disincentive to rent downtown."

"On balance," the mayor said, "I'd just as soon get everything going."

Still, it may be physically impossible to build all four towers by 2012, as well as the memorial, the museum, the $2 billion PATH terminal and other nearby projects. Even before the accelerated schedule, Charles J. Maikish, executive director of the Lower Manhattan Construction Command Center, estimated that there would be 10,000 to 15,000 construction workers a day on ground zero projects over the next three to five years.

The trade center site will be competing for materials and labor with a dozen other major projects, including the extension of the No. 7 subway line on the West Side and the construction of the Second Avenue Subway on the East Side.

United 93 (WSJ)

By David Beamer

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

The calendar says it's April 25, 2006. At noon, my wife, Peggy, and I are walking around Battery Park -- near the Tribeca area -- in New York. It is our first time. The flowers are blooming; kids are fishing; people boarding the ferry to Ellis Island and the Statue of Liberty. Kids are laughing and noisy. The sun is shining. The vendors are hawking T-shirts, pretzels and some "designer" wares. And just up the street there is a hole in the skyline and in the ground.

In the park, there is a memorial with walls standing tall. Walls filled with so many names of those who gave their all in the Atlantic in World War II. How fitting that the names are here to honor those who gave their lives to enable this fun, this laughter -- on this sunny day. The sights and sounds of freedom continue.

Fast forward -- it is 10:30 p.m., April 25. We have just seen a movie premiere at the fifth annual Tribeca Film Festival. A film festival that has done so much to energize and revitalize the city, its people and especially the area that has that hole in the skyline and in the ground. This year the movie that had its worldwide premiere at the festival is titled "United 93." It is about the day when the hole in the skyline of New York was made -- the day when a hole was made in the side of the Pentagon near Washington, D.C. -- the day when a hole was made in a quiet mountain meadow in Pennsylvania. The day that our nation was attacked; the day when the war came home -- Sept. 11, 2001. The day our son Todd boarded United 93.

Paul Greengrass and Universal set out to tell the story of United Flight 93 on that terrible day in our nation's history. They set about the task of telling this story with a genuine intent to get it right -- the actions of those on board and honor their memory. Their extensive research included reaching out to all the families who had lost loved ones on United Flight 93 as the first casualties of this war. And Paul and his team got it right.

There are those who question the timing of this project and the painful memories it evokes. Clearly, the film portrays the reality of the attack on our homeland and its terrible consequences. Often we attend movies to escape reality and fantasize a bit. In this case and at this time, it is appropriate to get a dose of reality about this war and the real enemy we face. It is not too soon for this story to be told, seen and heard. But it is too soon for us to become complacent. It is too soon for us to think of this war in only national terms. We need to be mindful that this enemy, who made those holes in our landscape and caused the deaths of some 3,000 of our fellow free people, has a vision to personally kill or convert each and every one of us. This film reminds us that this war is personal. This enemy is on a fanatical mission to take away our lives and liberty -- the liberty that has been secured for us by those whose names are on those walls in Battery Park and so many other walls and stones throughout this nation. This enemy seeks to take away the free will that our Creator has endowed in us. Patrick Henry got it right some 231 years ago. Living without liberty is not living at all.

The passengers and crew of United 93 had the blessed opportunity to understand the nature of the attack and to launch a counterattack against the enemy. This was our first successful counterattack in our homeland in this new global war -- World War III.

This film further reminds us of the nature of the enemy we face. An enemy who will stop at nothing to achieve world domination and force a life devoid of freedom upon all. Their methods are inhumane and their targets are the innocent and unsuspecting. We call this conflict the "War on Terror." This film is a wake-up call. And although we abhor terrorism as a tactic, we are at war with a real enemy and it is personal.

There are those who would hope to escape the pain of war. Can't we just live and let live and pretend every thing is OK? Let's discuss, negotiate, reason together. The film accurately shows an enemy who will stop at nothing in a quest for control. This enemy does not seek our resources, our land or our materials, but rather to alter our very way of life.

I encourage my fellow Americans and free people everywhere to see "United 93."

Be reminded of our very real enemy. Be inspired by a true story of heroic actions taken by ordinary people with victorious consequences. Be thankful for each precious day of life with a loved one and make the most of it. Resolve to take the right action in the situations of life, whatever they may be. Resolve to give thanks and support to those men, women, leaders and commanders who to this day (1,687 days since Sept. 11, 2001) continue the counterattacks on our enemy and in so doing keep us safe and our freedoms intact.

May the taste of freedom for people of the Middle East hasten victory. The enemy we face does not have the word "surrender" in their dictionary. We must not have the word "retreat" in ours. We surely want our troops home as soon as possible. That said, they cannot come home in retreat. They must come home victoriously. Pray for them.

Mr. Beamer is the father of Todd Beamer, a passenger on United Airlines Flight 93.

Senate Report Urges Dismantling Of FEMA (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Hurricane Katrina exposed flaws in the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Department of Homeland Security that are "too substantial to mend," and FEMA should be dismantled and rebuilt inside the troubled department, according to the final report by Senate investigators.

The report, to be released to key senators today and to the public next week, makes 86 recommendations that would undo major changes made when President Bush and Congress launched the department in 2003, and would reverse parts of a reorganization ordered by Secretary Michael Chertoff last summer. It stops short of restoring FEMA to independent, Cabinet-level status, as many in Congress and former agency directors want, but would promote its chief to confer directly with the president in a crisis, according to a summary released to news organizations.

The 800-plus-page report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," incorporates many findings by earlier House and White House investigations but goes further in recommending structural changes in how all levels of government -- especially the Homeland Security Department -- respond to catastrophes.

It would replace FEMA with a new National Preparedness and Response Authority whose head would report to the secretary but serve as the president's top adviser for national emergency management, akin to the military role served by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It would reunify disaster preparedness and response activities that Chertoff decoupled, and restore grant-making authority taken away by Congress in redefining a stronger national preparedness system with regional coordinators, a larger role for the National Guard and the Defense Department and more money for training, planning and exercises.

"We have concluded that FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair, and that it should be abolished," Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) said in a written statement released by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which held 22 hearings, interviewed more than 320 people and reviewed more than 838,000 pages of documents.

The report by the 16-member panel formally kicks off a frenzied effort by Congress to make fixes before the June 1 start of hurricane season. By framing the debate around FEMA's fate, the report defers to President Bush's request to not carve it out of the Homeland Security Department even as it faults his administration, among 24 findings, for failing to fund and coordinate disaster readiness efforts after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and for emphasizing terrorism at the expense of natural disaster preparedness. The administration was also faulted for bungling the storm response by neglecting warnings, failing to grasp Katrina's destructiveness, doing too little or taking the wrong steps before the Aug. 29 landfall. The report also found design flaws in New Orleans levees and failures by city and state leaders.

The Senate report said making FEMA independent would "do nothing to solve the key problems that Katrina has revealed, including a lack of resources and weak and ineffective leadership," and could lead to wasteful duplication.

The Senate report is the only bipartisan national inquiry into the storm, which killed 1,330 people, displaced 1 million families, swamped 80 percent of New Orleans and led to a $100 billion federal response. House Democrats boycotted their chamber's effort, fearing a partisan whitewash, and called for an independent panel styled after the one that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. Afterward, several Democrats said its findings were complete, but should have called for Chertoff's removal.

Yesterday, the ranking Democrat on Collins's committee, Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) added a written statement excoriating Bush and his aides for being "surprisingly detached" before and just after the storm and for not cooperating with Senate investigators, who he said should have subpoenaed the White House.

"The President failed to provide critical leadership when it was most needed, and that contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response to Hurricane Katrina," Lieberman said.

As Bush headed to the Gulf Coast today, White House spokesman Scott McClellan reiterated the administration's stance to keep FEMA "where it is."

Rep. David G. Reichert (R-Wash.), who chairs a House Homeland Security subcommittee, has proposed reuniting disaster preparedness and response functions within FEMA, which Chertoff split up in a reorganization of the Homeland Security Department. A bipartisan group of committee leaders warned April 12 that "removing FEMA from DHS would only exacerbate the agency's problems" with hurricane season starting June 1.

But Rep. William Shuster (R-Pa.), chairman of a House Transportation and Infrastructure subcommittee, would make FEMA independent, as would Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), head of the Government Reform Committee.

Panel Urges Ending FEMA (BRA)

By Gerard Shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — After what is considered an exhaustive investigation into the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, a Senate committee is recommending abolishing the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Over the past seven months, the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee has examined 830,000 documents, interviewed 320 witnesses and held 22 hearings involving the testimony of 85 people.

In a copy of a report to be released today and obtained by The Advocate, the committee makes 86 recommendations, including the establishment of a new federal disaster agency.

"We have concluded that FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair and that it should be abolished," Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, says in a statement.

FEMA officials dismissed the recommendation.

"It's time to stop playing with (organizational) charts," FEMA spokesman Russ Knocke said. "We're intensely focused on the coming storm season."

The ranking Democrat on the committee, U.S. Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., accused President Bush of failing to provide critical leadership in the days after the hurricane and of being "surprisingly detached" from the disaster.

Lieberman, in a statement, also criticizes the Bush administration for failing to cooperate with the committee probe, saying that the White House should have been subpoenaed.

White House spokesman Blair C. Jones disagreed, noting that administration officials such as Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff appeared before the committee.

"The president said he was not satisfied with the federal response to Hurricane Katrina," Jones said. "He demanded that we learn from the lessons of the response and take every action to make sure America is better prepared."

The White House will consider the committee's recommendations, Jones said.

The new agency called for by the committee would be named the National Preparedness and Response Authority and would be an independent entity within the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, similar to the U.S. Coast Guard or U.S. Secret Service.

The committee resisted taking FEMA out of DHS and restoring it to a Cabinet position as some former FEMA directors have called for.

"Katrina has made it clear that we need more integration in federal preparedness and response, not less," the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0026880

The agency director would serve as a deputy secretary but with a direct line of communication to the president during catastrophes. The director and three deputies should also have emergency-management backgrounds, the report recommends. Former FEMA Director Michael Brown was criticized for lacking emergency-management experience.

The agency would have 10 regional offices responsible for creating regional strike forces to handle natural disasters. “Most of the essential work of emergency management does not happen in Washington, D.C.,” the report says.

The report calls on the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to coordinate responsibility for maintaining the levee system surrounding New Orleans. The levees breached after Hurricane Katrina struck on Aug. 29, causing widespread flooding and the deaths of an estimated 1,300 people.

Citing poor information relayed to the Homeland Security Operations Center, particularly when the New Orleans levees broke, the report recommends a consolidation of the center with the National Response Coordination Center and the Interagency Incident Management Group into a National Operations Center.

The report also recommends:

Establishing local advisory councils to the new national agency.

Encouraging the federal government to tap into private-sector resources. “After Katrina struck, private companies and their employees provided important and even life-saving relief to citizens across the Gulf Coast region.”

Better coordination between the Department of Defense and DHS, including their inventories of assets. “Such assets may include, for example, utility and heavy-lift helicopters, medium-lift helicopters capable of performing search and rescue.”

Having DHS establish data-sharing agreements with other federal agencies to ensure that disaster victims registering for assistance use a valid Social Security number.

Establishing pre-arranged contracts to procure goods such as food, ice and water.

Having the new agency implement regional interoperable communications networks to enable crippled radios to operate off towers that have survived a disaster.

Having the federal Department of Transportation play a larger role in evacuations when state and local capabilities are hampered.

Having the Department of Defense establish an officer in the new agency. Although criticizing federal agencies, the report notes that state and local communities remain the front lines of disaster response.

“The pattern over the last three years of steadily declining funds for homeland security and local preparedness needs to be reversed,” the report says. It also recommends:

Having state emergency preparedness officials complete an audit once a year, reporting to the governor, and develop estimates of populations that will require short-term shelter, particularly for special-needs residents.

Having state agencies responsible for licensing hospitals and nursing homes ensure that the facilities have evacuation plans, and audit them annually.

Having state responders invest in satellite phones that can operate in disasters.

Senate Inquiry Concludes FEMA Should Be Abolished (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's disaster response agency should be abolished and rebuilt from scratch to avoid a repeat of multiple government failures exposed by Hurricane Katrina, a Senate inquiry has concluded.

Crippled by years of poor leadership and inadequate funding, the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot be fixed, a bipartisan investigation says in recommendations to be released Thursday.

Though short on specifics, such as funding levels, the 86 proposed reforms suggest the U.S. is still woefully unprepared for a disaster of Katrina's magnitude.

The recommendations, obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press, are the product of a seven-month investigation to be detailed in a Senate report to released next week. It follows similar inquiries by the House and White House and comes in an election year in which Democrats have seized on Katrina to attack the Bush administration.

President Bush will visit Louisiana and Mississippi -- which bore the brunt of Katrina's wrath -- on Thursday.

"The United States was, and is, ill-prepared to respond to a catastrophic event of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina," the recommendations warned. "Catastrophic events are, by their nature, difficult to imagine and to adequately plan for, and the existing plans and training proved inadequate in Katrina."

The inquiry urges yet another overhaul of the beleaguered Homeland Security Department -- FEMA's parent agency -- which was created three years ago and already has undergone major restructuring of duties and responsibilities.

It proposes creating a new agency, called the National Preparedness and Response Authority, that would plan and carry out relief missions for domestic disasters. Unlike now, the authority would have a direct line of communication with the president during major crises, and any dramatic cuts to its budget or staffing levels would have to be approved by Congress.

It would also oversee efforts to protect critical infrastructure such as buildings, roads and power systems, as well as Homeland Security's medical officer. But the inquiry calls for keeping the agency within Homeland Security, waning that making it an independent office would cut it off from resources the larger department could provide.

Senate Panel Recommends Abolishing FEMA (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's beleaguered disaster response agency should be abolished and rebuilt from scratch to avoid a repeat of multiple government failures exposed by Hurricane Katrina, a Senate inquiry has concluded.

Crippled by years of poor leadership and inadequate funding, the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot be fixed, a bipartisan investigation says in recommendations to be released Thursday.

Taken together, the 86 proposed reforms charge the United States is still woefully unprepared for a disaster such as Katrina with the start of the hurricane season a little more than month away.

"The United States was, and is, ill-prepared to respond to a catastrophic event of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina," the recommendations warn. "Catastrophic events are, by their nature, difficult to imagine and to adequately plan for, and the existing plans and training proved inadequate in Katrina."

The recommendations, obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press, are the product of a seven-month investigation detailed in a Senate report to be released next week. It follows similar inquiries by the House and White House and comes in an election year in which Democrats have seized on Katrina to attack the Bush administration.

President Bush will visit Louisiana and Mississippi _ which bore the brunt of Katrina's wrath _ on Thursday.

Katrina, which hit last Aug. 29, was one of the worst natural disasters in U.S. history. The storm and its aftershocks killed more than 1,300 people in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, left hundreds of thousands of people homeless and caused tens of billions of dollars in damage.

The Senate report urges yet another overhaul of the embattled Homeland Security Department _ FEMA's parent agency _ which was created three years ago and already has undergone major restructuring of duties.

It chiefly calls for a new agency, called the National Preparedness and Response Authority, to plan and carry out relief missions for domestic disasters. Unlike now, the authority would communicate directly with the president during major crises, and any dramatic cuts to budget or staffing levels would have to be approved by Congress. But it would remain within Homeland Security to continue receiving resources provided by the larger department.

The proposal drew disdain from Homeland Security and its critics, both sides questioning the need for another bureaucratic shuffling that they said wouldn't accomplish much.

"It's time to stop playing around with the organizational charts and to start focusing on government, at all levels, that are preparing for this storm season," said Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke.

Former FEMA director Michael Brown said the new agency would basically have the same mission FEMA had a year ago, before its disaster planning responsibilities were taken away to focus solely on responding to calls for help.

"It sounds like they're just re-creating the wheel and making it look like they're calling for change," Brown said. "If indeed that's all they're doing, they owe more than that to the American public."

But Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, who led the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee inquiry, said the new agency would be "better equipped with the tools to prepare for and respond to a disaster."

Describing FEMA as a "shambles and beyond repair," she said the reforms "will help ensure that we do not have a repeat of the failures following Hurricane Katrina."

Written in matter-of-fact terms, the recommendations do not place blame on any official or government agency. But a spokeswoman for Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the Senate panel, said he will file "additional views" to the report accusing Bush of failing "to provide critical leadership when it was most needed."

"That contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response to Hurricane Katrina," Lieberman said in a statement.

The House report, issued in February, similarly criticized Bush, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and FEMA's Brown for moving too slowly to trigger federal relief. The White House report, which came a week later, took a softer tone and singled out the Homeland Security Department for most of the breakdowns.

Many of the rest of the Senate recommendations were far less dramatic, ranging from creating a Homeland Security Academy to encouraging plans to evacuate and shelter pets during a disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0026882

Without specifying where the money would come from or how much was needed, the recommendations call for more funding for disaster planning and response at all levels of government. They also urge clarifying levee maintenance responsibilities _ a concern because of structural weaknesses of the New Orleans' flood walls that spawned deadly floods after Katrina hit_ and suggested better contracting procedures to avoid waste or fraud in the rush to get aid to disaster victims.

The Senate plans were issued as Congress' investigative arm predicted FEMA is destined to repeat million-dollar mistakes of disaster aid waste and fraud unless it quickly can establish controls for verifying names and addresses.

Gregory Kutz, managing director of special investigations for the Government Accountability Office, said he has little confidence that FEMA will be ready by June 1 start of the hurricane season to safeguard taxpayer dollars should a disaster like Katrina strike again.

A FEMA spokesman said agency officials are working hard to improve and tighten controls in its disaster aid program.

'Abolish' FEMA, Says Bipartisan Senate Panel (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Senate report coming out today says the Federal Emergency Management Agency is a failure and should be replaced with a more powerful disaster-response agency.

"FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair," Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the homeland security committee, said in a statement. "It should be abolished."

That's the top recommendation of Collins' committee, which held 22 hearings and reviewed 838,000 pages of documents in a seven-month probe of the government's response to Hurricane Katrina. USA TODAY received a copy of the report's recommendations, to be made public today.

The committee is proposing that a new National Preparedness and Response Authority (NPRA) be created in the Homeland Security Department with a leader who answers directly to the department secretary.

The NPRA would be "a powerful new organization that can confront the challenges of manmade or natural catastrophes," the Senate report says.

Homeland Security said a new agency is not needed.

"It is time to stop playing around with organizational charts and start focusing on how governments at all levels are preparing for the fast-approaching storm season," spokesman Russ Knocke said.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the committee, said the investigation revealed broad leadership lapses.

"The president failed to provide critical leadership when it was most needed," he said. "And that contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response to Hurricane Katrina."

The Senate report follows others from the House and the White House. Those reports criticized FEMA but did not suggest abolishing the agency.

Among the Senate report's 86 recommendations:

· Create regional "strike teams" to respond to disasters.

· Build a governmentwide operations center to coordinate disaster response.

· Develop more full-time staff and contracts with companies to provide goods and services when storms hit.

Dismantle FEMA, Senate Investigators Conclude (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Emergency Management Agency botched the response to Hurricane Katrina so badly that it should be dismantled, Senate investigators have determined after a seven-month inquiry.

"We have concluded that FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair and that it should be abolished," Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee said Wednesday night in a written statement.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's ranking Democrat, also faulted President Bush for his lack of action during the crisis and for not cooperating with the committee's investigation.

"For Hurricane Katrina, the president failed to provide critical leadership when it was most needed, and that contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response," he said in a statement.

The committee's report, scheduled for release to senators Thursday and to the public next week, recommends replacing FEMA with a new National Preparedness and Response Authority, which would remain in the Department of Homeland Security. Its director would have direct access to the president during disasters, much as the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff provides information and advice during times of military crisis.

FEMA had been an independent -- and highly regarded -- agency until March 2003, when the Department of Homeland Security was created in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. Designed to get all domestic security programs under one department, it combined 22 disparate agencies with more than 170,000 employees.

Although the Senate inquiry calls for a restructuring of disaster operations, it concludes that keeping such an relief agency within Homeland Security is necessary because it "allows the new organization to take full advantage of the substantial range of resources DHS has at its disposal," including the Coast Guard and national communications systems.

Restoring FEMA to its independent role -- as many critics of the Katrina response have advocated -- "would do nothing to solve the key problems that Katrina has revealed, including a lack of resources and weak and ineffective leadership," the committee found.

Several House members -- including Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., chairman of the House Government Reform Committee -- have called for FEMA to stand alone. Asked about their proposal, White House press secretary Scott McClellan told reporters Wednesday that "we support (FEMA) being where it is."

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke also rejected the idea of separation. "It's time to stop playing around with the organizational charts and to start focusing on government, at all levels, that are preparing for this storm season," he said Wednesday night.

The Senate committee is the only bipartisan panel to investigate the failure of the government response to Hurricane Katrina, which killed more than 1,300 people along the Gulf Coast, left hundreds of thousands homeless and caused tens of billions of dollars in damages in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. The committee conducted 22 hearings, interviewed more than 300 people involved in the response to the storm and reviewed nearly 1 million pages of documents.

Fearing that it would be a whitewash, Democrats boycotted a similar House committee inquiry, though two Louisiana Democratic congressmen participated informally and the results were generally agreed to be thorough. The White House also conducted its own in-house investigation, which placed much of the blame for the failed response on state officials.

The release of the Senate committee's 800-page report comes as Bush travels to Louisiana on Thursday and as agencies grapple with being ready for the official start of hurricane season on June 1.

The committee is issuing 86 recommendations for righting the fissures exposed by the Katrina response. The recommendations, obtained by The Times, include:

--Creating regional strike teams and operations to better coordinate with federal agencies.

--Building "a true, government-wide operations center " to provide up-to-date information.

--Fully funding the emergency agency "commensurate with the significance of its mission."

--Developing mass evacuation plans.

Among its 24 findings, the Senate report accuses the Bush administration of focusing on terrorism at the expense of disaster preparedness and of failing to adequately fund disaster response plans following the terrorist attacks.

The committee lays blame in all directions -- faulting the design and construction of the levees in New Orleans as well as the failure of officials at all levels, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and then-FEMA director Michael Brown, to grasp the severity of the storm.

"Secretary Chertoff himself should have been more engaged in preparations over the weekend before landfall," says the report, adding that had he invoked the Catastrophic Incident Annex, which puts federal response to a catastrophe into overdrive, it would have triggered a more robust response.

As for Brown, whom Bush first complimented -- "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" -- and later fired, the committee finds that he "lacked the leadership skills that were needed for his critical position."

Senate Committee Leaders Urge FEMA Dismantling (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 —The Federal Emergency Management Agency was so fundamentally dysfunctional during Hurricane Katrina that Congress should abolish it and create a new disaster response agency from scratch, according to a draft of bipartisan recommendations proposed by a Senate committee.

The new agency, which would still be part of the Department of Homeland Security, should be more powerful, with additional components that would give it a budget twice as big as FEMA's, the report's draft recommendations say.

It would assume functions spread throughout the department, like preparing for disasters or terrorist attacks, protecting the nation's infrastructure and distributing grants to state and local governments.

And during major catastrophes like Hurricane Katrina, the agency's director would report directly to the president.

FEMA today has a budget of $4.8 billion, and 2,600 full-time employees.

Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who is chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said the new agency would be "better equipped with the tools to prepare for and respond to a disaster."

The committee's ranking Democrat, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, also endorsed creation of what would be called the National Preparedness and Response Authority. But the full committee has not yet debated or voted on the draft recommendations.

The report has also not yet been shared with the Bush administration. But officials at the Department of Homeland Security said that from what they had already heard, they were not impressed.

"It is time to stop rearranging organization charts and start focusing on how governments at all levels are preparing for the fast-approaching storm season," said Russ Knocke, the department press secretary.

Since Hurricane Katrina hit, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, has been working on his own alternative to the agency's current structure, which he has described as "retooling" FEMA. That has meant bringing in professional disaster managers to replace the former director Michael D. Brown and other senior officials, many of whom had little emergency management experience.

Mr. Chertoff has also moved to fill hundreds of other vacant jobs, establish a better disaster-resistant communications system and set up a way to ensure that the agency can more rapidly deliver emergency supplies.

The proposal by the Senate committee leaders will join others now before Congress. Bills are pending that would keep FEMA intact, but remove it from the Homeland Security Department and have the director report directly to the president, as was the case before the department was created after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Separately, Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, in a report released in February called for other agencies to pick up certain responsibilities now assigned to homeland security, like providing temporary housing to disaster victims.

Bruce Baughman, the director of emergency management for the state of Alabama and the president of the National Emergency Management Association, said that despite the bureaucratic-sounding nature of the Senate committee's draft recommendations, he believed they would create a more capable agency.

"Whatever the hell you call it, FEMA or National Preparedness and Response Authority, it does not matter," Mr. Baughman said. "But what this does is it ties all the pieces together."

Mr. Lieberman, in a statement, said the Senate investigation, which was based on 22 hearings with testimony by 85 witnesses and the assembly of 830,000 pages of documents, reached the same conclusion as a separate House investigation: that the response to Hurricane Katrina was flawed at all levels of government.

"For years, government officials at all levels neglected their duties to prepare for a forewarned catastrophe," he said, adding, "These failures cost lives and multiplied the anguish of the storm's survivors."

The draft recommendations also call for the creation of "strike teams" that would be set up in 10 regional offices now run by FEMA that would be made up of disaster experts from the new national preparedness agency, as well as officials from the Defense Department and other federal agencies that would train together with local and state governments to prepare for a possible natural disaster or terrorist strike.

Ms. Collins and Mr. Lieberman, who in 2004 helped lead a similar restructuring of the management of the nation's intelligence agencies, said the recreated agency at homeland security would have the authority and resources needed to lead a response by the full federal government to a disaster, instead of seeing itself pushed to the side, as FEMA was after Hurricane Katrina.

FEMA was created in 1979 by President Jimmy Carter in an effort to better unify the nation's fragmented disaster response programs. Today, it is charged with providing food, water and cash aid to victims and then helping people figure out temporary living arrangements while they rebuild their homes.

It is also supposed to lead the recovery effort by helping state and local governments rebuild roads, bridges, hospitals and other government buildings, preferably in a way that makes the new neighborhoods less prone to similar disasters in the future.

In about 20,000 communities, FEMA also runs the federal government's flood insurance program, which is supposed to be self-sufficient, but which the government now must bail out because the claims from Hurricane Katrina are so enormous.

DOJ_NMG_0026885

Mr. Lieberman, in remarks that have not been endorsed by Ms. Collins, said the investigation only further documented how the White House was not fully focused when Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, with the president on vacation in Texas and traveling on the West Coast.

"Before landfall, the president should have returned to Washington, D.C., convened the cabinet, taken stock of the federal government's readiness for Katrina, made sure key White House staff were at their posts before landfall, and directly addressed the people of the Gulf Coast," Mr. Lieberman said in a statement.

Senators: FEMA Can't Be Fixed, So Replace It (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Senate report coming out today says the Federal Emergency Management Agency is a failure and should be replaced with a more powerful disaster-response agency.

"FEMA is in shambles and beyond repair," Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the homeland security committee, said in a statement. "It should be abolished."

That's the top recommendation of Collins' committee, which held 22 hearings and reviewed 838,000 pages of documents in a seven-month probe of the government's response to Hurricane Katrina. USA TODAY received a copy of the report's recommendations, to be made public today.

The committee is proposing that a new National Preparedness and Response Authority (NPRA) be created in the Homeland Security Department with a leader who answers directly to the department secretary.

The NPRA would be "a powerful new organization that can confront the challenges of manmade or natural catastrophes," the Senate report says.

Homeland Security said a new agency is not needed.

"It is time to stop playing around with organizational charts and start focusing on how governments at all levels are preparing for the fast-approaching storm season," spokesman Russ Knocke said.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the committee, said the investigation revealed broad leadership lapses.

"The president failed to provide critical leadership when it was most needed," he said. "And that contributed to a grossly ineffective federal response to Hurricane Katrina."

The Senate report follows others from the House and the White House. Those reports criticized FEMA but did not suggest abolishing the agency.

Among the Senate report's 86 recommendations:

·Create regional "strike teams" to respond to disasters.

·Build a governmentwide operations center to coordinate disaster response.

·Develop more full-time staff and contracts with companies to provide goods and services when storms hit.

GAO: FEMA Still Not Set To Stop Aid Waste (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, April 26, 2006

With hurricane season approaching, FEMA is destined to repeat million-dollar mistakes of disaster aid waste and fraud unless it can quickly establish controls for verifying names and addresses, congressional investigators say.

Gregory Kutz, managing director of special investigations for the Government Accountability Office, said he has little confidence that FEMA will be ready by June 1 to safeguard taxpayer dollars should a major disaster like Hurricane Katrina strike again.

"They're not close to where they need to be," Kutz said this week in a telephone interview that previewed a GAO report. The report, which covers FEMA's $2,000 debit cards and other emergency cash assistance, is to be released next month.

"There's a lot of heavy lifting required to put an effective fraud prevention system in place by this summer. It will take years," said Kutz, who is heading the audit. "You need to have a mechanism in place and field test it. FEMA doesn't have one."

Responding to the audit, FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said Wednesday that FEMA officials have been working hard to improve and tighten controls in its disaster aid program.

In the past, the agency has said its procedures were necessary to expedite aid and that it would be "extremely disingenuous" to suggest aid is distributed without housing inspections and several other layers of verification.

"We are confident in our ability to verify disaster victims' identities," Walker said.

The GAO's recommendations include:

DOJ_NMG_0026886

_Install a reliable system to match Social Security numbers with names of people who apply for aid over the phone and Internet.

In a preliminary audit released in February, the GAO found that up to 900,000 of the 2.5 million applicants who received aid under the emergency cash assistance program after Katrina hit Aug. 29 were based on duplicate or invalid Social Security numbers, or false addresses and names.

Kutz said the GAO's review determined the contractor hired by FEMA to verify identities — ChoicePoint Inc. of Alpharetta, Ga. — was ineffective. That was partly because its system didn't keep track of people who applied over the Internet with false information and were rejected, allowing many of them to try again and get the aid when they applied over the phone.

Responding to the GAO, ChoicePoint spokesman Matt Furman said his company's contract is limited to verifying applications over the Internet and not by telephone. "That criticism should not be directed toward us," he said.

_Establish a system that can quickly and effectively verify property addresses to see if they match up with the accompanying name and Social Security number as well as whether they fall within the disaster-stricken area. In several cases, individuals applied for Katrina aid under several different bogus addresses to fraudulently obtain multiple payments.

_Provide instructions and guidelines to recipients who receive aid through debit cards on how the money should be used. Such information is already provided with the traditional form of aid payment through checks, according to the GAO.

The GAO's previous audit found that recipients improperly used their debit cards intended for food and shelter for $400 massages, a $450 tattoo, a $1,100 diamond engagement ring and $150 worth of products at "Condoms to Go."

In recent weeks, FEMA has sought to crack down on those who received erroneous payments, sending letters to thousands of Gulf Coast residents demanding repayment of amounts ranging from $2,000 to $26,200 for aid that it said was excessive or unjustified.

While Kutz praised the move, he said efforts to recoup the money are no substitute for internal controls since they generally recover no more than 1 percent to 2 percent of the wasted aid. He said the agency must first identify the fraudulent payments, then locate the recipients and hope they do the right thing and return the money.

In the coming months, the GAO plans to expand its waste review to FEMA's housing assistance as well as aid improperly paid out for damage already covered by property insurance. He believes millions of dollars of additional waste have yet to be found.

In February, the GAO estimated the waste so far in roughly $7 billion in disaster aid alone could be in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

"Any projection we make will probably understate the actual waste," Kutz said.

Evacuees Find Housing Grants Will End Soon (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON, April 21 — Thousands of hurricane evacuees who counted on a year of free housing and utilities are being told by the Federal Emergency Management Agency that they are no longer eligible for such help and must either pay the rent themselves or leave.

Of about 55,000 families who were given long-term housing vouchers, nearly a third are receiving notices that they no longer qualify, FEMA officials said. For the rest, benefits are also being cut: they will have to sign new leases, pay their own gas and electric bills and requalify for rental assistance every three months.

The process has been marked by sharp disagreements between the agency and local officials, and conflicting information given to evacuees about their futures. Although agency officials say they never promised a full year of free housing, many local officials around the country say yearlong vouchers were exactly what FEMA agreed to provide.

[The agency was sharply criticized in draft bipartisan recommendations to be released Thursday by a Senate committee, which said the agency functioned so poorly during Hurricane Katrina that Congress should abolish it and rebuild a more powerful agency. Page A22.]

In the desperate weeks after Hurricane Katrina, the vouchers helped stabilize the lives of evacuees who had bounced from place to place while trying to find missing family members and deal with mysterious skin rashes, shellshocked children and reams of red tape. At least, the vouchers promised, they would not have to worry about shelter.

DOJ_NMG_0026887

Now, eight months later, the notices have panicked evacuees and raised the ire of local officials and landlords, who say FEMA is reneging on a promise and dismantling a program that is helping more people and is far less expensive than other housing solutions like trailers.

To make matters worse, advocates and local officials say, many evacuees either do not know why they have been found ineligible or have been given spurious reasons. Many notices do not even give a deadline, saying only, "You will not be asked to leave before April 30."

"We believe that many of the people who received notice that they're ineligible are eligible," said Mayor Bill White of Houston, where more than 9,000 of the 35,000 families on vouchers have been determined to be unqualified, raising fears of mass homelessness.

In an effort to persuade FEMA to reconsider, Mr. White has gone so far as to send teams of building inspectors to New Orleans to photograph evacuees' destroyed homes.

David Garrett, FEMA's acting director of recovery, said the agency had promised only to reimburse for "up to" 12 months of housing. But the cities that actually issued the vouchers, including Houston, Memphis and Little Rock, Ark., said the agency had agreed in negotiations to pay for the full term.

Although the paperwork accompanying the vouchers in Houston did say they were good for "up to" 12 months, local officials in all three cities said evacuees had been told, without contradiction from FEMA, that they would last a year.

"They knew exactly what we were doing," said Buddy Grantham, the chief operating officer of the Joint Hurricane Housing Task Force for Houston, which issued the 12-month vouchers in anticipation of being reimbursed by FEMA. "We were totally transparent."

Agency officials say fairness and the law prevent them from leaving the voucher system in place. The programs were hurriedly set up by state and local governments under FEMA guidelines for emergency housing, which is available to virtually anyone from a disaster-stricken area but is not intended to be used for extended periods.

Now, the agency is converting the families to its more traditional, and stricter, long-term housing program, the individual assistance program. Many people who qualified for emergency housing do not meet the requirements for long-term assistance, and the agency says it cannot ask taxpayers to continue to bankroll those families, although an agency spokesman, Aaron Walker, was unable to provide an estimate of how much money would be saved.

Mr. Garrett said the program was not fair to families who did not get vouchers, but instead went directly from shelters or hotels into the stricter program, under which they receive rent money every three months. The payments count against the total each family can legally receive from FEMA, $26,200, while rent and utilities under the voucher program do not. (FEMA trailers do not count either, agency officials said, because they are not as comfortable as apartments.)

The emergency housing program covers utilities, but the individual assistance program will not, unless Congress approves a request from President Bush to change the regulations.

The movement away from long-term vouchers has created widespread confusion among evacuees. A disabled evacuee in Little Rock said that when she called FEMA to ask why her rent was no longer being paid she was informed, erroneously, that she had never had a voucher. In Memphis, where there are 1,500 families on vouchers, FEMA initially asked those running the program to reclaim the furniture and basic kitchen items issued to evacuees, backing down after strenuous objections, said Susan Adams, the executive director of the Memphis and Shelby County Community Services Agency.

"It feels like a total lack of compassion," Ms. Adams said. "A total lack of humanity."

FEMA has no record of the furniture request, a spokesman for the agency said.

In interviews with more a dozen evacuees, some said they had been told they were ineligible because their home in New Orleans had not suffered enough damage, or they had insurance covering living expenses, or their paperwork lacked a signature, or they had not appeared in person for an inspection of their damaged home. FEMA recently agreed to review its findings for mistakes.

Mr. Garrett emphasized that evacuees could appeal any decision. But according to written guidelines, the agency will not continue to pay rent while a case is on appeal.

FEMA itself has difficulty explaining the ineligibility findings. The agency told Houston officials that about 1,200 of 8,500 families had insufficient damage to their homes and that 1,600 were in a category called "ineligible — other." Some 1,050 were denied on appeal, but the original reason for the denial was not given. More than 2,300 were described as being eligible only for an initial $2,000, with no further explanation.

Some evacuees said they had planned their lives around the security of the 12-month voucher. Erica Stevens, 26, said the promise of housing had drawn her and her three children to Houston after Hurricane Rita destroyed her home in Beaumont, Tex. She did not receive much other assistance, she said, because her landlord filed a FEMA claim on the house before she did, making her ineligible.

Karen Douglas, an evacuee living with two sons in a pleasant house in a Houston suburb, said that amid enrolling the elder son in school, battling insurance adjusters and looking for a job, she had managed to put the insurance proceeds from her destroyed house into investments that would mature in November, when her voucher was to expire. "It's stressful, but I thought I had it together," she said.

Then, on April 15, Ms. Douglas too got a letter. She would like to appeal but does not know why she was found ineligible. The letter says only that she had been previously notified of the reason. "I was expecting FEMA to honor the agreement," she said. "I wasn't expecting them to go midstream and pull the rug out from underneath us."

Trailer Plan Is Revived

NEW ORLEANS, April 26 (AP) — Mayor C. Ray Nagin and federal officials on Wednesday revived the effort to place thousands of trailers throughout the city as stopgap housing for people who lost their homes .

Three weeks ago Mr. Nagin halted work on new trailer sites, saying FEMA had used "bullying" tactics and built a site outside a gated community without the proper permits. But Mr. Nagin and FEMA officials now say they have bridged their differences. Officials hope to install about 8,000 trailers by the end of June. Before the impasse, FEMA had placed about 1,500 travel trailers at enclosed sites around the city.

Nagin, Officials Come To Trailer Agreement (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) -- Mayor Ray Nagin and federal officials on Wednesday revived the effort to place thousands of trailers throughout the city as stopgap housing for people who lost their homes during Hurricane Katrina.

Three weeks ago Nagin halted work on new trailer sites, complaining that the Federal Emergency Management Agency used "bullying" tactics and built a site outside a gated community without the proper permits.

On Wednesday, Nagin and FEMA officials announced that they had bridged their differences. Nagin said he changed his mind after "frank, productive discussions" with Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff. He did not elaborate.

Nagin's decision is "permitting us to move forward," said Gil Jamieson, FEMA's deputy director of Gulf Coast Recovery.

Officials hope to install about 8,000 trailers by the end of June. Before the impasse, FEMA had placed about 1,500 travel trailers at enclosed sites around the city. Most occupants of those trailers had rented before the storm.

In addition, there are about 10,000 trailers sitting in yards and side-lots occupied by homeowners. Another 10,000 homeowners are still waiting for trailers, and officials said those, too, should be in place by the end of June.

For months the process to establish trailer parks has been slowed as Nagin, FEMA, the City Council and neighborhood groups have weighed in.

Hurricane Victims Battle Banks (WSJ)

By Valerie Bauerlein

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

As homeowners along the Gulf Coast try to recover from the devastation of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, some say mortgage lenders are refusing to turn over insurance proceeds while demanding immediate payment on overdue loans.

Hurricane victims in Louisiana and Mississippi have filed nearly 1,000 complaints with state regulators claiming mistreatment by mortgage lenders. About 800 of the complaints have been resolved, often as a result of mediation initiated by regulators.

Jim Wolf of Pass Christian, Miss., a DuPont Co. technician currently living in a company trailer, for example, wanted to use proceeds of an insurance settlement for a down payment on a new home. On Dec. 10, he sent his $40,000 insurance settlement check to giant Countrywide Financial Corp. to pay off $5,000 remaining on the mortgage of his destroyed home, expecting to get $35,000 back. He said he called Countrywide, based in Calabasas, Calif., every business day for a month, spoke to a dozen representatives and couldn't get the balance returned.

Only after "an angel" in the Mississippi Department of Banking and Consumer Finance intervened, he says, did he get his money back. No one in California seemed to understand the desperation on the Gulf Coast, he says. "I knew other people in the same boat," Mr. Wolf said. "They kept a lot of people hung out to dry a long time."

"We had to have a serious talking-to" with some lenders, said John S. Allison, the Mississippi banking commissioner, in an interview. Still, while roughly 200 cases are open, no lenders have been fined or lost their licenses to operate in the two hurricane-ravaged states.

DOJ_NMG_0026889

Following more than 40 accusations of wrongdoing by Countrywide, Louisiana Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. launched a probe of the company in December. Most complaints involved alleged delays in forwarding insurance-settlement checks to storm victims so they could rebuild or repair their damaged properties.

Countrywide said it received a letter from Mr. Foti earlier this month saying the probe had been closed. In an interview, Mr. Foti said he is satisfied with Countrywide's response to his probe.

A Countrywide spokesman denied any wrongdoing by the lender and said the unprecedented damage from Katrina and Rita had resulted in "unfortunate and unusual delays."

Last month, the company started canvassing cities with large numbers of hurricane evacuees to encourage borrowers to seek payment-postponement options and other assistance. Countrywide also said the company and its employees have contributed about $2 million to hurricane-recovery programs on the Gulf Coast.

Mr. Foti's office has received about 400 storm-related complaints, while 547 additional complaints were reported to the Louisiana Office of Financial Institutions, which regulates state-chartered banks, thrifts and credit unions. The financial-services agency wouldn't identify which lenders triggered complaints. It said about 25% of the cases haven't been resolved.

Most lenders have ended initial grace periods encouraged by federal regulators that allowed borrowers to stop making regular monthly payments on their loans, and they now are working out procedures on a case-by-case basis. Some homeowners are using insurance proceeds to cover outstanding payments on destroyed homes, but because the insurance checks typically are made out to both the homeowner and the mortgage holder, homeowners often must send the full proceeds to the lender and wait for the balance to be returned.

In some instances, accusations of wrongdoing have been resolved through agreements giving borrowers more time to catch up on past-due payments. Donald E. Powell, federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, said most problems appear to reflect the widespread destruction that displaced residents and initially overwhelmed most lenders and insurers in hard-hit areas.

Many homeowners are battling lenders on one front and insurers on another. State Rep. John Read, of Gautier, Miss., said he got calls from the mortgage arm of Citigroup Inc. asking when he was going to catch up on his payments almost a month after he'd sent an insurance settlement check to pay off the $160,000 balance.

Mr. Read, who is living in a trailer with his wife and daughter, has resolved his dispute with Citi but is in court against his insurance carrier, disputing the payout on his home and contents. "You do what you have to do and go from there, but it has not been easy," he said.

Citi has made "deep and substantive loan concessions" to more than 100,000 customers in the affected area and there were only "a handful" of formal complaints, a spokesman said. In Mr. Read's case, Citi said misunderstandings on both sides contributed to the delay.

As of Dec. 31, the most recent data available, nearly 76,000 homeowners in Louisiana and Mississippi had fallen at least 90 days behind on mortgage payments or were facing foreclosure, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association, a trade group.

FEMA Handling Of Gulf Schools Criticized (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Putting the Federal Emergency Management Agency in charge of rebuilding and reopening schools on the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina was a critical mistake, congressional Democrats on the House Education and the Workforce Committee said yesterday.

"Now we realize FEMA has to step aside," said Rep. Betty McCollum, Minnesota Democrat.

The Democrats issued a report asserting that eight months after the storm hit the region, its schools remain in crisis. The lawmakers called for the creation of an education-recovery czar to oversee the reopening of Gulf Coast schools and colleges.

"FEMA is operating out of a very old playbook" and deserves a large heap of the blame for slowing down rebuilding efforts with an extra layer of bureaucracy, said Rep. George Miller of California, the ranking Democrat on the committee.

"We heard repeatedly that FEMA gave out contradictory guidance, lacked one single point of contact for schools and colleges, and displayed near-total unwillingness to give local educators the flexibility they need to rebuild and reopen their schools quickly and efficiently," Mr. Miller said. "The people of New Orleans and the Gulf states, they deserve better than that. FEMA is just the wrong agency at the wrong time."

In the New Orleans public school system, 20 of the 130 schools are open.

The schools that are open are crowded, and students must take classes in cramped trailers. School officials are being forced to lay off teachers and borrow money as they wait for payments from the federal government. Some are facing bankruptcy.

DOJ_NMG_0026890

Colleges are in an equally difficult position, the report says. Several schools were destroyed, and thousands of students were left without a learning institution or a place to live in.

Democrats argued that adequately funding schools so they can rehire teachers and faculty will stimulate the economy as students return. The report blamed President Bush for assigning FEMA to handle recovery efforts at schools in Louisiana and Mississippi. Democrats say the Department of Education should assume the rebuilding role and ensure that schools in the region get more funding.

Less than 2 percent of the $87 billion in federal money sent to the Gulf Coast was used for education, the Democrats said.

Mr. Miller said it would cost several billion dollars to properly rebuild schools.

"It's expensive, but it has to be done. There really is no alternative," he said. "We have made a decision as a nation that we are going to rebuild and recover this area. Education is critical to that mission. It can't be done without it."

Meanwhile, school officials from the Gulf Coast testified before the committee, and members heard many of the same complaints.

Officials testified that federal money has been slow to trickle in because of red tape at the state level.

"Today's hearing has highlighted the fact that many local schools have not received one penny in the federal aid we have approved. This is unacceptable," said Rep. Charles Boustany Jr., Louisiana Republican.

Father William F. Maestri, superintendent of Catholic Schools for the Archdiocese of New Orleans, told the committee to consider public-private school partnerships to make the transition easier.

"The old divisions that have too long divided us must be laid aside so we can move forward together," he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Team Visits Iraq, Pushes For Unity Government (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The Bush administration mounted a concerted diplomatic effort to capitalize on the selection of Iraq's new prime minister, sending its two top national-security officials here to push for the completion of a national-unity government and to continue setting the stage for a possible U.S. military withdrawal this year.

The unannounced trips by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice marked the first time two U.S. cabinet officials were in Iraq simultaneously. The visits highlighted the administration's hope that the selection of a new candidate for prime minister could clear the way for a permanent Iraqi government to take power.

Millions of Iraqis voted Dec. 15, but the country's political leaders have spent months squabbling over posts, dissipating the optimism generated by the election and contributing to a worsening cycle of sectarian violence.

Mr. Rumsfeld and Ms. Rice met with prime minister nominee Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, as well as other incoming Iraqi leaders. American officials here and in the U.S. had been instrumental in pressuring interim Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to step down, a step demanded by leaders of Sunni Muslim and ethnic Kurdish groups.

Mr. Jaafari's critics, including U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, had derided him as a weak-willed leader who was unable to prevent Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces from abducting, torturing and, in some cases, assassinating Sunnis suspected of links to the insurgency. They praised Mr. Maliki as a strong leader who understood the importance of forming a broad government of national unity. Mr. Maliki, who had adopted the name Jawad al-Maliki while in exile during the regime of Saddam Hussein, yesterday announced he will go by his birth name, Nouri al-Maliki.

Mr. Maliki's first and most pressing task will be to stamp out sectarian militias. Thousands of Shiite fighters have infiltrated the country's police and security forces, while large and heavily armed militias affiliated with the country's biggest Shiite political parties operate openly across the country.

In nearly all of his recent public remarks, Mr. Maliki has stressed the need to gradually disarm the militias. Iraq's nascent security forces will almost certainly be unable to do so without heavy U.S. military support, however, and Mr. Rumsfeld seemed to rule out such assistance.

In a joint appearance with Ms. Rice, Mr. Rumsfeld said it was a mistake to assume the militias had to be forcibly disarmed. Instead, he said the militia problem required a political solution under which the fighters were peacefully persuaded to lay down arms.

U.S. officials stressed that the purpose of the visits was to give Iraq's political process a high-profile endorsement, but the trips also signaled the White House's hopes that the formation of a permanent new Iraqi government could help reverse weeks of bad news from Iraq that have pushed domestic support for the war to new lows and fueled a continuing decline in Mr. Bush's standing at home.

U.S. officials said the installation of Mr. Maliki and other Iraqi leaders into key cabinet posts could help set the stage for the withdrawal of a substantial portion of the 132,000 American troops in Iraq. Gen. George Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, said the selection of the new government leaders was "a major step in the process."

Gen. Casey has said in the past that a "fairly substantial" drawdown could begin this year if Iraq was able to cobble together a stable coalition government and continue making progress in fielding effective military and paramilitary forces. In the meantime, American commanders on the ground have continued to lay the foundation for a drawdown by turning dozens of smaller military posts over to the Iraqis and consolidating American forces here into a handful of massive military installations.

The U.S. is seeking a new legal agreement with the Iraqi government allowing for the maintenance of a reduced number of American military bases here. The United Nations resolution giving U.S.-led forces formal permission to maintain a military presence in Iraq expires this year. Mr. Rumsfeld said he had opened discussions with Iraqi leaders about a new agreement centered on the future of the remaining U.S. military bases and the continued push to transfer primary security responsibility for many parts of the country to Iraqi troops.

In Iraq, A Joint Show Of Support (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 26 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made an unannounced joint visit to Iraq on Wednesday to bolster the emerging leadership and to suggest that the sometimes disjointed U.S. political and military operations are working seamlessly during the transition to a permanent government.

President Bush -- whose approval ratings have sunk to new lows, in large part because of the war -- secretly directed Rice and Rumsfeld to undertake the unusual mission as soon as the four-month impasse over the selection of Iraqi's prime minister ended last week, officials said. The visit came several weeks after the two secretaries had an unusual public tiff over whether the Bush administration has made mistakes in Iraq.

U.S. officials indicated that they were embracing perhaps the last chance the Bush administration had to turn around public opinion at home and to ensure that Iraq has a viable political future. The administration had previously pointed to the drafting of a constitution and the election of a transitional government as watershed moments in Iraq, even as violence has continued to rage. The new government will last four years and administration officials say they expect it to become increasingly independent of U.S. influence.

Rice said the creation of a permanent government should be seen as a turning point in the war and "an important message to the American people" because "it gives Iraq a real chance to deal with the obviously vexing problems that it has faced."

Rice and Rumsfeld stayed inside the heavily fortified enclave known as the Green Zone during their entire visit. They spent much of the day in meetings with top Iraqi leaders, including the prime minister-designate, Nouri al-Maliki; Rice also held a second late-night one-on-one session with him. Maliki emerged as an unexpected compromise choice to lead Iraq for the next four years and was largely unknown to Washington officials.

During a meal of Sayadieh fish and Arab salads, Rice and Rumsfeld were briefed by Planning Minister Barham Salih on details for putting together the new government. He said that "success depends on our competency," one participant in the meeting said. Iraqi officials also told the visiting Americans that fixing the unstable security in the capital was a key objective.

Earlier, in a meeting at the residence of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, Maliki, speaking in Arabic, told Rice and Rumsfeld that while terrorism was the major problem, his first goal was to address the "mistrust" among religious and ethnic groups, a U.S. official said. Resolving this issue would in turn help reduce the violence. His second priority was making electricity supplies reliable. Three years after the invasion, sporadic electricity continues to be a symbol for many Iraqis of the failure of the U.S. occupation. "The people need electricity," he said.

Maliki and the U.S. visitors also held a lengthy discussion on staffing for government ministries, with Maliki saying the ministers should be "ministers for Iraq," not ministers for Sunni Arabs, Shiite Arabs or Kurds. The Interior Ministry is believed to be infiltrated by Shiite militia groups that are targeting Sunnis, and Maliki said he was looking for technocrats who were competent.

"We wanted to say how important it was that the ministries would be ministries of national unity, just as the government is a government of national unity," Rice said later. "But before we could say that, the leaders said that to us."

Maliki's office announced Wednesday that he would begin to use his birth name, Nouri, rather than Jawad, which he adopted while in exile during Saddam Hussein's rule. He has a long career as a legislator but has never held an executive position. He does not even have a secretary, though he has promised the U.S. Embassy he would hire one this week.

Rice and Rumsfeld also presided over a working lunch of about 30 senior U.S. political and military officials that, in the spirit of a presidential campaign, was listed on Rice's itinerary as: "First 100 days: Government Formation, Security and non-Security Priorities." The lunch did not cover a specific 100-day plan but focused mainly on such issues as helping establish effective ministries.

The State Department and Pentagon earlier this year differed over how to provide security for reconstruction teams in Iraqi provinces, slowing the implementation of plans. The dispute was largely resolved this month, and Rice in recent days has cabled Foreign Service officers to say she has crafted a special incentive program to make tours on the teams more attractive.

"Clearly the new Iraqi government must perform on behalf of the Iraqi people," said Jim Wilkinson, Rice's senior adviser. "But the new government also gives us a chance to correct our mistakes and do our part to make Iraq work.

"This is an opportunity to be seized," he added. "The Iraqis must seize it, but the U.S. government must organize itself to help the Iraqis do so."

Rice, in a trip to Baghdad three weeks ago, personally pushed for transitional Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to give up his nomination to a new term. During a meeting with him Wednesday, however, she and Rumsfeld were "very relaxed," according to Adnan Ali Kadhimi, a Jafari aide. Jafari "appreciated the visit, and he said that no matter what has happened, we still appreciate what America has done for us," Kadhimi said.

Rice and Rumsfeld made no public statements in their meetings with Iraqis, though they jointly met with Iraqi reporters traveling on their aircraft. Earlier this month, Rice said the administration had made possibly "thousands" of "tactical errors," prompting Rumsfeld to declare that anyone making such a statement did not understand the nature of warfare. In Baghdad, Rumsfeld minimized the dispute, saying he "wasn't aware of what she meant," while Rice told Fox News that she and Rumsfeld have "an excellent relationship."

Rice, Rumsfeld Tout New Iraq Government (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

Success in forming a new Iraqi government may let some U.S. troops leave the war zone within months, the top American military commander in Iraq said Wednesday. Paying a surprise visit, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld embraced the country's fledgling leaders as independent and focused on the future.

"I came away most encouraged," Rumsfeld said after he and Rice spent a day meeting with Iraqi politicians and U.S. military and diplomatic advisers in the capital city.

Rice called the priorities and commitment of Iraq's newly selected prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, "refreshing and really heartening."

The double-barreled show of support for Iraq's first permanent democratic government was meant to resonate in Iraq and among Americans, whose frustration with the war effort has helped drive President Bush's poll numbers to new lows.

A four-month political stalemate had sapped support for U.S. involvement in Iraq. The administration remains under election-year pressure from the public and many in Congress to draw down its forces there.

"There is no question but that as the new government is formed and the ministers are in place, that it's appropriate for us to begin discussions with the new government about the conditions on the ground and the pace at which we'll be able to turn over responsibility in the provinces," Rumsfeld said.

Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander, said selection of government leaders marked a major step toward creating conditions that could allow a partial withdrawal.

"I'm still on my general timeline" for a possible withdrawal, he told reporters after meeting with Rumsfeld.

Casey used no figures. There are about 130,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, and military officials have spoken before of their hopes of reducing that number below 100,000 by the end of the year if the insurgency does not grow worse and if Iraq makes continued progress on political and security fronts.

Casey said breakthrough agreements last weekend to name al-Maliki as prime minister and to fill six other top government posts "certainly is a major step in the process" of reducing troop levels this year. He said more must be done on the political side, particularly filling key government ministry jobs.

The Pentagon has not said when it expects to make decisions about further troop reductions. Casey had said late last year that he expected to submit his recommendation this spring.

"We are seeing the situation a little clearer, I'd say," as a result of the latest political progress, Casey said. "And the clearer I see it the better I can make my recommendations."

Bush said last month that U.S. troops would stay in Iraq for years. Administration hopes for a major pullout soon have been tempered by the ongoing insurgency and the increase since February in sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0026893

"I think we're fairly resolved on the military side to understand that this is going to take time," Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told reporters Wednesday. He added that political leaders would make the key decisions about how long U.S. troops remain deployed.

Rice said the United States has an obligation to be ready to do what will best help the emerging Iraqi leadership tackle persistent violence and such grinding problems as petty corruption and poor electricity.

The secrecy surrounding the two leaders' visit and the omnipresent security precautions inside the fortified U.S. government complex underscored the dangers and difficulties the Iraqi leaders inherit.

The trip also came after recent calls by a half-dozen retired generals for Rumsfeld, 73, to resign. Asked by a reporter whether this visit — his 12th — would be his last trip to Iraq as Pentagon chief, an unsmiling Rumsfeld replied, "No."

Rice refused to second-guess the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq more than three years into a war that two-thirds of Americans now say the president is handling badly.

"Have we made mistakes? I'm sure we have," Rice told reporters with Rumsfeld beside her. "In a big historical circumstance like this you're going to do some things well and you're going to do some things not well."

Last month, Rice said the United States had made thousands of tactical errors in Iraq, a remark Rumsfeld said confused him. Their unusual joint appearance was also intended to show the sometimes feuding U.S. diplomatic and military branches engaged side by side.

Al-Maliki was largely unknown outside Iraq before he emerged last week as a compromise candidate to break a four-month political logjam. Neither Rice nor Rumsfeld had met him before Wednesday's session, and Rice met with him a second time privately.

Al-Maliki opposed both Saddam Hussein and the U.S.-led invasion that overthrew the dictator more than three years ago. He has been described as a hardline Shiite partisan and by U.S. officials as an Iraqi patriot who stood up to attempted political meddling by neighboring Iran.

He has a month to form Iraq's first permanent democratic government, and U.S. officials are direct about the high stakes.

"This new Iraqi government must perform on behalf of the Iraqi people, but the new government also gives us a chance to correct our mistakes and do our part to make Iraq work," said Jim Wilkinson, a senior adviser to Rice.

The American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, has said Iraq risks civil war if its political leadership falters.

Rice, Rumsfeld Visit Iraq (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld flew to Iraq yesterday to meet with the prime minister-designate and emphasize the importance of a "nonsectarian" government.

The unprecedented joint visit by the top two Cabinet officials demonstrated Washington's full backing of Nouri al-Maliki, who has been selected to head a new government.

"I came away most encouraged," Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters after he and Miss Rice met with Mr. al-Maliki, who announced yesterday he would use his given name, "Nouri," rather than Jawad, a name he adopted for security reasons while being sought by Saddam Hussein's regime.

"I found him to be very focused and very clear that he understood his role and the role of the new government to really demonstrate that it is a government of national unity," Miss Rice added.

Gen. George Casey, the commander of the U.S.-led coalition forces, said that the agreement on Iraq's top government leaders last week would help create conditions to reduce American troop levels.

Miss Rice said that ministerial appointments should begin with the ministries of interior and defense, so they can take control of security and public order and disband sectarian militias. The ministers, she said, must be nonpartisan and unifying figures.

"I think they understand that the importance of appointing ministers and subordinates who have a reputation for technical competence and a mind-set that is nonsectarian," Miss Rice said of Mr. al-Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and other leaders she and Mr. Rumsfeld met yesterday.

In addition to security and providing "essential services," such as electricity and water, Mr. al-Maliki told his guests that his top priorities include building trust among different ethnic groups, Miss Rice said.

She dismissed the statement by terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, made on a tape posted on the Internet on Tuesday, that Mr. al-Maliki was a U.S. puppet.

"We know that he has not always agreed with us, or we with him, but he's somebody who's always had the interests of the Iraqis at heart," Miss Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0026894

Iraqis voted for parliament on Jan. 30, but the formation of the country's first democratically elected government was delayed for months because Sunnis and Kurds would not support interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's bid to retain his post.

Miss Rice added the Baghdad stop to a trip she's making to the Balkans, while Mr. Rumsfeld flew in from Washington.

Gen. Casey, who has said in the past that he would recommend "fairly substantial" reduction of the 132,000 U.S. forces this year if the insurgency did not worsen and if Iraq made political progress, noted yesterday, "I'm still on my general timeline."

Mr. Rumsfeld said that no one in yesterday's meetings "suggested that there should be lower [troop] levels than currently existed."

In fighting yesterday, U.S. troops backed by a helicopter and jets struck a suspected safe house of foreign insurgents, killing 12 militants and a woman in a raid near the site where an American helicopter crashed, the U.S. military said, according to the Associated Press.

In Baghdad, a bomb ripped through a minibus carrying passengers to their Shi'ite neighborhood, killing four persons, who were among at least 12 Iraqis killed in violence. Police also found 11 bodies dumped in Baghdad and elsewhere, the apparent victims of sectarian killings, the AP reported from Baghdad.

Visit By Rumsfeld, Rice Sets Off Criticism In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Paul Richter, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

Some leaders worry that the Americans' surprise trip could hurt talks on forming a government.

BAGHDAD — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld paid a surprise visit to Baghdad on Wednesday to express support for Iraq's new leaders, but drew criticism from Iraqi politicians who said they feared the unannounced visit might do more harm than good.

"We didn't invite them," said Kamal Saadi, a Shiite legislator close to the new prime minister-designate, Nouri Maliki.

Saadi said Iraqi leaders had not been given advance notice of the visit, which came just days after Iraqi politicians broke through a months-long impasse on the selection of a prime minister.

"Maybe Rumsfeld's visit can be justified" because of American troop presence, "but I can't see a clear reason behind Rice's visit," Saadi said. "The crisis is over and negotiations are taking place."

Since parliamentary elections in December, American officials have pushed Iraqi legislators to form a national unity government. During the nearly four-month delay, the country has been rocked by violence with increasingly sectarian overtones, raising the specter of full-blown civil war.

Iraq's Shiite coalition broke the deadlock last week when it withdrew the nomination of interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari to lead the new government and substituted Maliki, whose nomination was approved Saturday by parliament. (Maliki said this week he was reverting to his original first name, Nouri. He said he had adopted the name Jawad during his time in exile, to protect his family in Iraq.)

During a news conference with Rumsfeld, Rice said that Maliki and others had made it clear in meetings that "Iraqis are taking responsibility for their own future."

"We can be partners. We can support. We can help. But this is Iraq's time and the time for Iraq's newly elected leaders to take on these responsibilities."

Some observers and Iraqi politicians speculated that the visit had more to do with the U.S. domestic audience than the creation of an inclusive and sustainable government in Iraq.

In Washington, the visit was seen as an attempt by the White House to shore up U.S. public opinion about the war and as the first foreign policy calling card of the new chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten.

"I actually think it's completely aimed at American public opinion," said Brian Katulis, Middle East analyst at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "What's going on here is part of Bolten's plan to signal to the American public that we're not staying there forever."

Ivo H. Daalder, a foreign policy analyst at the Brookings Institution, said the visit was "all about us."

"We are trying to demonstrate that there is positive direction. How better to do that than having the chief horses of the State Department and the Defense Department make this joint and dramatic appearance. Every newspaper will quote them as saying this is a new turning point."

Lee Feinstein, a senior fellow with the Council of Foreign Relations in Washington, saw nuances in the White House mission.

"This is an opportunity for Secretary Rice to greet the new prime minister after criticizing Jafari very pointedly in her last visit just three weeks ago," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0026895

In an unusual public display of divisions within the administration, Rice and Rumsfeld traded barbs this month over post-invasion mistakes in Iraq. On Wednesday, Rice sent a more harmonious message about State Department-Pentagon relations.

"We're working very hard together," she said. "We're actually having a great time here in Iraq. I think it's very stimulating for us both to be in these meetings with Iraq's leaders together."

Some Iraqi politicians thought the visit could backfire on the sensitive negotiations. Similar concerns were raised recently about the statements and actions of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and about Rice's April 2 visit with her British counterpart, Jack Straw.

"It would be more appropriate if they would leave us alone," said Mahmoud Othman, a senior Kurdish legislator. "Let us solve our problems by ourselves."

"Enough is enough," said Sheik Mahmoud Sudani, a politician affiliated with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr. "Rice's trip to Iraq at this critical time is just another desperate move by the Americans to try to impose themselves on our new government. But they have lost their influence."

There has been grumbling among some Iraqi officials as U.S. officials pressed them to form a new government and eventually urged Jafari to step aside in the face of opposition from Sunni Arabs, Kurds and secular Shiite Muslims.

The most positive reaction to the visits was among Sunni leaders, who fear their minority will lose political clout in the democratic setup.

Americans can help coordinate and speed the process, "which will benefit everyone," said Azhar Samarrai, a Sunni legislator with the Iraqi Islamic Party.

Rice said U.S. officials were hearing "loud and clear" that the new Iraqi leadership intended to be nonsectarian in its decisions on who should head ministries, particularly Interior and Defense, which oversee police and armed forces respectively.

"I think they understand … the importance of appointing ministers and subordinates who have a reputation for technical competence and a mind-set that is nonsectarian," Rice said.

Meanwhile, another sibling of Sunni Vice President Tariq Hashimi was slain in the country's continuing violence. Gunmen killed Maysoon Hashimi and a bodyguard this morning in Baghdad. Mahmoud Hashimi was shot to death April 13.

Tuesday, a civilian was killed by a roadside bomb near the city of Kirkuk, police said.

In the capital, a bomb on a bus exploded, killing four people and injuring 21.

In a western district of the city, two people were killed and four injured in a roadside bombing aimed at police.

Police also recovered 15 bodies from various Baghdad neighborhoods.

Just north of Baqubah, a roadside bomb exploded in the Shiite village of Kharnabat, killing three people and injuring 10, local police said.

The U.S. military announced that American-led forces killed a dozen suspected rebels during a raid Tuesday in Yousifiya.

GOP Critics Resigned To Life With Rumsfeld (LAT/AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Republican critics of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld are deferring to President Bush's support for the Pentagon chief, mindful that his fate is out of their hands.

But in the aftermath of calls by several retired generals for Rumsfeld's ouster, those GOP lawmakers remain uncomfortable with him. Given the chance, they offer no words of support.

"He still is in the confidence of the president. The president reiterated that the other day, so I'll continue to try to work with him," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said Wednesday.

"There really is only one person he needs to please, and that's the president," added Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. "The president's made clear that the secretary is his choice and that really ends it."

"Is he still here?" joked Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss.

Yes. Should he not be?

"That's up to him and the president. I don't see that his performance has changed," said Lott, who has said he's "not a fan" of Rumsfeld.

Hardly glowing endorsements.

In Baghdad on Wednesday, Rumsfeld was asked by a reporter whether this visit -- his 12th -- would be his last trip to Iraq as Pentagon chief.

"No," responded Rumsfeld.

Last week, Bush used a Rose Garden appearance to declare, "I'm the decider and I decide what's best. And what's best is for Don Rumsfeld to remain as the secretary of defense."

In recent weeks, at least six retired generals have publicly criticized Rumsfeld's handling of the Iraq war and his management style, an extraordinary rebuke of a civilian military leader from uniformed officers who recently served at his behest.

As the White House sought to quell the uproar, Democrats pounced.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Senate Democrat, called for a Senate vote of no confidence on Rumsfeld, and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., sought a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on the matter. She suggested hearing testimony from retired generals -- those who have been critical as well as those with different opinions -- and administration officials.

But neither of those efforts appear to be going anywhere anytime soon, if at all.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada has said Democrats won't push for a no-confidence vote. Some Democrats are privately expressing concern that weighing in on the debate could diminish the power of the retired generals' remarks and invite criticism from Republicans that they are politicizing the war.

On Clinton's request, Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he would consult with his 23 other committee members about whether a hearing is warranted, as he does with every such request. But the Virginia Republican indicated he was in no hurry to hold a hearing. He said the committee schedule was packed through Memorial Day, by which time the uproar over Rumsfeld could further subside.

A congressional hearing would give Rumsfeld's critics a high-profile national platform while keeping alive a controversy the White House wants to put to rest.

Striking a careful balance, Warner issued a statement this week calling the debate among retired generals about Rumsfeld "an important exercise of the right to freedom of speech."

But Warner noted that Bush has decided to retain Rumsfeld in his Cabinet and said: "I support the president's right to make this decision."

Notably missing was praise for Rumsfeld. There wasn't even lukewarm support.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, is urging that Warner hold a hearing. But Levin also suggested he was somewhat indifferent about Rumsfeld's future at the Pentagon's helm.

"If I felt his departure would change policy, I'd be all for it. But I think the policy would stay the same," Levin said.

Other Democrats renewed their calls for Rumsfeld's departure.

"He should have been gone two years ago. There's no more to say," said Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the lead Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Republicans recognize that getting rid of Rumsfeld now, three years into the Iraq war, could signal failure, not to mention give Democrats ammunition for this fall's congressional election as they try to wrest control of the House and Senate from the GOP.

Seeking to counter the mounting criticism and head off a hearing, Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., held a rally-around-Rumsfeld breakfast on Capitol Hill on Tuesday for the secretary and his Republican backers.

Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., was among those who attended. Even though he has clashed with Rumsfeld in the past, Thune said getting rid of Rumsfeld now would hurt the overall effort in Iraq.

"It's the wrong message to send," Thune said.

Plus, he said, Congress' hands are tied even if it wants a fresh face leading the Pentagon for one reason: "He serves at the pleasure of the president."

The Iraqi Oil Pipeline Fiasco (NYT)

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

The Bush administration's promise that Iraq's reconstruction could be paid for with the country's own oil revenues was one of the many false assertions and assurances that ushered in the invasion. But unlike the predictions of weapons of mass destruction and streets filled with cheering Iraqis, this claim might have been at least partly true — if the administration had more carefully supervised the lucrative no-bid oil industry repair contract it awarded to a subsidiary of Halliburton, the firm formerly headed by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Part of that contract involved repairing a crucial pipeline link that American bombing had severed in the course of the invasion. Had the repair been done right the first time, Iraq would have been able to export much more oil from its northern oil fields in the past few years, making it far less dependent on American reconstruction aid, which has amounted to about $30 billion so far.

How this costly and unnecessary failure came about was spelled out by James Glanz in a compelling investigative report in Tuesday's Times. He described the easily avoidable engineering errors that delayed the reopening of the crucial Fatah pipeline link while the contracted funds ran out and the security situation for reconstruction workers deteriorated drastically. It is instructive to recall the circumstances in which Halliburton was awarded this contract just prior to the Iraq invasion — with no competitive bidding. Later, when Democrats in Congress began raising questions, the Pentagon pointed to Halliburton's special expertise in oil-field management and its long experience working under Army Corps of Engineers' supervision.

But neither the expertise nor the supervision were much in evidence on the Fatah repair job. The Halliburton subsidiary managing the project ignored the clear warnings of its own consultants and let the drilling begin without any rigorous testing of the ground it needed to work in, which turned out to be a geological fault zone. As a result, drill bits repeatedly snapped and drill holes kept collapsing. It took an unconscionably long time for the corps to find out about the problems. By then, months had passed and almost all of the roughly $75 million allocated for the project had been spent.

There are crucial lessons to be learned here about the rarely justified practice of awarding no-bid contracts based on presumed special expertise. There are lessons as well for the Corps of Engineers, which is also supervising much of the Katrina rebuilding effort — some of the reconstruction work there is also being done by Halliburton.

On the Fatah pipeline crossing project, American taxpayers got a particularly raw deal. The repair work they originally paid for wasn't done. The government agency that was supposed to supervise the work did not do an effective job. And the oil exports that could have helped pay Iraq's reconstruction bills never made it through the pipeline.

Zarqawi Message: 'I'm Still Here' (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD - After years of operating in Iraq as a shadowy force who was sometimes heard but never seen, the Jordanian-born militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi stepped out of the shadows with a video released on the Internet Tuesday that showed him planning operations against US forces and walking freely about the desert of what was claimed to be Iraq's Anbar Province.

Mr. Zarqawi, whom Iraqi officials blame for dozens of suicide attacks inside Iraq as well as terrorist attacks in his native Jordan, was even at this late date seen as a mythical figure by many Iraqis, a fiction designed to spread fear and put a face on the Sunni Arab insurgents who have spread so much terror here.

"Before, I thought there was no Zarqawi, he was just a fiction. But now I believe in him. He's really out there," says Thalib Jabbar, a businessman in Baghdad. "Zarqawi wants to show his power and frighten people. But in reality, he's the one who should be afraid. We want him dead."

That's a common sentiment among many ordinary Iraqis, one played on by Iraqi officials Wednesday who condemned Zarqawi as a foreigner trying to destroy their country. Their strong response highlights the risk such a video poses for Zarqawi: The effort to show his strength within the insurgency also puts a foreign face on the movement, leaving an opening for his opponents to appeal to national unity.

Yet experts say he remains hugely popular among hard-core insurgents particularly in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province - and point out that the video shows him as calm and in control, despite a massive US manhunt for him.

At its most basic level, analysts say the point of the slickly produced half-hour video was for Zarqawi to say "I'm still here," much like the audiotape released Sunday by Osama bin Laden. US military propaganda and some Iraqi sheikhs have claimed recently that many of Zarqawi's past admirers had turned on him, and that he was on the run.

Most Iraqis, particularly the Shiites and Kurds whom he reviles, view him with loathing. "This terrorist is bombing all of the Iraqis. He never discriminates between any people. Christians, Muslims, women, children," says Mohammed Jemaah, a 24-year-old policeman in Baghdad. "If he was a real man, he would fight like a man, show himself, and not use car bombs."

Zarqawi is shown in the video, claimed to have been made last Friday, strolling among dozens of masked followers, pouring over maps and tactics with masked insurgents said to be from the Anbar city of Ramadi, and in a Rambo-moment emptying round after round from a bulky large-caliber machine gun into the desert.

"He shows himself as healthy and able to walk around outside, surrounded by loyal legions of followers, which counters the rumors that he's afraid, he's running and hiding and has no friends left," says Evan Kohlmann, author of "Al-Qaida's Jihad in Europe" and a terrorism consultant. "There was a lot of speculation that he was out of the picture. And he needed to respond to that, to show that he's still there, still in charge, and there's nothing to stop him from putting together military operations."

Also noteworthy is the ease with which he can get his message out. While analysts speculate it takes weeks for Mr. bin Laden to transmit tapes or other messages to the outside world, Iraq's urban battleground makes logistics for terrorists much easier.

Zarqawi's tape was released less than a day before US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flew into Baghdad for surprise visits designed to show support for Iraq's newly named Prime Minister Jawad al-Maliki. Mr. Maliki, a religious Shiite who fought hard for Islamic law provisions to be included in Iraq's Constitution, told Ms. Rice that his top priority is reducing ethnic and sectarian animosities.

But those old hatreds are precisely what Zarqawi and his followers have been trying to stoke, in the hopes of sparking a full-scale civil war that would destabilize Iraq for years to come and give him what he imagines is his best chance at eventual success.

In his video, the powerful and chipmunk-cheeked Zarqawi said the Iraqi government, "whether made up of the hated Shiites or the secular Zionist Kurds or the collaborators among the Sunnis, will be tools of the crusaders and a poison dagger in the heart of the Islamic nation."

Speculation that Zarqawi's role in the insurgency was weakening has grown since Jan. 15, when a statement posted on insurgent websites announced the formation of the Majilis Shura al-Mujahdin, or the Mujahidin Shura Council (MSC), as an umbrella for Sunni insurgent groups who share Al Qaeda's ideology and goal of turning Iraq into a state governed by Sunni religious law.

Subsequent statements named an Iraqi militant with the nom de guerre of Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi as the group's leader, which some took to mean that Zarqawi had lost stature.

But insurgent sources say the move was mostly to put an Iraqi face on the operations of the self-styled holy warriors, and to counter US claims that foreign fighters, not Iraqis, were leading much of the violence, particularly in the volatile Anbar Province. They say Zarqawi has all along been their most respected operational commander.

The new group also makes it harder for him to be painted as a meddling foreigner, while also giving more face and respect to his Iraqi comrades. Zarqawi's video begins with a full screen shot of the MSC logo, and a smaller version remains on screen for the whole tape.

"It seems pretty clear that he's still the boss," says Mr. Kohlmann. "When the MSC chose to highlight their leadership, guess who's the star? It's an indication that the MSC is a propaganda front."

Kohlmann argues the MSC, which has at least eight member organizations, is sort of like a jihadi NATO.

"When we've got a coalition operation, we go under the NATO flag, because it helps the smaller nations feel they belong, it creates a sense of equality, and that's what the MSC is for: It gives the Iraqi [fighters] the sense that they're in control of their own jihad."

Video Shows Another Side Of Al-Zarqawi (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, April 26, 2006

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's new video marks a shift by the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq toward a less radical image, one that might appeal to the Iraqi insurgency more than the beheadings for which he's become notorious, analysts said Wednesday.

The video released Tuesday, the first by al-Zarqawi that shows his face, features scenes of the black-garbed terrorist firing a gun and hunkered over a map plotting strategy. The Sunni Muslim extremist, 39, looks youthful and healthy in the springtime desert.

"It's a departure from the past. There's no strident anti-Shiite rhetoric and no beheadings," said Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director at the International Crisis Group, based in Amman, Jordan.

"He wants to be a `good' insurgent in a more moderate sense — an Iraqi sense — to appeal to Iraqis," Hiltermann said.

Iraqi government officials, however, condemned the Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi as a foreigner determined to destroy Iraq. They said his promise to launch more attacks may have been in response to the appointment of a new prime minister, a major step toward a unity government including Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds.

"I believe that al-Zarqawi was caught off guard by the new government taking shape because it will be very strong one representing all Iraqis," said Sheik Khalid al-Attiyah, the Iraqi parliament's new first deputy speaker. He added that al-Zarqawi is determined "to inflame a civil war."

"He feels very worried that he's losing popularity inside Iraq," Maysoon al-Damluji, a member of the Iraqi parliament, told CNN. "This is a change of strategy. He feels that he needs to make himself visible more in order to get support."

The video comes at a time when Arabs have voiced distaste for Islamic extremists' tactics such as beheadings and bombings, including deadly hotel attacks in Jordan that caused widespread protests.

"He is often seen as more extreme than even (Osama) bin Laden," said Jeremy Binnie, an analyst with Jane's Terrorism and Insurgency Center in London. "In reality their ideology isn't that different."

DOJ_NMG_0026899

Binnie said the video shows a "softer image" of al-Zarqawi. It suggests he "isn't just the leader of a fanatical band, but a more general-like figure, and also an action man himself."

Al-Zarqawi has done audiotapes, including one in January. But he has kept a relatively low profile since then, when his group merged with five other Iraqi insurgent groups to form the Mujahedeen Shura Council.

The new video was stamped with the logo of the Mujahedeen Shura Council as well as the black flag logo of al-Zarqawi's al-Qaida in Iraq.

Al-Zarqawi has claimed responsibility for some of the bloodiest suicide bombings in Iraq since the 2003 fall of Saddam Hussein and for the beheadings and killings of at least 10 foreign hostages, including three Americans and a Briton.

The last time al-Zarqawi made a video was the 2004 beheading of American Nick Berg. In that one, al-Zarqawi's face was masked.

"He appeared to have a sense of mystique by never showing his face. In choosing to come out of the shadows, he may be changing tack," said London-based security consultant Charles Shoebridge.

Shoebridge, a former counterterrorism officer with London's Metropolitan police and a former British army officer, said the tape suggests al-Zarqawi is working to shore up his position within the insurgency.

Added Hiltermann: "Osama bin Laden is sitting somewhere in a cave, but al-Zarqawi is showing he is carrying out jihad in front of the world."

The tape was posted on the Internet two days after an audiotape of bin Laden appeared on Arab television. However, the al-Zarqawi tape is dated Friday, meaning it was made before bin Laden's was released.

In one scene in the tape, al-Zarqawi is pictured in a flat desert of dried, cracked mud with sprouts of vegetation similar to that in Iraq's western Anbar province. Although his whereabouts can't be definitively discerned, Binnie called it "extremely likely" al-Zarqawi was in Anbar or someplace close to it.

The United States has put a $25 million bounty on his head.

A Dagger To Al-Qaeda (WP)

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

THE APPEARANCE of an al-Qaeda video on the Internet more often than not is a sign of good news in the war on terrorism. Tuesday's posting by Iraqi commander Abu Musab al-Zarqawi is the latest example: The 34-minute show by the newly unhooded extremist is in part a bid for advantage in factional feuding that has curtailed al-Qaeda's visibility and effectiveness. More important, the terrorist acknowledges that the agreement of Iraq's leading Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish parties on the country's first permanent postwar government last week was, as he bluntly put it, "a dagger in the heart." The Zarqawi movement has spent the past several years trying to ignite a sectarian war between Iraq's Sunnis and Shiites; the new "unity" government, if it takes hold, could be the turning point toward defeating that strategy.

Iraq's insurgents and terrorists are a long way from beaten, as the daily toll of killings tragically demonstrates. But the nominee for prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has made an encouraging start. Although he has yet to form a cabinet -- that may take another month -- Mr. Maliki was on Iraqi television Tuesday night appealing for national unity. Though he has been thought of as a relatively uncompromising Shiite partisan, Mr. Maliki promised to appoint nonsectarian ministers and said he believed the participation of "our Sunni brothers" in the government would "dry up the sources" of the insurgency. He appears focused on pragmatic results, saying his top priority after fostering national accord is increasing electricity supplies.

Another sign that this is good news was the appearance in Baghdad yesterday of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. President Bush was said to have ordered them to Iraq to boost the emerging new government and demonstrate the administration's intent "to correct our mistakes and do our part to make Iraq work," as one of Ms. Rice's aides put it. That's a good aim, and Mr. Maliki certainly deserves high-profile support. Still, a lingering question is whether Mr. Rumsfeld and Ms. Rice were in Iraq to revitalize the U.S. mission or to seize on a rare positive moment to inaugurate its retreat.

The administration and U.S. commanders are clearly eager to find reasons to draw down troops from the current total of 132,500 by the fall. Both Mr. Rumsfeld and Gen. George W. Casey Jr. seized on the government breakthrough: "I'm still on my general timeline," Gen. Casey told reporters yesterday. Of course, if U.S. forces can be drawn down without damaging the new government or undermining its ability to fight the insurgency, that will be welcomed by both Americans and Iraqis. But so far Iraq's slow political progress has had no impact on the violence, which has been growing steadily worse. Before welcoming Iraq's new government by pulling out tens of thousands of soldiers, President Bush ought to carefully consider whether that is the best way to achieve the victory he says he seeks.

GIs Kill 13 In Raid On Iraq Safehouse (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, April 26, 2006

U.S. troops backed by a helicopter and jets struck a suspected safehouse of foreign insurgents, killing 12 militants and a woman in a raid near the site where an American helicopter crashed, the U.S. military said Wednesday.

In Baghdad, a bomb ripped through a minibus carrying passengers to their Shiite neighborhood, killing four people, who were among at least 12 Iraqis killed in violence Wednesday. Police also found 11 bodies dumped in Baghdad and elsewhere, the apparent victims of sectarian killings.

The violence came as Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians haggled over forming a new government aimed at stopping the bloodshed.

The new Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, made a show of unity with his Kurdish and Shiite colleagues, calling for Iraq's insurgency to be put down by force.

Al-Hashimi shrugged off a videotape by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in which the al-Qaida in Iraq leader tried to rally Sunni Arabs to fight the new government and denounced Sunnis who cooperate with it as "agents" of the Americans.

"I say, yes, we're agents. We're agents for Islam, for the oppressed. We have to defend the future of our people," al-Hashimi said at a news conference with President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, and his fellow vice president, Shiite Adil Abdul-Mahdi.

"We believe that Iraq's interest now is to normalize the situation and maintain stability, as well as to impose security and peace by force," he said.

The three spoke after meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rica and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who made an unannounced visit to Iraq for talks on the new government.

U.S. officials are hoping Sunni participation in a national unity government led by Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will undermine the Sunni-led insurgency as well as reduce Shiite-Sunni violence that has flared in the past two months.

Coalition forces hit the suspected safehouse Tuesday in Youssifiyah, 12 miles south of Baghdad, near where a U.S. Apache helicopter crashed April 1. The U.S. command said the helicopter was believed to have been shot down.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council, purportedly a new umbrella organization that includes al-Qaida in Iraq and smaller insurgent groups, claimed responsibility for that attack, and Al-Jazeera TV aired footage provided by the insurgents which they claimed showed parts of the wreckage.

The U.S. military did not say whether the suspected militants killed in the raid were believed to have been involved in the helicopter crash. The area is part of the infamous "triangle of death" and scene of numerous ambushes against U.S. and Iraqi troops, foreigners and Shiite civilians.

According to the U.S. statement, intelligence led coalition forces to the safe house, and when they reached it they came under direct fire.

The soldiers fought back with the support of a coalition helicopter and jets, killing five militants outside the safe house, including one armed with a shoulder-fired rocket, and destroying the building, the U.S. military statement said.

A search of the wreckage found the bodies of seven heavily armed insurgents and an unidentified woman, the military said.

The troops also discovered suicide notes on one of the militants, explosives vests used by suicide bombers, hand grenades and ammunition, the statement said.

In Baghdad on Wednesday, a bomb exploded aboard a minibus, killing four Iraqi passengers and wounding two, police said. The bomb, hidden in a shopping bag, exploded as the minibus was driving from the center of the capital to a Shiite neighborhood, said police Maj. Mahir Hamad.

Such privately owned minibuses are frequently used as public transport in the capital.

The bodies of five Iraqis who had been kidnapped and killed were found in Baghdad, and six bodies were discovered in Karbala, 50 miles south of the Iraqi capital, police said. All the Karbala victims had been shot in the right eye, said police.

In southwest Baghdad, police received a tip that two men were traveling in the area with explosives hidden beneath their clothes, said police Capt. Jamil Hussein. After a brief gunbattle, the explosives detonated, killing both men, he said.

In other violence, five roadside bombs, two mortars and an attack by gunmen killed two Iraqis and wounded 17, six of them policemen, authorities said.

A string of shootings in Baghdad on Wednesday evening killed six more Iraqis — including a Sunni cleric and an army officer whose home was stormed by gunmen.

That raised to 108 the number of Iraqi civilians or police who have been killed in insurgency- or sectarian-related violence since al-Maliki was tapped as Iraq's prime minister designate on Saturday and asked to form a national unity government.

Iraqis Building Makeshift Roadblocks (AP)

By Antonio Castaneda

DOJ_NMG_0026901

AP, April 26, 2006

They're set up on roads all around the Iraqi capital, sometimes rusty car skeletons, washing machines or home appliances piled together, sometimes piles of garbage or dirt. Often a gunman or two keeps watch for any strangers.

Desperate to protect their homes from sectarian violence, Baghdad's residents have turned to makeshift roadblocks. In some areas, the majority of streets are blocked off or protected by homemade barriers that slow traffic.

Some barriers have been in place for over a year in both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods. But many more have appeared since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra that ignited a wave of sectarian violence and left the country struggling to defuse another crisis.

"They increased twofold after Samarra," said 1st Lt. Brian Murphy of Eastchester, N.Y., assigned to the 8th Squadron, 10th Cavalry Regiment, 4th Infantry Division. "They're everywhere, in Shiite neighborhoods, Sunni ones."

Some of the barriers are sophisticated, built in curved "serpentine" shapes that allow traffic to pass at a reduced speed. Residents said this would allow them to fire back at roaming militants trying to gun down pedestrians.

Gunmen "would be surrounded if they did anything. We would be happy if we could have more" road barriers, said Sheik Nassar Khazal, a neighborhood leader in a cluster of apartment buildings in the religiously mixed neighborhood of Dora in south Baghdad.

As he spoke, two neighborhood guards dressed in black quietly watched a passing U.S. patrol. U.S. soldiers have received reports that some of the guards are Shiite militiamen led by radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whom Sunni leaders accuse of instigating much of the sectarian violence.

But some of the guards were thought to be Iraqis simply trying to protect their families as Iraqi troops remain overwhelmed by the insurgency. U.S. soldiers said some guards would quickly throw down their weapons as U.S. patrols approached, while other lookouts would keep their AK-47s in nearby homes.

In the wave of violence that has struck everything from elementary schools to marketplaces, the barriers have sprouted up around nearly every facility that could be a target.

"A lot of times they'll put them up in defense of their mosques or schools, or to slow down a (car bomb)," said 1st Lt. Chuck Williams of Laurel, Miss., assigned to the 2nd Battalion, 506th Regimental Combat Team, 101st Airborne Division. Some mosques in the area that Williams patrolled also had sandbagged rooftop positions.

American soldiers complained the barriers also had the unintended consequence of slowing down U.S. vehicles trying to catch insurgents or those responsible for sectarian killings.

As U.S. soldiers picked up concertina wire along a street and told bystanders not to build any more barriers, one resident responded: "We want to protect our areas from Sunnis." Graffiti threatening Shiite residents was all along the street.

"Well, tell them it doesn't allow us to protect them. It takes forever to weave through this," said Sgt. Nolan Dawson of Boise, Idaho, speaking to an Iraqi interpreter. "They don't understand."

Some soldiers, however, sympathized with residents.

"If you're not from the area and you're looking to start trouble, you might look at the barriers and figure everyone is watching," said Murphy.

Many residents gave much thought to the barriers, unpredictably moving them around to confuse possible attackers — a tactic apparently adopted from U.S. soldiers who guard bases and outposts.

"Tonight there are no barriers (on this street). But tomorrow another patrol may come by and they'll have to zigzag through here," said Sgt. 1st Class Charles Ilaoa of Tafuna, American Samoa, assigned to the 8th Squadron.

In some poorer Shiite slums, the barriers were simple mounds of rubbish piled four feet high. Elsewhere, large concrete barriers — the type that surround U.S. bases — were lined up on the roads. Soldiers said Iraqi police and paramilitary commandos had even helped residents put some in place.

"You know people want to keep people away when they use the washing machines," said Ilaoa.

For now, residents said the barriers were here to stay, or at least until they felt safe again in front of their own homes.

"Some strangers' vehicles come into our neighborhood and do crimes, so we put this here," explained Hassan Iman Hashem, a smiling Shiite man who used dirt and concrete blocks to cut off the road in front of his home. His children milled around the barrier as they watched a U.S. Humvee climb around the mound.

Behind The Chaotic Battle Lines In Iraq (TIME)

By Micahel Ware

Time, April 26, 2006

When Baghdad's notorious Adhamiya district exploded in vicious gun battles last week, few were really surprised. The area, rich with former army, intelligence and secret police officers from Saddam's regime, had been trumpeted by the U.S.

military as a former insurgent hot spot brought under control — a success story in the effort to hand over more of the responsibilities for keeping order to the Iraqis. Yet most on the ground knew that beneath the suburb's surface, trouble still brewed. U.S. military intelligence believed the town was still being used by the Ba'ath insurgents as a command headquarters and logistics base, and American officers suspected that Iraqi commanders they're allied with had struck an accord with the guerrilla leadership, promising not to interfere as long as their troops were not attacked.

But all that came apart in the early hours of April 17 when a two-day firefight between local insurgents on one side and Iraqi soldiers and American GIs on the other broke out. Though the encounter was minimized by top U.S. military officials, the battle appears to have been a more serious outbreak of sectarian violence, between well-organized units of the insurgency and what military sources suspect was a Shi'ite death squad linked to the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

The basic facts of the battle are not in dispute. Some time between 1 a.m. and 3 a.m. on April 17 a well-known Iraqi army checkpoint at a prominent Adhamiya intersection came under intense fire from insurgent forces in the town. Other Iraqi units responded and a blazing battle ensued. American advisors from a Military Transition Team (MiTT) with the 101st Airborne, embedded within the battalion under attack, were called out and were soon fighting for their lives. A coalition quick-reaction force was summoned.

Though the severity of the battle was played down by official U.S. military spokesmen, officers on the ground tell a different story. "It lasted for about seven hours after we arrived, so the enemy was pretty determined. They did not just fade away," says the MiTT team chief Major Chuck Markos, whose men were hit with flurries of rocket propelled grenades and small arms fire. "It was significant." The exchanges lasted until shortly before lunch. By mid-day, the district was boarded up, bereft of traffic or life, but quiet. The next morning at about 6 a.m., hostilities started again, with several more hours of fighting before quiet finally returned. By week's end, the scene was tense but trouble free. Cars are back on the street, but many shops remain closed.

The question is exactly what triggered this battle and who fought it. Sunni community leaders claim that local residents grabbed whatever weapons they had to defend their homes from a sectarian attack by Shi'ite militias in government uniforms. They say night guards, akin to an armed neighborhood watch, fired back at roaming gunmen strafing them as they stood watch. However, American officers say the men they ended up fighting weren't mere homeowners. They used the fire and movement techniques of trained soldiers. "These guys who stood and fought were not just neighborhood types," says Markos, a steely artillery officer from Chattanooga, Tenn. Intelligence officer Capt. Joshua Brandon notes that "a lot of [insurgent] command and logistics comes out of here" and that, along with posters for the locals who died in the fight, "we see lists of martyrs who were not local residents."

One of those insurgent fighters confirmed these suspicions in a clandestine interview with TIME. Abu Marwan, an insurgent footsoldier from the Ansar al-Sunnah network, said that once the fighting broke out, his cell, along with those from other guerrilla groups, was brought in from surrounding quarters as reinforcements. Adhamiya is a safe haven for any number of anti-American organizations, which share intelligence and weapons and coordinate their activities. According to insurgent sources, the groups agreed that only sparing attacks would be launched locally so as not to attract U.S. attention. American brigade commander Col. Thomas Vail says the district's concentration of working poor made it easy for insurgents to hide. "It was easy sanctuary," he says.

Abu Marwan and his cell arrived in the afternoon of the first day's fighting, he says, but there was a lull while they waited for a counterattack that night. His job was to help defend the Abu Hanifa mosque, he says, and when combat resumed the next morning that's what he did. "We heard they were coming," he says of the Iraqi troops, "so we took our positions and started shooting at them from near the mosque. We used PKC [machine guns], RPGs, grenades, everything." The men of the 101st Airborne's MiTT have no reason to doubt him. A U.S. soldier told TIME days later of how RPG rounds had whizzed past his humvee, with one sliding right under it.

Though the insurgents admit to attacking the checkpoint identified by the Americans as ground zero, they claim they did not start the battle. Local clerics, municipal officials, community leaders and the insurgents themselves all say the hostilities were started by a raid from a "death squad" backed by the Ministry of Interior (MOI) — carloads of men in MOI uniforms and irregular forces in civilian clothes who entered Adhamiya after passed through the Iraqi army checkpoints. Indeed, sources within one prominent Shi'ite militia say their men were part of the Adhamiya raid, which was targeting top insurgent leaders holed up in a building. A report prepared by the local council for the Iraqi army claims the men arrived in police and civilian cars and that another group of men in military uniforms attacked from a second direction. The report claims it took 90 minutes before the army units stationed in the area intervened. By then the battle was in full fury, and it was left for the American and Iraqi soldiers to bear the onslaught.

The death squad claims are not far-fetched. Maj. Markos told TIME his men have previously "encountered unauthorized MOI elements" in Adhamiya conducting illegal "snatch and grab type activities." He says, "The bottom line is I can't tell you definitely [what started last week's battle]. But nothing is black and white here and I would be lying to say the MOI is never here."

He adds, "We're definitely going to look into" the charges of death-squad involvement. Intelligence officer Brandon admits the fusion of legitimate government forces with militia is a problem. "So many players are tied to the government and to armed militias, and a lot of the time the interests overlap," he says. Major General Rick Lynch sums it up: "We don't know what happened yet." With the Iraqis set to assume more control of the war, and with newly anointed Prime Minister Jawad al-Maliki calling for more militias to be integrated into government forces, the murky battle at Adhamiya could be a harbinger of more troubles to come.

Army Plans To Charge Abu Ghraib Officer (AP-Y2)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP2, April 26, 2006

The Army is planning to charge a colonel with criminal offenses in connection with the abuse of prisoners at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, officials said Wednesday.

Formal charges are expected next week against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, which would make him the highest-ranking officer charged in the case, three defense officials said. They spoke only on condition of anonymity because Jordan had not yet been charged. They did not say specifically what the charges might be.

The abuse scandal broke in April 2004 when pictures of prisoner abuse were leaked to the news media. Prisoners had been beaten, sexually humiliated and forced to assume painful positions while being photographed.

Publication of the photos led to condemnation worldwide and triggered months of investigations, recriminations and a re-examination of U.S. policy on prisoners.

In Wednesday editions, The New York Times and The Washington Post quoted Jordan's former attorney Samuel Spitzberg as saying he expected the charges as early as this week. The lawyer said Jordan, a reservist who has remained on active duty for three years, is currently stationed in the Washington area.

Army spokesman Col. Joseph Curtin told The Associated Press on Tuesday that Jordan had not been charged. After any charges, the next step would be a preliminary hearing to determine whether a court-martial or other action was warranted.

Nearly a dozen soldiers have been convicted in connection with Abu Ghraib, many of them contending they were following orders aimed at preparing prisoners for interrogation. The U.S. military has also opened at least 400 investigations of prisoner abuse allegations.

Meanwhile, human rights groups said Wednesday that allegations of detainee abuse, torture and killings have now implicated at least 600 U.S. military and civilian personnel deployed to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as to the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, prison for terrorist suspects.

Those findings counter the Pentagon's assertion that Abu Ghraib was an aberration, according to a report compiled by the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights Watch and Human Rights First.

"Two years ago, U.S. officials said the abuses at Abu Ghraib were aberrations and that people who abused detainees would be brought to justice," said Meg Satterthwaite, a professor at the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice at New York University Law School.

"Our research shows that detainee abuses were widespread ... and few people have truly been brought to justice," she said in a statement.

In response to similar criticism over the past two years, Pentagon officials have defended the Defense Department's response to the Abu Ghraib abuse, calling it one of the most closely scrutinized matters in the history of the military.

The groups said they researched and analyzed tens of thousands of pages of government documents, interviews with witnesses and victims and previous Pentagon probes into the abuse.

"We've seen a series of halfhearted investigations and slaps on the wrist," said Tom Malinowski of Human Rights Watch. "The government seems more interested in managing the detainee abuse scandal than in addressing the underlying problems that caused it."

Hundreds Of Detainees Abused, Report Finds (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Three human rights groups said Wednesday that they had found credible evidence that U.S. troops and government civilians in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had abused, tortured or killed at least 460 detainees.

The researchers said they had found 330 cases of abuse and that only about half of them had been fully investigated, and one-third never were investigated or remained unresolved. The findings are in a report by New York University's Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch.

DOJ_NMG_0026904

At least 600 U.S. service members or civilians have been implicated in the cases of abuse. About 400 of them have been investigated, and only one-third of those who have been investigated have faced punishment of any kind, researchers said.

Also Wednesday, Army officials confirmed that criminal charges were being considered against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan for his role in the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Col. Joe Curtin, an Army spokesman, said no decision had been made.

Jordan is the former head of the interrogation center at Abu Ghraib. If he's charged, he would be the highest-ranking officer charged in a case of detainee abuse.

The report by the human rights groups is the first full independent accounting of credible allegations of torture and abuse at American detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, according to the researchers.

It shows that detainee abuse has been more widespread that government officials have admitted and the American military and other government agencies have made only limited attempts to investigate and punish those responsible, the rights groups charged.

"Our findings show that the abuses and torture revealed in the Abu Ghraib photos were not the isolated acts of individual soldiers," said Meg Satterwhite, the faculty director of the Center for Human Rights and Global Justice.

The Pentagon wouldn't address specific findings in the report. A spokesman said the Defense Department had investigated more than 600 allegations of abuse and had held more than 250 service members responsible.

Of the 12 major reviews of U.S. military detention operations that have been conducted, "none of them found that the department directed, sanctioned, encouraged or condoned abuse," said Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman.

"When there have been allegations of wrongdoing, they are taken seriously, investigated thoroughly and individuals are held accountable when appropriate," he said.

Tom Malinowski, the Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, said recent interviews with troops suggested that detainee abuse was less widespread than it was two years ago. But he and other researchers said civilian and military leaders needed to send a strong message that abuse wouldn't be tolerated and would be punished.

The 27-page report was based primarily on government documents, interviews with witnesses and victims, military investigation reports, court documents, detainee accounts provided by attorneys, official military statements and news accounts.

It said the alleged abuses included assault, humiliation, sexual assault or abuse, and stress techniques.

According to the report:

-Fifty-four military service members have been convicted by courts-martial in prisoner abuse cases. Of these, 40 were sentenced to prison time. The average sentence was four months. Ten of those sentenced received terms of more than a year.

More important, according to the researchers, only three officers have been convicted by courts-martial for detainee abuse. The highest-ranking was a major. No officers have been held accountable for any criminal acts committed by troops under their command.

-Of the 20 civilians referred to the Justice Department for criminal prosecution in cases of abuse, only one - a contractor - has been indicted.

-Most of the punishments meted out have been administrative, such as reduction of rank, fines or temporary confinement to base.

The researchers charged that their findings illustrated a lack of accountability over detainee abuse throughout the military and the civilian chain of command.

Danger Attaches To Sunni Names (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Zaid Sabah

USA Today, April 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Omar Ali al-Dulaimi had always been proud of his first name. It's a strong, Sunni-sounding name that honors a seventh-century caliph and revered figure in Sunni Muslim history.

Last week, however, he paid $60 to get a fake ID card and become “Mohammed.” Lately, it's too dangerous to sound Sunni, he says.

“It's a form of stolen freedom,” says al-Dulaimi, 34, a mobile phone sales representative who lives in Baghdad with his wife and two young children. “But we need to be cautious. Each day I go to work, my family doesn't know if I'll return.”

Iraqis in Baghdad named Omar or Othman — two of the most recognizable names identified with Sunni Islam — are getting fake IDs, changing their names legally in court, even teaching their young children to say more neutral-sounding names if asked, al-Dulaimi says.

Some names, such as Ali, Mohammed and Ahmed, are common among both Sunnis and Shiite Muslims. But Omar and Othman are linked mostly with Sunnis.

The rush to mask identities underscores the increased sectarian tensions in Iraq since February's bombing of a sacred Shiite mosque in Samarra. The attack led to reprisals by Shiite gunmen and continuing violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

Bullet-ridden bodies are regularly found around Baghdad. Some are victims of sectarian killings. Hussam al-Jubouri, a human rights officer with the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party, says his office has counted 544 Sunnis killed since the bombing Feb. 22. Those numbers could not be independently verified.

"Many of them were named Omar, and others were killed because of their Sunni tribal names," he says. "Every day, there are 10 to 15 Sunnis killed."

Ali al-Obeidi had long been known to clients and friends as "Abu Omar," or "Father of Omar." It is common among Iraqis to take the name of one's eldest son in this fashion. But shortly after the shrine attack in Samarra, customers at his money-exchange shop in Baghdad's al-Khadra neighborhood stopped calling him Abu Omar. His 13-year-old son, Omar, was taunted at school for his name, al-Obeidi says.

He got scared after reading about Sunnis being targeted for their names, he says. So he took his son to the registry office downtown and had his name legally changed from Omar to the more neutral-sounding Samir.

"These problems did not exist before, but they will continue for years," al-Obeidi says. "I just needed to protect my son from future sectarian threats."

Gen. Ali Ghaleb, deputy interior minister for police affairs, acknowledges that some people are targeted because of their names and says it is not surprising that people would want to conceal their identities. "A human being has the right to protect himself by all means," he says. "Even our officers don't always carry their police IDs on them to protect themselves."

Omar and Othman represent two of the most revered figures in Sunni history: Omar Bin Al-Khattab and Othman Bin Affan, seventh-century caliphs revered by Sunnis but considered illegitimate by many Shiites.

Sunni Arabs represent about 20% of Iraq's 26 million people, but they have long dominated Iraq's ruling class. Shiites, about 60% of the population, were oppressed under Saddam Hussein, particularly after the Gulf War of 1991 when Kurds and Shiites unsuccessfully rose up against the regime.

In Baghdad and other parts of Iraq, secular Shiites and Sunnis have lived together for years. Some tribes or extended families have both Sunni and Shiite branches.

Al-Dulaimi says he first noticed targeted killings of Sunnis and Shiites last summer, about the time Shiites gained control of the Interior Ministry, which handles internal security. In July, his cousin, also a Sunni, was arrested in a raid in Baghdad's predominantly Sunni Adamiyah neighborhood and was never seen again, al-Dulaimi says.

After the Samarra bombing, the violence intensified. Shortly after the attack, he says, he and a friend were stopped at a police checkpoint in southwestern Baghdad on their way to work and made to show their identity cards. Commenting on their names and neighborhoods, the officers forced them out of their car and searched it for weapons, al-Dulaimi says. Though they had taken that route many times, they had never been searched or questioned, he says.

They were released, al-Dulaimi says, but he made up his mind to change his name. Many of his friends are doing the same, he says.

He says he doesn't expect improvement with the new government. "They've already planted the seeds of sectarian violence," he says. "It could never go back to how it was."

Six-Nation Bloc Plans Anti-Terror Maneuvers (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

BEIJING, April 26 -- China, Russia and four Central Asian nations announced Wednesday that they will hold joint anti-terrorism exercises next year, emphasizing a desire to balance U.S. military influence in Asia with stepped-up preparations of their own.

The regional security grouping, known as the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, includes Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. Its activities have centered mainly on guarding against cross-border threats to internal stability, particularly from militant Islamic groups.

Guo Boxiong, vice chairman of the Chinese Communist Party's Central Military Commission, said the plans for joint drills demonstrate the group's growing role in maintaining security in the region, the official New China News Agency said. He vowed that defense ministers from the six nations will work together to combat what China calls the "three forces" -- separatism, terrorism and extremism -- that threaten to provoke unrest in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0026906

In a communique, the six nations said next year's exercises will be held in Russia. They did not detail what activities were planned. But the Russian defense minister, Sergei Ivanov, told reporters here that the exercises will be designed by a group of military and anti-terrorism experts to enhance regional security coordination and are not aimed at any third country.

In China's case, the threat has mainly come from Uighur separatists in the heavily Muslim Xinjiang autonomous region of western China. Through common Turkic languages and history, the estimated 8 million Uighur people have maintained ties to their Central Asian neighbors even as the region increasingly is populated by China's Han majority. As a result, Beijing is eager to cultivate influence with the governments of those nations, lest Uighur militants find support and encouragement from across the borders.

China also has a growing stake in maintaining a stable environment in Central Asia, which is a source of oil and gas for the energy-hungry Chinese economy. Although Russia traditionally has played a leading role in the region -- the nations of Central Asia were Soviet satellites -- Chinese diplomacy and trade have established a significant presence in recent years. The Shanghai Cooperation Organization was formally organized in 2001 under Chinese leadership.

The first joint anti-terrorism maneuvers by the group were held in 2003, although Uzbekistan did not participate. They included some exercises in the Xinjiang region.

Separately, China and Russia held bilateral military exercises last August. They were billed as a drill against ethnic unrest but also were interpreted as a demonstration that Beijing and Moscow want the United States to understand it is not the only guarantor of security in the region despite its dominant role since World War II.

Army Moving To Secure Data At Afghan Base (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

After reports of thefts, the chief of staff says troops are being trained in the proper use and protection of computer memory drives.

WASHINGTON — The Army's chief of staff said Wednesday that he was frustrated by security lapses at Bagram air base in Afghanistan that led to the loss of potentially sensitive data, and that the military must learn how to be more careful with new technology.

Weeks after revelations that flash drives carrying sensitive and classified information have turned up for sale in a bazaar outside Bagram, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said the Army was trying to improve how soldiers used and secured flash drives.

"We have been working hard to educate the force to develop policies to make sure everyone understands what the vulnerabilities are," he said.

A market for used computer memory drives has sprung up outside the Bagram base. On April 10, The Times reported that drives being sold at a marketplace just outside the base gate contained documents and files labeled as secret. Although some of the information had been deleted, it was easily reconstructed with software available on the Internet.

Documents on some of the drives appeared to contain the names, photographs and telephone numbers of Afghan informants aiding U.S. forces.

After the disclosure, the military began a criminal investigation and tightened security at the base. But last weekend, more drives with sensitive data were again being sold at the Bagram bazaar. One smuggler told The Times that he sold four memory drives to a local shopkeeper after a shift change Sunday afternoon.

At the request of military officials, The Times on Wednesday returned the flash drives it had purchased at the Bagram bazaar.

U.S. military officials have been vague about the steps they are taking to improve security practices in Afghanistan and throughout the armed forces.

The military is "making all attempts to protect the identities of people who are helping us to defeat the enemy," Col. Thomas Collins, a spokesman for the U.S. military in Afghanistan, wrote in an e-mail.

Collins and other officers familiar with the situation in Bagram said they believed the security improvements made after the first disclosures of stolen drives were working.

Schoomaker's comments came as members of Congress said this week that they wanted to learn more about what commanders were doing to stop the security lapses. Sen. Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said it was disconcerting to learn information was still being stolen, even after the original security crackdown by the military.

"I have to be concerned," he said. "It seems that materials of varying degrees of sensitivity are being pilfered from the base and sold in the markets of Bagram."

DOJ_NMG_0026907

Lawmakers say they are having difficulty assessing the extent of potential damage from the sale of the drives from Bagram, which houses a detention and interrogation center for terrorism suspects flown in from around the world.

Reed said he was waiting to hear more from the military about the steps officials were taking to protect Afghans who had been aiding U.S. forces.

Rep. Vic Snyder (D-Ark.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said the thefts had shown the Army one of the "perils of modern warfare."

"The more you are dependent on computers, the more you are at risk of some of the hazards of computers," he said. "You can really have a lot of stuff walk off in something just 3 inches by an inch [long]."

Flash memory drives, also called thumb drives or jump drives, are as common in the military as they are in civilian life. Soldiers are supposed to treat drives that hold classified information as sensitively as a file folder marked "top secret."

Last year, the Army formed an organization called the OpSec Support Element, which has been assigned to renew attention on security. Army officials said that Schoomaker had begun pushing for a new emphasis on operational security, particularly with electronic data.

Speaking at a breakfast meeting of defense writers on Wednesday, Schoomaker said it was not realistic to stop using technology such as flash drives.

"Cellphones, cellphones that take pictures, all of this stuff including things like thumb drives and flash drives, these are great innovations," he said. "But they have tremendous liabilities."

The general, who is known for occasional folksy metaphors, suggested the military must learn to be more careful with what it puts on the drives, and where the drives are left. "You don't put the family cat," he said, "into the microwave."

Reed, who visited Afghanistan in January, said the military was trying to balance security with economic development. Keeping Afghans off the base would cut them off from an important source of jobs, he said. Nevertheless, Reed said the command needed to find a way to prevent loss of military secrets.

"You have this impetus to employ indigenous workers," Reed said. "But then you have the problem if some of them are engaging in theft. That poses a dilemma. And that is the situation we face right now."

Suit Claims Illegal Use Of Recruitment Database (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- The Defense Department is violating the privacy of millions of high school students nationwide with a detailed database it uses for military recruitment, a federal lawsuit filed Monday claims.

The New York Civil Liberties Union sued on behalf of six high schoolers, saying the department is ignoring privacy rules set by Congress regarding the collection and distribution of students' personal information.

Military officials have said they have about 30 million names in the database. The Pentagon said last year the list includes high school students ages 16-18 and college students, and includes such information as the students' Social Security numbers, gender and race.

Hope Reichbach, a 17-year-old senior at Hunter College High School in Manhattan and a plaintiff, said she contacted the NYCLU after she had tried unsuccessfully to get her name removed from lists and databases that she said subjected her to repeated phone calls from military recruiters.

"I want them to leave me and other students alone," Reichbach said.

The department is flouting a 1982 military recruitment law that specifies that it refrain from collecting information on students under 17, that it store the information for no more than three years and that the information be kept private, the lawsuit said.

The current database includes information on 16-year-olds, is storing the information for five years and is being shared with law enforcement and other agencies, the lawsuit said.

Megan Gaffney, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office, declined to comment on the lawsuit Monday.

The plaintiffs are six 16- and 17-year-old students who don't know if they are included in the database, but who object to it, lawyers said.

"Our clients don't wish to join the military," said Corey Stoughton, an NYCLU attorney. "And they don't want their genders, ethnicities and social security numbers collected and distributed."

Gang Activity Brings Attorney General To Tampa (TAMPTRIB)

By Anthony McCartney

Tampa Tribune, April 27, 2006

TAMPA â€“ Saying gangs represent a threat to the â€œAmerican dream,â€ U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced a $2.5 million grant to combat the spread of gangs in Hillsborough County.

Gonzales spent about half a day in Tampa and Hillsborough County, touring the site of a suspected gang shooting that killed two people in February and the shooting of a deputy with a BB gun days later.

But Gonzalesâ€™ tour of Tampa and northwest Hillsborough County touched on numerous other topics, including opportunity, education and immigration.

He spoke to a group of students at Leto High School, who he said were curious about his security detail, immigration and whether he had any presidential ambitions. (He didnâ€™t indicate any to a group of reporters later.)

During the session, Gonzales said he sought to draw parallels between the studentsâ€™ lives and his own. â€œTheir high school looked like my high school,â€ he said.

Gonzales acknowledged that the Tampa Bay area is not a hub of gang activity that other cities awarded the grant are, but said even one gang member poses a threat to the community.

â€œOne gang member represents a productive member of society â€¦ who may be lost,â€ Gonzales said.

He said the county presented the Department of Justice a thorough and â€œâ€ well-thought-out planâ€ that would prevent further gang encroachment.

The other areas awarded Justice Department grants were Los Angeles, Dallas-Forth Worth, Milwaukee, Cleveland and a corridor that stretches from Easton to Lancaster, Pa.

Gonzales said the $2.5 million would be divided this way: $1 million for education programs, $1 million for enforcement and $500,000 to try to prevent suspected gang members who are arrested or convicted from returning to a life of crime.

US Attorney General Says Tampa Will Get Money To Combat Gang Activity (WUSF)

By VALERIE INGRAM

WUSF AM , Tampa, April 27, 2006

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales TAMPA (2006-04-26) Tampa is one of six U.S. cities receiving a $2.5-million grant from the Department of Justice. Earlier this year two former Leto High School students were killed during a gang related gun battle in Town and Country.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales visited the school and spoke with students like 17 year old Saed El-Hadri.

SAED: He talked about gang related things around our neighborhood and how we needed to stay in school and don't be associated with gangs cause you won't go notwhere in life.

Gonzales also met with local law enforcement and community leaders.

GONZALES: My general impression is that people understand that they want to focus on this as an issue and they've developed a good plan to deal with it, so I'm optimistic that working together we'll see success here in dealing with this issue.

He says the anti gang grant will be used on education, law enforcement and community re-integration programs for former felons.

Heaton Picked For U.S. Attorney (SSJR)

By BERNARD SCHOENBURG, POLITICAL WRITER

Springfield (IL) State Journal-Register, April 27, 2006

Bush sticks with interim holder of the position

Rodger Heaton, interim U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, is President Bush's choice to continue as the top prosecutor in the region, The State Journal-Register has learned.

"The White House has made the decision," according to a local Republican source.

Copley News Service reported last week that the three people whose names had been forwarded to the White House by House Speaker Dennis Hastert and GOP congressional colleagues were: Heaton; Darin LaHood, the son of U.S. Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Peoria; and John Michelich, an Auburn native who works for the U.S. Department of Justice.

A White House spokesman said Tuesday that no decision on the prosecutor has been announced. Senate confirmation is required.

The U.S. attorney for the 46-county central region oversees prosecution of federal crimes in the area.

Sharon Paul, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield, said Heaton considers it a privilege to be serving in his current position. He is "hopeful he'll be nominated, but as yet he hasn't been notified of any decision," she said Tuesday.

Heaton, 46, was appointed to the interim post as of Dec. 1 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Heaton replaced U.S. Attorney Jan Paul Miller, who took a job with a St. Louis law firm.

Heaton began his career as a federal prosecutor in Indianapolis in 1989 before transferring to the U.S. attorney's office in central Illinois. He was an assistant U.S. attorney from July 1990 to December 2000. From January 2001 to April 2003, he was a litigation partner with Kirkland & Ellis in Chicago. He returned to the federal prosecutor's office in May 2003 as chief of the civil division.

From September 1997 to July 1998, he was assigned to help independent counsel Kenneth Starr in the Whitewater investigation. In that capacity, he handled the tax-evasion prosecution of former Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker, who resigned his office.

Also in 1997, Heaton was a prosecutor in the case of Management Services of Illinois, in which a jury in Springfield found the company, a co-owner and a former state Department of Public Aid administrator guilty of mail fraud and bribery.

Heaton has been an adjunct professor at the University of Illinois College of Law, where he taught courses in white-collar crime. He was on the Rochester School Board from 1995 to 1999.

Darin LaHood recently moved to Peoria from Las Vegas, where he was lead terrorism prosecutor. He now works in the law firm of Miller, Hall and Triggs.

Michelich has worked in a variety of roles with the Department of Justice since 1988, including time in The Hague, helping with investigation and prosecution of war crimes in the former Yugoslavia. He is a former assistant state's attorney in Sangamon County.

State Sen. Rick Winkel, R-Urbana, was also a candidate for the job. And Kent Gray, chairman of the Lincoln Land Community College board and an attorney with the Springfield firm of Giffin, Winning, Cohen & Bodewes, said Tuesday that he, too, applied for the job and was interviewed by Hastert and others in Washington.

Justice To Make Case Management More Inclusive (GCN)

By Jason Miller, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, April 27, 2006

While the Justice Department was bogged down in awarding a $305 million contract for its do-over case management system called Sentinel, the Line of Business Consolidation initiative for a similar effort was treading water.

But with Sentinel awarded earlier this year to Lockheed Martin Corp., the Office of Management and Budget is pushing Justice to include all agencies under the LOB umbrella.

For litigation case management, Justice, which completed the target architecture in fiscal 2005, now will work with any agency that is involved with litigation, according to an administration official familiar with the LOB.

These agencies include the Environmental Protection Agency, IRS, Securities and Exchange Commission and many more.

"We know it's more than just the Justice Department and we want to make sure whoever is going forward with a litigation system either builds onto or adds to the Justice system," the official said. "If we are going to build many times, we want to use a similar architecture so the systems can share information and components easily."

Justice and OMB held a meeting last week to develop the plan with new LOB program manger Paul Garrett, who took over for Price Roe in March.

For the federal investigative case management system, the second piece of the LOB—of which Sentinel is one part—the official said the goal is to get Justice, the Homeland Security Department and any other agency that does investigations to work more closely together. Justice also developed the target architecture for the case management system and held an industry day last fall.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Get First Shot At Lay (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON -- Under hard questioning by a federal prosecutor, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay1 admitted that he probably violated the company's code of ethics and had to fend off accusations of hypocrisy and attempted witness tampering.

DOJ_NMG_0026910

The confrontation with prosecutor John Hueston came as the government began its questioning after Mr. Lay spent nearly three days testifying in his own defense. The two men clashed sharply as Mr. Hueston pushed to ruffle the usually affable Mr. Lay.

The witness angrily denied Mr. Hueston's allegations that calls he made as recently as this month to potential trial witnesses were attempts to improperly influence them to agree with his version of events. "You are distorting the phrase 'in agreement with my story,' " Mr. Lay shot back, adding that, "I don't have a story." Mr. Lay said he made the calls to educate himself and confirm his own recollections of events.

The possible ethics-code violation concerned a $120,000 investment Mr. Lay made in a private Internet company called PhotoFete.com Inc. The PhotoFete issue first arose during the testimony of Mr. Lay's co-defendant, Jeffrey Skilling2, who had made about a $160,000 investment in the firm, which did about $450,000 of business with Enron. Messrs. Lay and Skilling were supposed to notify Enron's board about the potential conflict of interest.

The government has accused the two of allowing former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow3 to run conflict-laden private partnerships that helped manipulate company results. However, neither defendant is charged with wrongdoing in connection with PhotoFete or approaches to potential witnesses.

Mr. Hueston also attempted to portray Mr. Lay as a hypocrite. The prosecutor said that Mr. Lay stood by as one of his attorneys, outside the courthouse, disparaged a government witness, former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan4 Jr., as a "monkey." (The attorney's full phrase was "performing monkey.") Mr. Hueston asked whether Mr. Lay later approached the witness in private and offered him sympathy. "One message for the outside world and one message for the inside world," said the prosecutor.

Mr. Lay said he was merely trying to comfort Mr. Glisan in a tough situation. Mr. Hueston shot back, "You made him feel better by calling him a monkey?" Mr. Lay said he didn't recall what his attorney said. "I can't take full responsibility for what my lawyers say or do," he added.

Under questioning by his own attorney, Mr. Lay defended his decision not to disclose in 2001 that he cashed in some $70 million of Enron stock. He said such disclosure wasn't required and that such news "would not have been a positive event in the marketplace." Mr. Lay isn't accused of insider trading, but has received much public criticism for cashing in the stock before Enron's December 2001 bankruptcy filing.

Prosecutors contend that Mr. Lay misled Enron employees in September 2001 about the transactions. Mr. Lay said he didn't mention cashing in his shares because he viewed them as "forced sales" and "not indicative of my optimism in Enron." Mr. Lay said he cashed in the stock only to meet pressing margin calls on personal loans.

To charges that he misled the public in 2001, Mr. Lay said that he relied in good faith on a variety of accountants, lawyers and company subordinates when he made upbeat statements about Enron.

Enron Founder's Testimony Is Fiery (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON, April 26 -- A federal prosecutor accused Enron Corp. founder Kenneth L. Lay of trying to influence the testimony of witnesses in Lay's fraud trial and blasted him for failing to disclose a conflict of interest in the scorching start to his cross-examination Wednesday.

Lay, 64, grew furious at the government attack, pointing his finger and answering questions from Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston in an increasingly aggressive tone.

Hueston began his presentation by throwing back at Lay a quote from his own lawyer's opening statement three months ago: "By our deeds we are known." The prosecutor followed up with unrelenting questions designed to cast doubt on actions Lay took before the energy trader hurtled into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Government lawyers contend that Lay misrepresented Enron's health in a series of public statements to employees and investors in its waning months -- accusations that Lay, who once stood at the center of Houston society and hobnobbed with the Bush family, denied vehemently as a form of character assassination.

Hueston also presented quotes from one of Lay's defense lawyers, who told reporters earlier in the trial that former Enron treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr. was "a performing monkey" who "contradicted the theory of intelligent design." Glisan, who pleaded guilty and is serving a five-year prison sentence, testified that he informed Lay about Enron's dire financial problems, providing some of the most potentially damaging testimony against him.

"Did you engage in character assassination of witnesses?" the prosecutor asked.

Lay replied sharply, "Are you considering yourself? I just want to make sure I understand who's on that list."

Hueston, who has drawn Lay's ire for years as the main investigator in the case against him, shot back: "Mr. Lay, I'm an assistant U.S. attorney. This is my job. You may call me anything you want."

A clutch of Lay's relatives and friends, including his pastor, spilled over into a second bench of the courtroom Wednesday, and spectators vied for a better view of what could be the pivotal moment in a case that launched an era of business scandals. How the eight-woman, four-man jury assesses the credibility of Lay and his fellow defendant, Jeffrey K. Skilling, who finished his own testimony last week, could be a decisive factor in its verdict. Both Lay and Skilling, 52, face more than a decade behind bars if they are convicted.

Hueston asserted that Lay had placed several phone calls to friends at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. in the course of the trial, seeking to find witnesses who would discredit the account of a Sept. 6, 2001, meeting given by former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, one of the government's key witnesses. The prosecutor also claimed Lay had tried to reach another witness, risk analyst Vincent J. Kaminski, through an intermediary just days before he began his testimony. Lay said he "did not recall" whether Kaminski was a likely government witness, even though his name appeared on lists provided to the defense.

"You were trying to recruit people to say what you wanted them to say," Hueston charged. Lay retorted that he didn't have a "story" he was trying to get straight, as prosecutors claimed.

The prosecutor noted that Lay, who resumed day-to-day control of Enron after Skilling resigned abruptly in August 2001, received frequent updates on the company's finances. Lay said he did not recall those documents, partly because he said he depended on Skilling to notify him about trouble spots. Lay also said he performed only brief reviews of securities filings and scripts of presentations to investment analysts, an issue the government is likely to revisit.

Hueston also asserted that Lay violated the company's code of ethics by not disclosing to the board of directors his $120,000 personal investment in Photofete Inc., an online photography company that won about $400,000 in contracts from Enron. Lay said he had "forgotten about this investment altogether" until prosecutors used it against Skilling, who also invested in the company, in cross-examination last week. Lay conceded that he did not get board approval for his investment, which he characterized as small.

The afternoon's verbal fireworks stood in stark contrast to Lay's 2 1/2 days of more deferential direct questioning by defense lawyer George "Mac" Secrest. Lay, who has called himself a decentralized manager, repeatedly interrupted his own lawyer to correct him on minor points and to offer extended lectures about business issues, even as jurors' attention wandered and they failed to respond to his jokes. The defense drew emphatic warnings from the judge this week to accelerate the pace and focus on relevant information.

Hueston, who is likely to continue questioning Lay into next week, has yet to focus in depth on one of the most inflammatory issues in the case: Lay's use of an Enron credit line to sell $77 million worth of stock back to the company in its final weeks.

Earlier Wednesday, jurors heard Lay talk about mounting financial pressures as banks sought to call in tens of millions of dollars in loans he used to buy stock. Lay testified he could not unload his $4 million Houston penthouse; three Aspen, Colo., homes; and properties in Galveston, Tex., quickly enough, leading him into "forced sales" of stock back to the company in late 2001. Lay said he received advice that the sales comported with the law, and his lawyer pointed out twice that he had not been charged with insider trading. He testified that he had tried to reach a settlement over the $7.5 million he still owed Enron but added in an impassioned tone, "it was not finalized because John Hueston blocked that deal."

Even so, the sales could prove inflammatory, as underscored by a loud whisper by one spectator to his wife when the numbers were unveiled. "Seventy-seven million dollars!" he exclaimed.

On a positive note for Lay, the judge indicated that he is likely to reject a government proposal to argue that Lay engaged in a pattern of turning a blind eye to trouble, based on a 1987 trading scandal in Enron's New York operations. Also Wednesday, jurors unanimously agreed to extend court hours after the judge warned them the case was likely to eat up at least three more weeks. The jurors used the words "bear hug" to describe their decision, a joking reference to illegal, unwritten agreements prosecutors say Enron insiders employed.

Lay Loses His Cool On Stand (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo And Simon Romero

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

HOUSTON, April 26 — After waiting 13 weeks to respond to his accusers, Kenneth L. Lay lost his legendary cool on the witness stand Wednesday.

Just minutes into his cross-examination by a prosecutor, John Hueston, Mr. Lay, Enron's founder and former chief executive, testily accused Mr. Hueston of personally preventing him from repaying a company credit line Mr. Lay had used to shore up his personal finances.

DOJ_NMG_0026912

"Mr. Hueston, you know you blocked it," Mr. Lay said, his voice booming. "It's a simple answer."

Mr. Lay also struggled Wednesday to restrain his agitation when Mr. Hueston suggested that Mr. Lay had tried to tamper with potential government witnesses.

Before he took the stand, a number of legal experts had predicted that Mr. Lay would use the same folksy charm he employed during his heyday as the public face of Enron to seek to win over the 12 jurors deciding his fate in the criminal fraud trial here. But during his three days so far as a witness, Mr. Lay has found it harder and harder to maintain a kindly grandfatherly image.

Instead, Mr. Lay, 64, has become increasingly agitated, at times reacting impatiently even to his own lawyer, George McCall Secrest Jr., and lashing out at what Mr. Lay portrayed as a cabal of former Enron executives, investors and journalists whom he repeatedly blamed for the company's downfall in late 2001.

The contrast to his fellow defendant, Jeffrey K. Skilling, was particularly striking. Despite a much harsher reputation for arrogance, Mr. Skilling, in his two weeks on the stand, generally maintained his composure with only a few exceptions.

In the first 90 minutes of a cross-examination that is expected to continue at least to Monday, Mr. Lay also found himself on the defensive over a matter that tripped up Mr. Skilling as well. Mr. Lay acknowledged that he had violated Enron's code of ethics by investing $120,000 in Photofête, the same photo-sharing company that Mr. Skilling had supported, in part because it was run by Mr. Skilling's girlfriend at the time.

In testimony critical to his defense, Mr. Lay also insisted on Wednesday that he borrowed $77.5 million from Enron in the months before it collapsed to pay personal bank debts, not because he knew that the company was about to implode. Mr. Lay was under pressure to repay the loans from banks, which were issuing margin calls because of Enron's falling stock price. The margin calls required Mr. Lay to pay his debt in cash or face the prospect that the banks would sell the Enron shares he was using as collateral. He was seeking to counter government suggestions that his stock sales showed he knew Enron had serious problems.

Mr. Lay said Wednesday that he was "fighting off bankruptcy myself" at the time.

Mr. Lay boiled over even before Mr. Hueston began his cross-examination Wednesday. In a long discussion of his deteriorating personal financial situation, Mr. Lay lashed out when questioned by Mr. Secrest about efforts Mr. Lay said he had made to repay several million dollars owed on an Enron credit line.

Mr. Lay testified that he used the final $1 million he borrowed from the line, which was backed by his Enron shares, to pay the mortgage on his $4 million Houston condominium. At the time plaintiffs' lawyers were seeking to freeze the assets of Enron executives and, Mr. Lay said, he was concerned that he would be "left without a place to live." Mr. Lay said he tried to work out a deal with Enron's creditors after the company declared bankruptcy. When asked by Mr. Secrest why a deal was not consummated, Mr. Lay nearly jumped out of the witness box.

"It was not finished because John Hueston blocked that deal," he said loudly as he pointed with an outstretched arm at Mr. Hueston.

When Mr. Hueston took over, he challenged Mr. Lay over whether he had ever repaid the last $7.5 million he owed on the Enron credit line, evoking a response that it was the prosecutor himself who had prevented him from paying the debt.

When Mr. Hueston pressed, Mr. Lay retorted: "Mr. Hueston, when I was sworn in here it was to tell the whole truth, not just in part."

Mr. Hueston then drew Mr. Lay's ire by asking him about efforts to reach out to potential government witnesses and what the prosecutor described as "character assassination" of government witnesses.

Mr. Lay, his voice rising, responded, "Are you considering yourself?"

Mr. Hueston questioned Mr. Lay about comments by Mr. Lay's lawyers, who described the former Enron treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr., as a "monkey" and a "liar" to reporters after Mr. Glisan testified last month about fraudulent activities at Enron. "I can't take full responsibility for what my attorneys do," Mr. Lay said.

Mr. Lay acknowledged that he had tried to meet with some of the witnesses against him, including Vincent J. Kaminski, the former Enron risk management specialist. Under questioning, Mr. Lay said he sought Mr. Kaminski out in a bid to arrange a private chat over coffee just nine days before he testified in the government's case.

Mr. Hueston also suggested that Mr. Lay was trying to tamper with a witness when he spoke with an executive and longtime friend in the Houston office of Goldman Sachs, which was one of Enron's most prominent former investment banks. Mr. Hueston asked whether Mr. Lay was trying to "recruit people" at the bank to convey Mr. Lay's version of events in the trial, a suggestion that Mr. Lay angrily denied.

Earlier Wednesday, Mr. Lay described the deterioration of his personal finances, saying his net worth had dwindled to "about a quarter of a million dollars negative." Mr. Lay earned $223 million in total compensation from 1999 to 2001 but was $100 million in debt by early 2001, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0026913

"Where does $100 million go?" Mr. Secrest asked.

Mr. Lay said he was forced to sell his three homes in Aspen, Colo., and three others in Galveston, Tex., to pay legal fees and other debts. What remains are his Houston condominium and three cars. But he acknowledged that he had lived very well for a long time.

"Happily," he said, "we achieved the American dream."

That comment drew a muffled laugh from a spectator in the courtroom, which was packed with ordinary Houston citizens on Wednesday.

Mr. Lay said his investment advisers and his wife had urged him to diversify his holdings — roughly 80 percent of his net worth was tied up in Enron shares or stock options. "But very simply," he testified, "I had great confidence in Enron and Enron stock."

Lay Denies Accusation Of Witness Tampering In Enron Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay dropped his affable persona as his cross-examination began Wednesday, snarling at a prosecutor who accused him of witness tampering when Lay called several potential witnesses during his fraud and conspiracy trial.

Jurors who had been listening impassively snapped to attention.

"Did you have any conversations to get your story straight for trial?" asked prosecutor John Hueston.

"Can you elaborate on that Mr. Hueston?" Lay shot back. "I'm not sure what story you're talking about."

The prosecutor noted that Lay called two Goldman Sachs & Co. executives during the trial regarding a September 2001 meeting about Enron.

Former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow - whom Lay has dubbed a traitor, liar and crook - testified that he and Lay met with the executives to discuss restructuring Enron at the same time Lay was telling employees and reporters that the company was sound. Lay says the executives called the meeting to discuss Enron's vulnerability to a takeover.

Lay said he called the executives in March - the same month Fastow testified - but he said he did not try to align their memories of the meeting with his.

"I was trying to make sure some facts I had about a meeting we had in the fall of 2001 was right. I was just trying to make sure that all of my facts were as accurate as they could be," he declared, noting further that Fastow "gave a fake version of that meeting."

Hueston noted that Goldman Sachs attorneys warned Lay to stop calling the executives directly, a fact to which Lay glumly replied, "Uh, yeah."

Lay, known in Houston for his avuncular, polite persona and who frequently headlined charity events, shed any pretenses to his usual diplomacy when faced with the prosecutor who secured his indictment in July 2004. Lay's visible anger and Hueston's rapid-fire questioning produced an electricity that has been absent from the trial, even during almost eight days of testimony from his far scrappier co-defendant, former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling.

After a short afternoon break, Lay appeared to calm down.

Lay also acknowledged he tried to contact Vince Kaminski, a former top risk analyst for Enron, nine days before Kaminski testified for the prosecution. Kaminski told jurors he got a cold reaction when he told Lay and other executives in October 2001 that Enron needed to "come clean" on questionable financial structures in the weeks before it crashed into bankruptcy proceedings.

"I was trying to reach Vince Kaminski a long time ago before I even knew he would testify. I was trying to reconnect with Vince, to talk to him about some issues I wanted to talk to him about," Lay said.

Kaminski has been on the prosecution's witness list since the government released its first version in November. Lay acknowledged trying to reach Kaminski March 6 through one of his colleagues. He did not say, nor did Hueston ask, whether he reached Kaminski.

Lay recalled that he has said he endured some character assassination. Hueston asked if he had engaged in character assassination of others during the trial.

"Are you considering yourself in that league?" the ex-chairman said slyly.

"I am a United States attorney. This is my job, and you can call me anything you want," Hueston retorted. He then pressed Lay on whether he denounced former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. as he testified for the government that he warned Lay the company was in dire straits throughout the fall of 2001.

"I don't recall what I said," Lay said. "I do think Mr. Glisan lied."

DOJ_NMG_0026914

During Glisan's testimony, Lay told reporters, "I've never heard so many lies in one day in my whole life."

Lay then acknowledged that he approached Glisan near a bathroom and a witness area during a break in the ex-treasurer's testimony and tried to soothe him.

Lay said Wednesday he thought Glisan, who is serving a prison term for creating one of the structures Kaminski complained about, has been under "enormous pressure" from federal prosecutors.

The ex-chairman also snapped, "I can't take full responsibility for what my lawyers say and do" when Hueston asked about lead Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey calling Glisan a "monkey." Ramsey has been absent from the trial since early April, recovering from cardiac procedures.

Under questioning earlier in the day from defense lawyer George Secrest, Lay insisted he borrowed $77.5 million (â,¬62.37 million) from Enron in the months before the company imploded to pay personal debt - not because he knew disaster loomed.

Prosecutors have highlighted through witnesses that Lay, 64, repaid $70 million (â,¬56.34 million) of those company loans with Enron stock. But the ex-chairman didn't tell employees or investors about that activity even as he encouraged workers to buy more shares two months before the energy giant sought bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Lay told jurors he tried to repay the rest, but Hueston blocked him from doing so shortly before he was indicted.

Hueston took up that mantle.

"As of today, you have not repaid one dime of the principle loan of that $7.5 million (â,¬6.04 million) ?" Hueston asked.

"We tried and you blocked it," Lay snapped, adding later, "Mr. Hueston, you know you blocked it" - though he didn't explain how.

"It's a simple question," Hueston pressed.

"It's a simple answer," Lay retorted. "Mr. Hueston, when I was sworn in here, I swore to tell the truth and the whole truth, not the partial truth."

Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy from when he reprised the role of CEO following Skilling's abrupt resignation in mid-August 2001. Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors related to his activities from 1999 to 2001.

Once jurors in the Lay-Skilling case begin deliberating, Lay faces a trial without a jury before Lake on bank fraud charges for allegedly reneging on an agreement with banks not to use $75 million (â,¬60.36 million) in loans to buy Enron stock on margin.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rove Testifies 5th Time On Leak (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove sought to convince a federal grand jury yesterday that he did not provide false statements in the CIA leak case, testifying for more than three hours before leaving a federal courthouse unsure whether he would be indicted, according to a source close to the presidential aide.

In his fifth appearance before the grand jury, Rove spent considerable time arguing that it would have been foolish for him to knowingly mislead investigators about his role in the disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media, the source said. His grand jury appearance, which was kept secret even from Rove's closest White House colleagues until shortly before he went to court yesterday, suggests that prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald remains keenly interested in Rove's role in the case.

Rove for the first time partly waived his attorney-client privilege to detail conversations he had with his attorney, Robert Luskin, about the leak and his knowledge of it, the source said.

Rove's testimony focused almost exclusively on his conversation about Plame with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper in 2003 and whether the top aide later tried to conceal it, the source said. Rove testified, in essence, that "it would have been a suicide mission" to "deliberately lie" about his conversation with Cooper because he knew beforehand that it eventually would be revealed, the source said. Lawyers involved in the case said yesterday that they expect a decision on Rove's fate soon.

The source's account could not be corroborated by the prosecutor's office, which has declined to discuss the case.

Luskin said in a statement that the top Bush strategist testified "voluntarily and unconditionally" at Fitzgerald's behest.

"In connection with this appearance, the special counsel has advised Mr. Rove that he is not a target of the investigation," Luskin said in a statement. "Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges." Regarding Rove's testimony, Luskin said that it centered on information that has surfaced since he last testified, in October 2005. A spokesman for Fitzgerald declined to comment on the case.

The leak investigation, which led to the indictment last year of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, began after administration officials were accused of disclosing Plame's identity as part of a broader White House effort to discredit critics of the administration's justification for the Iraq war.

Specifically, Fitzgerald began investigating in late 2003 whether administration officials illegally disclosed Plame's post at the CIA to discredit allegations made by her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. In the summer of 2003, Wilson publicly charged that President Bush had twisted intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain nuclear weapons material to justify the invasion.

The disclosure of Plame's name was used to argue that because she had helped set up a trip Wilson took to Niger to investigate Iraq's efforts to obtain nuclear material, that mission was little more than a boondoggle.

Fitzgerald has not charged anyone with the original crime. But in October 2005, a grand jury indicted Libby on charges of perjury, making false statements and obstructing justice in the course of the investigation. Libby's trial is scheduled to begin early next year. He has denied the charges, and his lawyers say that he is guilty of nothing more than a faulty memory and that he is the victim of an overzealous prosecutor.

The Libby case has served as a constant distraction for the White House and comes at a politically turbulent time for the president. A court filing by Fitzgerald earlier this month, for instance, provided the new and politically damaging revelation that Bush had authorized Libby to disclose previously classified information about Iraq's weapons programs. The president did not authorize Libby to leak information about Plame, however, according to Libby's legal team.

Rove, who recently gave up his role in White House policy as part of a staff shake-up, testified only hours after Bush named Tony Snow as his new press secretary. Snow replaces Scott McClellan, who has come under fire for initially telling the media that Rove was not involved in the Plame leak.

In grand jury appearances and other conversations with federal investigators, Rove has testified that he discussed Wilson's wife briefly with columnist Robert D. Novak and Cooper before she was publicly unmasked in July 2003, according to lawyers in the case. Fitzgerald zeroed in on Rove's contact with Cooper yesterday, according to the source who provided Rove's version of events.

The source said Rove testified in February 2004 that he did not recall discussing Plame with Cooper. Rove told the prosecutor that at the time he had no recollection of that short conversation with one of the scores of reporters he talks to in his job.

Cooper later testified and then a wrote a first-person account that Rove told him that Wilson's wife was in the CIA and had authorized her husband's CIA mission.

Rove would later tell the grand jury that he had forgotten that conversation and remembered it only after his legal team unearthed a crucial e-mail. The e-mail -- written by Rove to then-deputy national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley shortly after the Cooper conversation -- shows Rove saying he waved the Time reporter off Wilson's claim. Luskin found the e-mail as part of a document search he conducted before Rove testified a second time in October 2004, telling the grand jury that the conversation must have taken place.

All the while, Fitzgerald suspected that Rove was acknowledging what had happened only because new evidence was surfacing, according to lawyers in the case. But Rove and his lawyer have presented an alternative explanation: that Rove genuinely did not remember his conversation with Cooper, and testified to that effect even though he was aware of rumors that he was one of Cooper's sources.

The new information Luskin cited in his statement yesterday relates to this part of the saga. After agreeing to a partial waiver of attorney-client privilege, Rove testified yesterday about a conversation Luskin had with former Time magazine reporter Viveca Novak, the source said. (Viveca Novak is not related to Robert Novak, the columnist who first revealed Plame's identity in 2003.) Luskin had informed Fitzgerald about that conversation last October, a few days before Libby was indicted, in a last-ditch effort to save Rove from the same fate.

Luskin told the prosecutor that Viveca Novak had informed him that she had heard from other Time reporters that Rove was Cooper's source for a July 2003 story on Plame. Luskin shared this information with Rove -- before Rove testified that he did not recall his conversation with Cooper.

Yesterday, Rove told the grand jury that it would make no sense for him to lie in February, knowing that all of this would soon be public, the source said.

But the timing of that Luskin-Novak conversation is in dispute. Novak has said she testified that the conversation took place between January and May of 2004 -- which could place it either before or after Rove's initial grand jury testimony. Moreover,

Rove did not know at that point that Cooper would later be forced to testify and reveal him as a source, according to lawyers who follow the case.

Rove also testified that he was aware that several aides had been subpoenaed in the case before that first grand jury appearance and that they would be forced to turn over documents.

Grand Jury Gets Rove Testimony Over C.I.A. Leak (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — Karl Rove, the senior counselor to President Bush, testified for several hours on Wednesday before the federal grand jury in the C.I.A. leak case, in an appearance that was a sign of renewed attention by the special prosecutor in a matter that has lingered unresolved for months.

It was the fifth time Mr. Rove has appeared before a federal grand jury in the case. The appearance came at a politically sensitive time for Mr. Rove, who was relieved of his policy portfolio at the White House in a staff reshuffling earlier this month and now faces the challenge of helping Republicans maintain their primacy in the midterm elections this fall.

Mr. Rove last appeared before the grand jury in October, and his lawyer has said he is not a major figure in the leak inquiry and will ultimately be exonerated.

To date, the only criminal charges in the case, which involves the exposure of a C.I.A. operative's identity, have been brought against I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, who was charged with lying and obstruction last November and is preparing for trial. The prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, has declined to comment on Mr. Rove's status, saying publicly only that he is continuing to explore outstanding issues in the case.

The White House declined to comment on Wednesday about Mr. Rove's appearance. White House officials have said the recent personnel moves inside the West Wing have been unrelated to Mr. Rove's legal status. It was unclear on Wednesday whether the decision by the new chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, to remove domestic policy from Mr. Rove's portfolio preceded the scheduling of his latest grand jury testimony.

On Wednesday, Mr. Rove spent about four hours inside the federal courthouse after entering through a side door shortly before 12:30 p.m. He emerged beaming as usual at the end of his testimony. He declined to comment, but his lawyer, Robert D. Luskin, issued a statement declaring that Mr. Rove had testified "voluntarily and unconditionally" about "a matter" that had arisen since Mr. Rove's last grand jury appearance.

The unresolved matter appears to involve the testimony of Viveca Novak, a former reporter at Time magazine, who told Mr. Fitzgerald last fall that she may have unwittingly helped Mr. Rove by telling Mr. Luskin he had played a bigger role in the case than he had initially admitted. Since Mr. Libby's indictment, Mr. Fitzgerald has summoned both Ms. Novak and Mr. Luskin to provide grand jury testimony about their conversations, and he also summoned Bob Woodward of The Washington Post to discuss conversations related to the C.I.A. leak matter with an administration official who has still not been publicly identified.

Mr. Rove's appearance suggests that Mr. Fitzgerald remains interested in learning more about why, in his initial testimony to the grand jury, in February 2004, Mr. Rove failed to disclose that he had ever discussed the issue of Valerie Wilson, the C.I.A. operative, with any reporters. Mr. Rove came forward months later to change his story, acknowledging that he had a phone conversation with Matthew Cooper of Time magazine in the summer of 2003 that eventually turned to the subject of Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, the C.I.A. operative's husband. Mr. Rove said he had forgotten the call, one of hundreds he participates in each day.

Lawyers for Mr. Rove have maintained that he will be exonerated in the case, in part because he volunteered details of his conversation with Mr. Cooper.

Since then, however, Ms. Novak, who worked alongside Mr. Cooper at the magazine, has said that she told Mr. Rove's lawyer, in several conversations in early 2004, that she believed his client had been a source for Mr. Cooper.

Ms. Novak said the lawyer, Mr. Luskin, appeared surprised to hear of Mr. Rove's involvement, raising questions about whether Ms. Novak effectively tipped off Mr. Rove to come forward with evidence about himself.

In a telephone interview on Wednesday, Ms. Novak, who no longer works for Time, said she had not had any contact with Mr. Fitzgerald since her deposition in December. She left the magazine after a dispute over her role in the case, taking a buyout package last month. Mr. Cooper also recently moved from his position as a White House correspondent to become the political editor of the magazine's Web site.

Mr. Fitzgerald, continuing to conduct the case in the utmost secrecy, did not comment about calling Mr. Rove to testify, and no one involved in the case said they clearly understood its status. It did not appear that there would be any immediate resolution for Mr. Rove, who has spent months defending himself against assertions that his legal troubles are distracting him from his White House duties.

Potentially complicating the case further still is the criminal trial of Mr. Libby, scheduled to begin early next year. The pretrial activity by Mr. Libby and Mr. Fitzgerald has raised several significant political and substantive questions, including whether Mr. Bush may have played a role in authorizing the leak of classified material.

Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty and is expected to call Mr. Rove, among other witnesses.

According to court documents filed by the prosecutor, Mr. Libby has testified that Mr. Cheney told him the president had authorized the release of some information contained in a classified National Intelligence Estimate chronicling the efforts of Saddam Hussein to purchase uranium from Niger. That revelation has thrust both the president and vice president into the center of the leak case, which had otherwise simmered at lower levels of the administration since 2003.

Even before Mr. Rove arrived at the courthouse, Democrats pounced on the turn of events, one of several controversies they hope to capitalize on in the fall elections.

"This additional Rove visit clearly shows that the Plame investigation is far from over and that Patrick Fitzgerald is living up to his reputation as an impartial, dedicated prosecutor determined to turn over every stone," Senator Charles E. Schumer said in a statement.

No one has been charged with the underlying crime of revealing classified material. Mr. Fitzgerald is seeking to establish whether any crimes were committed with the disclosure of Mrs. Wilson's identity, which first appeared in a column by Robert D. Novak — no relation to Ms. Novak — in July 2003. The identity of Mr. Novak's original source for the column that triggered the entire case is still unknown, at least to the public. Mr. Novak has testified to the grand jury since Mr. Rove's last appearance in October 2005.

Rove Again Testifies To Jury In CIA Leak Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Tom Hamburger, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Presidential advisor Karl Rove was called again before a federal grand jury Wednesday, a surprise appearance signaling that a perjury and obstruction investigation into his role in a CIA leak case remained alive.

As the White House was introducing a new press secretary in an effort to put a new face on a troubled administration, Rove testified for three hours before the grand jury. Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald is investigating whether Rove lied to investigators in connection with the summer 2003 disclosure of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

The appearance — Rove's fifth before a grand jury in the case — comes six months after a previous grand jury expired without indicting Rove, raising expectations among his supporters that he would not be charged in the case.

That grand jury indicted another top Bush administration aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, whose trial on perjury and obstruction charges is to begin in January.

Robert D. Luskin, Rove's lawyer, said Wednesday that Fitzgerald had made no decision on whether to bring charges against Rove.

Some legal experts said the timing and circumstances of Rove's latest testimony, which Luskin said was given "voluntarily and unconditionally," suggested that an indictment might not be imminent and that the development could be viewed as positive for Rove.

Luskin said the subject of Rove's testimony Wednesday involved a matter that had arisen since he last testified in October. It is believed to involve the chain of events that followed a belatedly disclosed conversation between Luskin and a Time magazine reporter about Rove's contact with another Time reporter.

The lawyer added that Fitzgerald had continued to advise Rove that he was not an investigation "target," a legal distinction that refers to a formal notification prosecutors give suspects about to be charged.

Fitzgerald declined to talk to reporters as he left the courthouse.

The grand jury appearance comes a week after the presidential advisor was relieved of his policy responsibilities at the White House to focus on electoral politics.

At the time of the change in Rove's portfolio, White House aides said it was part of a broader reorganization and unrelated to Rove's ongoing legal vulnerability. But the request for him to testify again is believed to have come several weeks ago, and the White House may have been aware that his legal troubles were likely to flare again.

Coincidentally or not, last week's action helped inoculate the White House against Rove's latest appearance before the grand jury. If Rove is indicted and forced to resign, the White House can say that Rove's substantive policy responsibilities have already been transferred.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, whose resignation was announced as part of last week's White House reorganization, declined to answer any questions about the grand jury appearance.

DOJ_NMG_0026918

"I have no new information on that matter, and even if I did have new information, I wouldn't be in a position to share it with you," McClellan said. Fox News commentator Tony Snow was named Wednesday as McClellan's successor.

Fitzgerald's investigation has led to a series of embarrassing disclosures about White House efforts to discredit an Iraq war critic who is married to Plame.

The White House initially denied any involvement in the unmasking of Plame, who was first identified by syndicated columnist Robert Novak in a July 2003 article. But Fitzgerald found that Rove and Libby had actively talked with reporters about Plame at the time, although both deny they broke any laws. It is a crime under federal law to knowingly disclose the name of a covert agent.

Fitzgerald's probe also turned up an organized White House effort to rebut allegations made at the time by Plame's husband, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, that the Bush administration had twisted intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq. According to a court filing, Libby testified that President Bush had ordered the leaking of a classified document to counter Wilson's criticism.

Rove has been a focus for Fitzgerald because he initially told a grand jury in February 2004 that he had not spoken about Plame with Time magazine correspondent Matthew Cooper.

When later presented with a document indicating the men had talked, Rove — who had previously acknowledged to investigators that he had been a source for the Novak article — said he had forgotten the conversation with Cooper.

A person briefed on Wednesday's testimony described the examination by Fitzgerald as "an exploration of the back story" of what Rove knew about Cooper and when, including an explanation that Rove's attorney had offered up for the delay. The person declined to be identified because of the ongoing investigation.

Fitzgerald suspects Rove may have deliberately misled the grand jury about his conversation with Cooper. Among other things, the prosecutor is exploring whether another Time magazine reporter, Viveca Novak, tipped off Luskin to the fact that Cooper had spoken with Rove, and led Rove to change his testimony. (Robert Novak is not related to Viveca Novak.)

Eventually, Luskin turned up a July 2003 e-mail referring to Cooper that Rove had sent to then-White House national security aide Stephen J. Hadley. Luskin has said that the e-mail refreshed Rove's memory, and Rove subsequently amended his testimony during a grand jury appearance in October 2004.

Fitzgerald is also believed to have been exploring inconsistencies in the stories that Cooper and Rove have told the grand jury about their conversation. Rove reportedly testified that they mostly talked about welfare reform; Cooper has said the conversation focused on Wilson and Plame.

Though some observers viewed Rove's being called Wednesday to testify as a negative for the White House insider, others said that Fitzgerald may simply be addressing unfinished business in the case without an agenda in mind.

The prosecutor has been embroiled in a fierce dispute in the Libby case over access to classified documents and other information. The judge in that case has recently resolved some of those issues, which might have freed up Fitzgerald to start focusing anew on Rove.

Some lawyers involved in the case said the appearance could be construed as a welcome development for Rove.

"Rove showed up voluntarily and his lawyer is able to say that he is not a target. If he was about to be indicted, I don't think you would see it unfolding like this; grand juries aren't typically used in that fashion," said a lawyer who has been engaged with the long-running inquiry. "This is a positive development for Rove, I think." The lawyer spoke on condition of anonymity because he represents a client who has been a subject of the investigation.

Fitzgerald has yet to publicly identify a second source used by Robert Novak in writing his column.

The prosecutor is also believed to be interested in who provided Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward with information about Plame; Woodward has said his source provided the information several weeks before Novak learned of Plame's identity.

Rove Testifies Again In CIA Leak Case (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, April 26, 2006

Top White House aide Karl Rove made his fifth grand jury appearance in the Valerie Plame affair Wednesday, undergoing several hours of questioning about a new issue that has come to light since the last time he testified.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald declined to comment at the conclusion of the grand jury session. Rove appeared at ease as he left the U.S. courthouse, joking to journalists to "move to the back" as the White House aide, his lawyers and several reporters entered an elevator to leave the building.

A week ago, Rove, the architect of Bush's election victories, gave up his policy duties at the White House. He is returning to a full-time focus on politics with Republicans facing major problems in the upcoming midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0026919

Wednesday's session is believed to be only the second time Fitzgerald has met with a new grand jury examining questions left unanswered in the leaking of Plame's CIA identity. The only other time Fitzgerald was seen going before the new panel was Dec. 7.

The previous grand jury looking into the CIA leak expired Oct. 28, the day it indicted Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI.

The only new issue in the CIA leak probe known to involve Rove is a contact his lawyer, Robert Luskin, had with Time magazine reporter Viveca Novak.

The contact is important because during it, the Time reporter told Luskin that Rove might have disclosed Plame's CIA status in 2003 to another Time reporter, Matt Cooper.

The Luskin-Novak conversation occurred many months before Rove belatedly revealed to the prosecutor that he had spoken with Cooper. Rove says he'd forgotten about his conversation with Cooper.

Rove's legal problems stem from the fact that it was more than a year into the CIA leak investigation before he revealed the Cooper conversation.

Rove "testified voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance," Luskin said in a statement. "Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges."

Several days after Rove's conversations with conservative columnist Robert Novak and Cooper in July 2003, both the columnist and Cooper wrote stories identifying Plame as a CIA officer.

The exposure of her CIA employment came little more than a week after her husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, accused the Bush administration of manipulating prewar intelligence to exaggerate an Iraqi nuclear threat.

Robert Novak is not related to Viveca Novak.

Other unfinished business in the probe focuses on the source who provided Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward information about Plame, whose CIA identity was leaked to Novak in July 2003.

Woodward says his source, who he has not publicly identified, provided the information about Wilson's wife, several weeks before Novak learned of Plame's identity. The Post reporter, who never wrote a story, was interviewed by Fitzgerald late last year.

Rove Testifies For The Fifth Time Before Grand Jury In Leak Case (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove testified for the fifth time yesterday before a grand jury investigating whether Bush administration officials purposely leaked the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative.

Mr. Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, confirmed his client's appearance, saying it was done "voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance in October 2005." Mr. Luskin said Mr. Fitzgerald hasn't made any decisions about charging Mr. Rove, who remains a subject of the investigation. White House spokesman Scott McClellan declined to comment on Mr. Rove's grand-jury appearance, which lasted just over three hours.

Former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby has been indicted on charges of lying and obstruction in the probe, which began in September 2003. Mr. Libby has pleaded not guilty. His trial is expected to start in January.

Mr. Fitzgerald has focused on whether Mr. Rove initially lied about his contact with reporters concerning CIA agent Valerie Plame, whose husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq. Mr. Rove previously testified he hadn't discussed the matter with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper, who told a grand jury last July that they had.

In December 2005, another Time magazine reporter, Viveca Novak, said she had told Mr. Luskin about a phone call between Messrs. Rove and Cooper. Mr. Luskin then found an email that referenced that conversation, which he brought to the attention of his client and the prosecutor. Ms. Novak, who has since left the magazine, testified about the matter to Mr. Fitzgerald.

Whether Mr. Rove may face charges remains an open question. Also outstanding is what, if any, charges might be brought against the Bush administration official who leaked Ms. Plame's identity to columnist Robert Novak, who is no relation to Ms. Novak. Mr. Novak was the first to publicly disclose Ms. Plame's CIA role in July 2003, about a week after Mr. Wilson accused the administration of inflating information that Iraq had tried to obtain nuclear bomb-making material from Niger.

Mr. Novak is believed to have the same source as Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward, who testified earlier this year that a senior administration official told him about Ms. Plame's CIA job before other reporters. Mr.

Fitzgerald has refused to publicly identify this person and so far hasn't charged anyone with the crime of purposely blowing the cover of a U.S. intelligence operative.

Pellicano Says U.S. Spied On Him (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Henry Weinstein And Andrew Blankstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

The PI's then-girlfriend fed the FBI information gained during prison visits, his attorney says.

In a twist to a wiretapping scandal captivating Hollywood, the private eye indicted for allegedly bugging celebrities and other high-profile targets has accused the federal government of spying on him in prison through a secret arrangement with his then-girlfriend.

Anthony Pellicano's attorney filed motions this week in federal court saying Sandra Wil Carradine provided FBI agents and prosecutors with a "fountain of information" after a series of jailhouse visits late last year, giving them insights into the lawyer's legal strategy and violating his attorney-client privilege.

As she met with Pellicano at the Taft Correctional Institute in Bakersfield, where Pellicano was finishing up a sentence for possession of explosives, the private detective did not know that Carradine had secretly begun cooperating with the government in July or that he had already been indicted in the wiretapping scandal, said Pellicano's attorney, Steven Gruel, in court documents. Both her cooperation and his indictment remained under seal until February.

"According to the indictment, the government alleges that Anthony Pellicano engaged in conduct for clients to gain an unfair advantage in litigation," Gruel said in an interview.

"My initial review of the legal and factual landscape suggest that is what the government did here," he said.

In motions filed to force the government to produce additional information in the case, Gruel says Carradine, the ex-wife of actor Keith Carradine, acted as a "go-between" between the lawyer and Pellicano in December when they were still negotiating the terms of Gruel's legal representation.

Gruel said Sandra Carradine solicited his "thoughts, opinions and general observations about the government's case."

In mid-December, Gruel says in the motions, Carradine told FBI Special Agent Stan Ornellas, the bureau's lead investigator in the case, that Pellicano was attempting to hire the attorney, making it "likely that the government knew of Mr. Pellicano's interest in my representation even before I did."

Carradine also told Ornellas of Pellicano's interest in calling a particular defense witness, enabling the FBI to contact the person before Pellicano's defense did, according to Gruel.

His motions also say information he has already received from the government as part of the legal discovery process shows that Carradine has given Ornellas "Mr. Pellicano's correspondence to several attorneys."

The motions were filed late Tuesday and represent Gruel's most aggressive attack against the government's case, filed in February, which has led to charges against Pellicano and 13 others.

Six defendants have pleaded guilty. Those include Carradine, who admitted in January that she lied to a grand jury about her knowledge that Pellicano had wiretapped the home of Keith Carradine during a dispute over child support.

The U.S. attorney's office and FBI declined to comment on Gruel's assertions and said they would soon file formal responses. Carradine's lawyer, Peter Knecht, said his client had not breached any attorney-client relationship or acted improperly in her dealings with Pellicano or Gruel.

Knecht said that at the time of Carradine's prison visits, Pellicano had not retained counsel in the wiretapping case. The lawyer added that Pellicano knew Carradine was being looked at by federal authorities and encouraged her to protect herself.

"He told her, 'Remember, take care of No. 1.' So, in effect, he gave her permission to do whatever was necessary to benefit herself," Knecht said.

He also said the government told Carradine that she was visiting Pellicano in prison, not being sent there as a government informant. It is unclear how Gruel's allegations could affect the prosecution of Pellicano.

Gordon Greenberg, a Los Angeles defense lawyer, said that any time a prosecutor obtains information he knows is covered by the attorney-client privilege, "you are not on firm ground; you have an issue" to confront.

With a potential mountain of evidence in the Pellicano case, Greenberg and Loyola Law School professor Laurie Levenson said the government has taken special precautions to avoid problems with evidence by setting up "clean" and "dirty" teams of prosecutors and investigators. They have been created to ensure that those who will try the case are walled off from information that they are not legally entitled to see, such as conversations between defendants and their attorneys.

In the Pellicano case, members of the "dirty" team have reviewed tapes of attorney-client conversations so "clean" team members have not been privy to information they should not have seen.

"The prosecutors knew that Carradine was talking to Pellicano," Levenson said, "so to the extent they knew about this, the 'dirty' team is supposed to screen that information, so the prosecutors do not have any privileged confidential information."

Gruel, in his motions, says that "the sensitive information provided by defendant Carradine … appears to have gone directly to case agent Ornellas and, presumably, the prosecution team."

In other action related to the Pellicano case, five people named in the government's indictment as having been allegedly victimized by his illegal searches of their confidential records filed civil damage claims against the city of Los Angeles.

The claims allege that the Los Angeles Police Department acted improperly by allowing former Sgt. Mark Arneson, one of Pellicano's co-defendants, to run their names through confidential criminal databases.

Both Pellicano and Arneson have pleaded not guilty.

The civil damage claims, which allege emotional suffering and invasion of privacy, are precursors to what attorney Neville L. Johnson said would be lawsuits against Los Angeles and, ultimately, Beverly Hills, where another former officer also allegedly accessed confidential records without authorization.

Among those filing claims was model Monika Zsibrita, who allegedly became a target for Pellicano and his associates after she asserted a paternity claim against comedian Chris Rock in 1999.

In a brief interview with The Times this week, Zsibrita refused to discuss the paternity action or who was involved. But she did say that two years ago, an FBI agent called her and alleged that she had been one of Pellicano's victims.

Earlier this year, she said, she learned from the indictment that Pellicano had allegedly used his LAPD contact to access her confidential records.

"They wiretapped me and they followed me around. I was afraid," she said in the interview. "It was very unsettling. I felt violated."

On Tuesday, a spokesman for Rock acknowledged that representatives for the comedian hired Pellicano after Zsibrita alleged in 1999 that she was pregnant with Rock's child.

But neither Rock nor any of his representatives, the spokesman said, knew that Pellicano had allegedly broken the law to obtain information about Zsibrita.

In a separate legal action Wednesday, the company behind the yet-to-be-released film "Crash Bandits" sued director John McTiernan for breach of contract and damages of more than $2 million for failing to disclose during pre-production that he had been targeted by federal authorities in the Pellicano investigation and was negotiating a guilty plea.

McTiernan, whose film credits include "Predator" and "Die Hard," admitted earlier this month that he lied to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wiretap veteran film producer Charles Roven in the summer of 2000.

Pellicano Brief Lobs Grenade At Feds' Methods (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, April 27, 2006

Steven Gruel has long contended that the feds were out to get his client, the celebrity private eye Anthony Pellicano, well before they executed a 2003 search warrant that resulted in Pellicano's conviction on explosives charges -- and a protracted federal investigation aimed at some of Hollywood's biggest lawyers.

In court papers filed late Tuesday, Gruel, a former San Francisco federal prosecutor, gave the most detailed peek yet into how he plans to support that claim. He also outlined his contention that prosecutors improperly used Pellicano's girlfriend as an informant to pry into the detective's defense strategy.

All of the arguments are aimed at getting more discovery out of Los Angeles federal prosecutors and ultimately, Gruel said, getting the indictment tossed.

Based on discovery turned over by prosecutors and evidence gathered on his own, Gruel's filings challenge the FBI's reasons for initially searching the detective's office.

The warrant, which was obtained in connection with a threat made to former L.A. Times reporter Anita Busch, "was a subterfuge," Gruel wrote.

He argues that agents were actually seeking evidence of illegal wiretaps -- particularly a recording of an FBI agent -- but didn't have probable cause to get a warrant for such material.

He supports his claim by pointing out that in 2002, FBI agents had issued a subpoena to Pellicano asking for "any audio or video recordings in your custody or control which were obtained from investigative services" relating to a separate criminal case in which Pellicano worked for a defendant. The government asked for "recordings or photographs of any federal or state law enforcement personnel."

The Pellicano search warrant has already been upheld by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in connection with the explosives case. But Gruel said he believes the warrant -- along with a handful of follow-up searches and seizures of the detective's computers and storage locker -- are open to new challenges.

"I'm trying to figure out whether there was bad faith," he said in a Tuesday phone interview shortly after visiting Pellicano in jail.

That charge is one of several that Gruel has made in an attempt to discredit the conduct of FBI agents and prosecutors working the case.

Daniel Saunders and Kevin Lally, the lead prosecutors in the case, did not return calls by press time. "We will respond in writing in due course," said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Gruel also said he plans to argue that the lead FBI agent in the case, Stanley Ornellas, provided misleading testimony and should be deposed.

Perhaps most significantly, Gruel is aiming to show that the government used Sandra Carradine -- Pellicano's ex-girlfriend, who had a cooperation deal with prosecutors -- to plumb the jailed detective for information about his defense late last year and early this year.

Citing discovery turned over by the government, Gruel wrote that "Carradine would speak with Mr. Pellicano in the morning and report the conversation to agent Ornellas later that same day."

He charges that the government used Carradine to gain strategic information on Pellicano that may have violated attorney-client privilege. For example, he wrote, Pellicano late last year told Carradine about a potential defense witness in the case.

"That information, as well as the content of the defense witness' possible assistance, was then reported to FBI agent Ornalles [sic]," Gruel wrote. "Later, in February 2006, I was contacted by that possible defense witness who said that agent Ornellas contacted him in late December or January 2006 concerning this case."

Gruel also said Carradine provided the government with information about Pellicano's legal representation and that "she acted as a 'go-between' for me and Mr. Pellicano in December 2005 with respect to messages about the case. My recollection is that during this time she would solicit my thoughts, opinions and general observations about the government's case," Gruel wrote.

"I am concerned that she provided the government with information pertaining to my involvement in the case," he added.

The questions about Carradine's role in the case are aimed at arguing that prosecutors engaged in outrageous conduct, Gruel said. Such a finding -- which can be extremely difficult to prove -- could justify dismissing the case.

"The standard is high," Gruel said Wednesday. "It says the government has to shock the standards of society."

Gruel took a separate tack in seeking to question Ornellas, arguing that a contention made by the detective in obtaining the 2002 warrant -- that he knew from his "own personal experience" what would be in a PI's office -- is less than kosher.

The problem, Gruel said, is that while Ornellas had a private investigator's license, "the government has conceded that although passing the written test for a private investigator's license, agent Ornellas really has no experience as a private investigator."

Gruel also claims that in a 2003 case, Ornellas "may have, at a minimum, provided inconsistent or troubling testimony." Taking aim at the FBI could result in a Franks hearing, in which a defense lawyer may directly question an agent.

Patrick Robbins, a partner at Shearman & Sterling who worked with Gruel in the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office, said all of Gruel's efforts seemed aimed at forcing the government to cough up information to defend its conduct.

"Steve appears to be trying to obtain as much discovery as possible on all these fronts," Robbins said.

Cruise-Kidman Call Said To Be On Tap In H'wood P.I. Case (NYDN)

New York Daily News, April 27, 2006

A recording of a phone call between Nicole Kidman and Tom Cruise was just one of the treasures the FBI found in the "War Room" of jailed private eye Anthony Pellicano, according to the June Vanity Fair, now online.

Kidman took to joking to friends during calls, "So, Tom, are you listening? Am I saying what you want me to say?" Stories that could have come only from Kidman's phone soon started appearing in The National Enquirer. Both stars have been questioned by the FBI, according to the story by top investigators Bryan Burrough and John Connolly, who is writing a book about the P.I.

Pellicano, who allegedly spied on Hollywood's top stars while working for its biggest executives and lawyers, including Cruise's lawyer Bert Fields, had apartments in all five L.A. area codes so he could wiretap their phones and learn their credit card numbers. (Investigators also found hand grenades and a wedge of C-4 plastic explosive; Pellicano's now in jail on weapons charges.)

The mag also reports:

Pellicano found the exhumed body of Liz Taylor's late husband Mike Todd in an area that cops had swept many times, a coincidence police found fishy.

A very rich Beverly Hills woman, Sarit Shafrir, whom Pellicano had talked into spying on her own husband, became so afraid of him that she flew from L.A. to Israel just to make a phone call to the F.B.I. about him.

Pellicano's ex-wife Kat tells VF, "Six or seven years ago, Anthony comes home one night and tells me we are going to become Jewish and that Bert Fields has arranged conversion classes for both of us. ... I said, 'Anthony, why the hell do you want us to become Jewish?' He tells me, 'Because Bert thinks it will be good for my business. Most of the lawyers out here are Jews, so it would be a good thing.'"

Michael Jackson paid Pellicano $2 million in his child-abuse case; Steven Bing paid Pellicano at least $100,000 at the time of his paternity case with Liz Hurley. Pellicano also helped Stevie Wonder, James Woods and Kevin Costner, among many others.

A former Brillstein-Grey executive says Brad Grey used Pellicano for work on behalf of any number of his clients, including Brad Pitt and Adam Sandler. FBI agents also found a trove of info on Garry Shandling, whom Grey had to pay $10 million after a lawsuit. And when James Gandolfini walked off the set of "The Sopranos" in a pay dispute, Grey was going to replace the HBO hit with a show on Pellicano's life, but the acting great came back.

Whew.

A little diss 'n' dat from Cam'ron

Beyoncé may be regretting the day Cam'ron got the address of her two-way.

"Cam has been text-messaging Beyoncé like crazy," our tipster says. "He's been asking her out, and dissing Jay[-Z]. He's been telling her she should be with a real man like him."

Yes, Cam'ron, who was linked with Mariah Carey, has cred on field and street: He was an All-American football player before becoming a drug dealer in his native Harlem. But few would say Jay-Z isn't a "real man": He pulled himself up from Brooklyn's Marcy Houses projects to become a platinum-selling rapper; he started Roc-A-Fella Records with Damon Dash, and now he's Def Jam CEO and part owner of the New Jersey Nets.

It's not the first time Cam'ron has jousted with the rap royals. After splitting with the mogul's former label, Cam'ron said in his song "You Got It" that Jay-Z looked like the puppets in "Fraggle Rock." "I open up the Daily News," he raps. "How's the 'King of New York' rockin' sandals with jeans?/Open-toed sandals? You talk about you a '80s baby/you 37 years old/you was born in 1968," (actually 1969) taunts the 30-years-young upstart, whose real name is Cameron Giles.

Reps for Beyoncé and Cam'ron didn't return calls for comment.

Fugitive Molester Back In County (LAT)

By Gregory W. Griggs, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

The 13-year saga of a Ventura man ends with his arrest in France and a 12-year prison term.

For nearly 13 years, law enforcement officials tried to bring convicted child molester Channa Pryia Ruberoe to justice.

Now, Ruberoe, convicted in Ventura in 1993 of three counts of lewd acts against his stepdaughter, is behind bars.

Ruberoe, a native of Sri Lanka, was spotted in at least four countries and arrested several times before he was returned to Southern California in February. His circuitous route through Europe and southern Asia and the dogged pursuit by investigators with the Ventura County district attorney's office and the local FBI office rival the plot of a spy novel.

Gary G. Auer, the district attorney's chief investigator, was the supervising agent in the Ventura FBI office in 1993 when Ruberoe fled. Auer called it "most unusual" for a sexual assault case to turn into a global manhunt.

"The investigation went very well," said Auer, who left the FBI in 1998. "We followed him all over the world, but actually getting him out of Sri Lanka, and later Paris, was quite an effort. It required a lot of cooperation by agencies in the Sri Lankan government, the U.S. government and later the French government."

Ruberoe, now 40, was convicted July 23, 1993, in Ventura County Superior Court on three counts of molesting a child under 14. He was married to Ventura resident Nikki Lynn Ruberoe, who had a 13-year-old daughter and 10-year-old son from a previous marriage. He sexually assaulted his stepdaughter in April 1992, according to court records.

After Ruberoe's conviction, his wife arranged for him to be released on a $75,000 bond and he did not show up for his sentencing. Authorities determined that Ruberoe fled to Spain four days after his scheduled sentencing date. Three months later, on Nov. 7, Ruberoe flew from Paris to Sri Lanka.

Meanwhile, Nikki Ruberoe lost custody of her children to their father but rather than give them up, she took them to Paris the same week their stepfather fled there. Nikki Ruberoe reportedly had relatives in Paris.

Nikki Ruberoe kept the children in Paris until Nov. 16, 1993, when she sent them back to their father in Virginia. She joined her husband in Sri Lanka, where she was arrested and deported. She pleaded guilty to child abduction, conspiracy to jump bail and assisting her husband to flee the country. Because Nikki Ruberoe didn't have a criminal record, she was given probation and a six-month suspended sentence.

Superior Court Judge Don Coleman, who was a county prosecutor who oversaw child abuse cases at the time, said Wednesday he was surprised at how long it took to capture Channa Ruberoe.

"I guess it's true: You can run, but you can't hide," Coleman said. "The FBI and their international law enforcement contacts are the real heroes in this story."

Nearly two years after he fled the United States, Channa Ruberoe was arrested by Sri Lankan police on May 30, 1995, on the child abuse charges. He remained in custody until December 1996, when he was released on house arrest while he appealed his extradition. About 13 months later, that nation's Supreme Court upheld the extradition, but Ruberoe again missed his court appearance.

Sri Lankan officials began their own manhunt and learned Ruberoe had fled using a false identity and passport. He turned up in Bulgaria on June 28, 1999, and was seeking a visa to enter Russia.

He was next arrested in August 2004, this time by French police in Versailles, but he again appealed his extradition. Ruberoe exhausted his final appeal in February and French authorities alerted the U.S. Marshals Service, which sent agents to escort him back to Ventura County.

Last week, Ruberoe was given the maximum sentence of 12 years and must serve at least 85% of his sentence, minus the nearly three years he had already been incarcerated in Sri Lanka and France.

Feds May Hit Gottis With New Charges (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, April 27, 2006

The feds raised the ante against John (Junior) Gotti yesterday by telling a judge they may yet charge the mob scion - and his little brother - with new crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0026925

Prosecutors say they're looking into Gotti's transfer of ownership of his Long Island mansion to his wife, Kim, at a time when the government was trying to seize the property because it was bought with mob money.

The government also is taking aim at brother Peter, citing testimony at Junior's recent trial that prosecutors believe could link the younger Gotti to possible crimes.

In August 2005, Junior Gotti shifted ownership of his $1.3million Oyster Bay Cove, L.I., home to his wife, presumably to shield it from government seizure.

A 4.35-acre property in Milford Township, Pa., where Gotti's pals used to go hunting, was turned over to mom, Victoria, and sister Vicki in February 2005.

All this comes as the 42-year-old mobster mulls a plea deal that would require he serve up to five years in prison to resolve racketeering charges that include the 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Peter Gotti, 31, has never been charged with a crime.

But business failures and gambling losses have forced him to move his wife and kids into his mother's house in Howard Beach, Queens, once the domain of his late father, John (Dapper Don) Gotti.

Junior's defense lawyers have been trying to squash a subpoena that would require Peter Gotti to appear before a grand jury to answer questions about his ties to known mobsters and his brother's business dealings.

They have complained about the dozens of federal subpoenas sent out to possible defense witnesses in the mob scion's third trial, set for July.

Prosecutors said Peter Gotti's testimony at his brother's last trial raised questions about the wiseguy-laden guest list for Peter's 1997 wedding and a $96,000 loan from his brother to open a Howard Beach bakery called Uncle Crumm's.

"The government is entitled to and would be remiss if it did not inquire further of Peter Gotti about the criminal conduct of his brother and other suspected criminals with whom Peter Gotti was close," prosecutors Victor Hou and Miriam Rocah wrote in papers filed in Manhattan Federal Court.

Junior's lawyer did not return calls for comment.

'JUNIOR' RATTED ON SELF: FEDS (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, April 27, 2006

A new grand-jury probe targeting John "Junior" Gotti and the Gambino crime family was sparked by admissions the former Mafia boss made about his underworld activity and crimes committed by other mobsters, court papers show.

Prosecutors publicly disclosed that admissions by Gotti are "a basis" for their sweeping investigation in a letter to Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin yesterday - as they defended sending subpoenas to witnesses who recently testified for Gotti.

The specific subject of Gotti's admissions - and when they were made - are unclear, as the feds indicated they would address the topic in a second letter filed under seal, which is not public.

Gotti's defense has centered on his claim that he once ran the Gambino crime family for his late father, John "Dapper Don" Gotti, but that he left the mob in 1999.

Defense lawyer Charles Carnesi declined to comment, but the letter from prosecutors shows Gotti's attorneys have privately denied he "admitted significant information about criminal activity in which he and others were involved."

"Gotti knows full well that such admissions do exist, as discussed in the sealed letter," Assistant U.S. Attorneys Victor Hou and Miriam Rocah wrote.

On July 5, Gotti is facing a third trial for racketeering charges, including the sensational 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa, after two previous juries failed to reach a verdict.

The feds have offered Gotti a plea deal that would put him behind bars for less than four years and force him to fork over just $500,000, but the mob scion has yet to accept it.

WACKO CAPO FAKING IT: FEDS (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, April 27, 2006

Reputed Gambino acting capo Greg DePalma has borrowed a page from the notorious Mafia boss Vincent "Chin" Gigante by pretending he's too sick to stand trial, prosecutors charge.

Defense lawyer John Meringolo is expected to argue in Manhattan federal court today that DePalma, 73, is near death due to lung cancer, heart disease and other ailments - and incapacitated by more than 20 medications he takes daily.

But prosecutors are skeptical and have asked Judge Alvin Hellerstein to keep his racketeering trial scheduled for May 8.

"DePalma has a history of exaggerating his medical problems and feigning medical symptoms when confronted with criminal prosecutions," Assistant U.S. Attorneys Edward O'Callaghan and Scott Marrah wrote to the judge.

The feds' court papers claim DePalma "exaggerated the severity" of his illness to get a reduced sentence in 1999 and to "garner sympathy" at a 2001 murder conspiracy trial.

"DePalma told an associate that prior to his 1999 sentencing, which took place in his hospital room, DePalma did not shave for a week and lay a particular way in bed in order to worsen his appearance," the prosecution says.

"DePalma also boasted that he was 'faking' when he appeared in a wheelchair for his 2001 trial in this courthouse."

As soon as DePalma hit the streets in February 2003, after finishing out a prison term, he got right back to mob business, prosecutors say.

Ill. Judge Bars Juror Background Checks (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-A federal judge barred prosecutors Wednesday from conducting criminal background checks on prospective jurors in the upcoming trial of Mayor Richard M. Daley's one-time patronage chief and three other former city officials.

Prosecutors notified the judge that they planned to make such checks before jury selection gets under way May 10. But U.S. District Judge David H. Coar said such checks could have a "coercive effect" if jurors found out.

"Absent some showing that it would be appropriate or necessary, I don't think as a matter of policy any party ought to be allowed to conduct criminal background checks of the jurors," the judge said.

Federal prosecutors planned to look into the prospective jurors' backgrounds following the corruption trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan. In the Ryan case, two jurors were removed in the middle of deliberations after The Chicago Tribune disclosed that they failed to indicate on a court questionnaire that they had arrest records.

Later, the judge in the Ryan case declined to dismiss four other jurors who failed to indicate that they had experiences with the court system, including a divorce and a theft charge.

Ryan, 72, was convicted of taking payoffs to steer business to friends and political insiders. His attorneys have said the situation with the jurors represents grounds for appeal.

In the City Hall case, former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three other men are charged with fraud. They are accused of faking job interview scores and taking other steps to get around a court order barring political patronage in city hiring.

Surfside Administrator Facing 7 Criminal Charges (MBSN)

By From Staff Reports

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, April 27, 2006

Surfside Beach Town Administrator Clyde Merryman was indicted by a federal grand jury in Florence today on seven criminal counts in connection with an investigation into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach in 2002.

The indictment was returned today against 60-year-old Merryman, a retired FBI agent. He is facing charges of mail fraud and theft of honest services, concealment of a material fact from a U.S. agency, falsification of records in a federal investigation, and obstruction of justice.

Merryman launched the investigation as a FBI Special Agent in January 2002 into Asian-owned spas in Myrtle Beach. The indictment says that the investigation questioned whether the spas used Korean women who were illegally in the United States for the purpose of prostitution.

According to the U.S. Justice Department, the indictment accuses Merryman of developing an ongoing "personal relationship" with a woman who was a confidential witness of the investigation.

An official summons was also issued today ordering Merryman to make an initial appearance to answer the charges at a later date, which has not yet been set.

Feds Will Not Seek Death Penalty In Fatal Carjacking (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Register, April 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors will not seek the death penalty against a pair of Mobile men accused of committing a fatal carjacking last year.

DOJ_NMG_0026927

Prosecutors last year announced they would seek permission from the Justice Department to try to execute Alexander L. Bohannon, 23, and Sebastian Sanchez Dubose, 25, for the March 2005 slaying of Michael Lee Rodgers outside of his home in south Mobile.

Lawyers on both sides of the case made presentations in Washington to Justice Department officials, who last month denied permission to go for the death penalty. Both men are scheduled to stand trial in June, and could get life prison terms if convicted.

Defense lawyers said Tuesday they are happy their clients will not face possible execution as they prepare for trial.

"It was entirely due to the efforts of Carlos (Williams, the federal defender). He did an outstanding job," said Donald E. "Skip" Brutkiewicz, who represented Dubose until the Justice Department made its decision. "He deserves all the credit."

In the federal system, the attorney general must sign off on any death penalty prosecution. Rarely granted, it is an arduous process that involves both sides presenting evidence to the Justice Department's Capital Case Unit Committee.

Dennis Knizley, who represents Dubose, said he does not like the system because it forces the defense to tip its hand months before a trial.

"I always found it somewhat offensive to be talking about what penalty someone should get before we've had the trial," he said.

Williams, who represents Bohannon, argued that his client has low intelligence and other mental health issues that make him ineligible for capital punishment. Brutkiewicz said the allegations do not fit the definition of carjacking since Rodgers' vehicle was taken as an after-thought following the shooting.

The Justice Department did not explain its rationale, and federal prosecutors in Mobile did not return phone calls seeking comment.

"One is never confident, because we have no way of knowing what they were thinking or why they did it," Williams said. "We thought we had some good arguments."

Law enforcement authorities have accused Bohannon and Dubose of going to Rodgers' home in the 1300 block of Windsor St. in Mobile's Maysville community as part of a robbery. Bohannon accidentally shot himself in the leg as he and Rodgers struggled for the gun during an altercation, according to an affidavit filed by the FBI.

At that point, Dubose shot Rodgers twice at close range, according to the FBI. The affidavit accuses Bohannon of shooting Rodgers' mother, Lois Ligon, in the arm as they drove off in Rodgers' car.

But Brutkiewicz insisted his client was not even present during the shooting.

"I'm convinced he had nothing to do with it," he said. "The government's case is that Dubose appeared out of nowhere and fired the shots."

Brutkiewicz said the government's case depends on an unreliable witness who told authorities she saw Dubose at the shooting. But he said the woman who took Bohannon to the hospital shortly after the shooting told authorities that he showed up alone.

Brutkiewicz said the altercation between Bohannon and Rodgers apparently was drug-related. As they were fighting, Ligon bit Bohannon in the neck "much like a vampire would," he said.

Bohannon already has been sentenced to life for an unrelated carjacking he committed in Prichard in January 2005. Dubose was charged with murder in a separate incident in 2002 but won acquittal from a jury.

FBI Seizes Computers As Part Of Pension-Fund Probe (AP)

8 People Face Charges In Connection To Pension Woes

SAN DIEGO -- The FBI has seized computers and documents from the workplace of San Diego's former pension system president as part of a two-year investigation into the city finances.

It's the first known time federal investigators probing the pension problems have sought information outside City Hall and the pension offices.

FBI agents arrived unannounced earlier this month at the San Diego State University Foundation office where Frederick Pierce IV works as a developer. The FBI has not released further details of the search because the search warrant is sealed and Pierce said he was out of town when the FBI went to his office.

Pierce, 43, has not been charged with any wrongdoing and said he has received other federal requests for information and has always cooperated.

"It has always been my policy to provide any information that I am requested to provide," Pierce said.

The pension system is under federal scrutiny after the city cut contributions to its pension fund and -- at the same time -- increased retirement benefits, once in 1996 and again in 2002. The moves helped create a pension deficit of at least $1.4 billion.

FBI Searches Pension Fund Ex-chief's Office (SDUT)

By Matthew T. Hall And Lisa Petrillo, Union-tribune Staff Writers

The San Diego Union-Tribune, April 27, 2006

A two-year FBI investigation into San Diego's embattled pension system grew this month to include its former president, Frederick Pierce IV, when federal agents seized computers and unspecified documents from his workplace.

The search marks the first known case where federal investigators probing the city's fiscal failures have sought information outside City Hall and the pension offices.

Agents arrived unannounced two or three weeks ago at the San Diego State University Foundation office where Pierce works as a developer, Pierce and an SDSU Foundation spokeswoman said yesterday.

San Diego FBI Chief Dan Dzwilewski confirmed that agents searched Pierce's office, but declined further comment because the search warrant is sealed.

Pierce and foundation spokeswoman Theresa Nakata would not say whether the scope of the search extended beyond the pension fund and its $1.43 billion deficit.

Pierce said he was out of town when the FBI appeared at his office.

"I received a written request for information, and I complied with that request," Pierce said. "It has always been my policy to provide any information that I am requested to provide."

He said it wasn't the first time that prosecutors have sought documents from him related to the pension fund and added that he has cooperated when questioned about fund-related investigations.

An FBI spokeswoman referred calls to the U.S. Attorney's Office, where a spokeswoman said she could not comment unless charges have been filed.

Pierce, 43, has not been charged with any wrongdoing in the pension scandal.

Federal investigators have papered City Hall with subpoenas since early 2004, when they began digging into the pension deficit and allegations of possible corruption and securities fraud by city officials.

The deficit stems mainly from City Council decisions to underfund the system while increasing benefits in 1996 and 2002.

Pierce was appointed to the San Diego City Employees Retirement System board in 1997 under Mayor Susan Golding, then reappointed to a second six-year term in 2003 under Mayor Dick Murphy.

Pierce, a well-connected developer and development consultant, is a former president of the SDSU Alumni Association as well as an ex-trustee of the California State University System, the largest public university system in the nation.

He has been one of the highest-profile developers on the SDSU Foundation's $350 million Paseo retail-housing complex. The project has been in the works for 18 years and was recently taken over by San Diego State.

Pierce has worked for several years with the foundation. His contract ends Sunday because the foundation is shifting its focus away from development.

The foundation is a 60-year-old nonprofit with a $160 million annual budget to handle research funding, scholarships and real estate dealings for the 33,000-student university.

Pierce left the 13-member pension board in March 2005 as the council overhauled its makeup and membership with a slew of new appointees.

He had been president of the board for five of the eight years he served on it.

In January, he became the first witness called by defense attorneys representing six board members charged in San Diego Superior Court with violating state conflict-of-interest laws.

In all, eight people face criminal charges in pension probes.

In January 2005, a federal grand jury indicted the system's former administrator, its attorney and three former board members on conspiracy and fraud charges, contending that they illegally boosted their retirement benefits while condoning the underfunding of the system.

Four months later, District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis filed charges against six past and present pension board members – including three who face federal charges – alleging that each improperly benefited from votes as city employees to let San Diego pay less into the pension fund.

Justices Hear Challenge To Lethal Injection (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, April 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026929

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court appeared split Wednesday over how a lower court should handle a Florida death row inmate's contention that the state's method of lethal injection is unconstitutional because it could cause him great pain.

Clarence Hill, who shot and killed a Pensacola police officer in 1982, has exhausted the appeals regularly afforded to inmates who challenge their sentences. But his lawyers say his complaint about the lethal injection procedure is a civil rights claim that doesn't directly challenge his sentence, just the way it's going to be carried out. The state says essentially that Hill's claim is a ruse, an indirect way back into court to stop the state from taking his life.

Two lower courts have rejected Hill's claims, but that has happened against the backdrop of a mounting national debate over how cruel or humane lethal injection is. Eight executions have been delayed this year to consider the issue, thanks in part to medical studies that suggest some inmates may feel terrible pain when intravenous drugs are used to end their lives.

The debate is laced with a bit of irony: Most states voluntarily abandoned other forms of execution - the gas chamber, electrocution, even hangings - in favor of lethal injection because it was seen as more humane. Florida, in particular, was notorious for its "flaming" electric chair, which set at least one inmate ablaze.

Those states now find themselves defending lethal injection against claims that the drugs used don't always kill painlessly and instead may simply prevent prisoners from writhing or screaming. One brief in Hill's case notes that in Florida, dogs and cats couldn't be put down the way inmates are.

The justices are jumping into the debate on somewhat oblique terms, to decide whether Hill can get a hearing on his claims and under what conditions. The justices so far have declined to get involved in cases that would require them to decide directly whether lethal injection is unconstitutionally cruel.

During arguments, the justices seemed split largely along ideological lines. Several more-conservative justices jumped quickly on Hill's lawyer, D. Todd Doss, pressing him to demonstrate that Hill's claims weren't a delay tactic that could be repeated.

They wondered why Hill hadn't suggested an alternative means for execution.

"So if the state comes up with another means, you can then object to that, too, right?" Justice Antonin Scalia asked. "You could challenge that method, too, so another few years would go by" before the execution.

Doss said he disagreed that there was a risk of "perpetual litigation."

Justice Samuel Alito tried to get Doss to be more specific about his objections: Are they about Florida's procedures or the death penalty in general?

"Is there any method used that's not a violation of the Eighth Amendment?" Alito asked, referring to the constitutional protection against cruel and unusual punishment.

Doss said if the sedatives administered during lethal injection work and an inmate feels no pain, then it would be constitutional.

Scalia focused on Doss' idea of "no pain."

"Is excruciating pain the standard, or any pain?" Scalia asked.

Doss said the court has outlawed executions that inflict "wanton or gratuitous" pain on inmates.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. quizzed Doss on why Hill's claim was raised just a few days before his execution. Presumably, the procedure was set long before that, Roberts said.

Doss said Florida had no set procedures for lethal injection nor rules to administer those procedures. He said that despite many attempts, he was rebuffed when he asked for information about which drugs would be used during Hill's execution. He found out only at the last minute.

"This is shrouded in secrecy," Doss said.

Carolyn M. Snurkowski, Florida's assistant deputy attorney general, weathered heavy questioning from many of the court's more liberal justices and Justice Anthony Kennedy, a conservative who appeared to hold the decisive vote in the case.

Snurkowski insisted that unless Hill and his lawyers offered an alternative method of execution, Hill's claims shouldn't be treated any differently from routine challenges to his sentence. She said the court's rulings required Hill to offer an alternative.

"What is the legal source for that? What case? What principle?" Kennedy demanded.

Snurkowski pointed to a 2004 high court ruling that allowed an Alabama prisoner to pursue similar claims. In that case, she said, the court relied on the fact that the prisoner had suggested alternative methods.

Justice David Souter objected to that assertion. He said the court mentioned the suggested alternative methods in that case, but didn't hinge the ruling on it. "I don't know what would elevate that to a principle," he said. "I don't know why the state doesn't have the obligation to not execute without causing gratuitous pain."

The case should be decided by late June.

Supreme Court Enters Lethal-Injection Debate (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON – The Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday in a capital-punishment case that focuses on whether a lethal-injection method used in Florida and most other states causes excruciating pain for death-row inmates.

"Your procedure would be prohibited if applied to dogs and cats," Justice John Paul Stevens told Florida Assistant Deputy Attorney General Carolyn Snurkowski.

Justice Stephen Breyer said that a medical journal study found that inmates can suffer pain under the three-drug combination drugs and it "doesn't seem too difficult" to alter the medicines.

Ms. Snurkowski said that it would be up to the inmate to detail a new method, an argument that seemed to anger several court members. "Doesn't the state have a minimal obligation on its own" to investigate whether its executions cause gratuitous pain, asked Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

The high court is delving into a limited part of the subject: whether inmates can file special last-minute challenges to the chemicals used in lethal injection even if they've exhausted all their regular appeals.

The justices had a wide-ranging discussion about the way executions are carried out, and how they can be contested. Justice Antonin Scalia said that if they allow Florida death-row inmate Clarence Hill to pursue claims, that could drag out a case that has already been pending for more than two decades.

Mr. Hill, convicted of killing Pensacola Police Officer Stephen Taylor in 1982, was strapped to a gurney with lines running into his arms to deliver the drugs when the Supreme Court in January intervened and blocked the execution. He claims that the chemicals -- sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride -- used in Florida executions and by many other states can cause excruciating pain. The first drug is a painkiller. The second one paralyzes the inmate and the third causes a fatal heart attack.

Justices have never ruled on the constitutionality of lethal injection, which is used by the federal government and every state that has capital punishment except Nebraska.

In this case, they can give inmates new authority to challenge lethal injection as unconstitutionally cruel. The court's decision to hear the case renewed legal efforts around the country on behalf of death-row inmates, and executions have been stopped in California, Maryland and Missouri.

Retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote the court's 2004 ruling in its last lethal injection case. Justices said that Alabama death-row inmate David Larry Nelson could pursue a last-ditch claim that his death by lethal injection would be unconstitutionally cruel because of his damaged veins. He argued that prison staff would have to cut into his flesh to get to a vein.

Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the pro-death penalty Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, said, "Hill's failure to follow the rules governing that process should not be rewarded by the opportunity to delay his well-deserved execution with a last-minute challenge in the form of a civil rights lawsuit." (Hill v. McDonough)

High Court Rules on Forfeiture Sales

Justices ruled Wednesday that states must work harder to inform homeowners that their homes will be sold for back taxes.

By a 5-3 vote, justices reversed an Arkansas Supreme Court's decision in the case of Gary Jones, a Little Rock man whose home was sold by the state because of delinquent taxes.

Chief Justice John Roberts, writing for the majority, said Arkansas officials should have done more when certified letters mailed to Mr. Jones's home were returned as unclaimed and when he failed to respond to a newspaper ad announcing the sale.

Justice Roberts said many states require authorities to post notices on the doors of the homes up for sale or to send letters via regular mail that don't require signatures and can be left at the address. States don't spare efforts to collect taxes, Justice Roberts wrote. So, he said, they also shouldn't spare efforts to track down owners of homes about to be sold off to pay delinquent taxes.

Justice Roberts said states must take "additional reasonable" steps to provide notice. But he declined to define what those steps should be. "In this case, the state is exerting extraordinary power -- taking and selling a house," the chief justice wrote. "It is not too much to insist that the state do a bit more to attempt to let [a homeowner] know about it when the notice letter addressed to him is returned unclaimed."

In the dissent, Justice Clarence Thomas said Arkansas officials had done more than enough to try to locate Mr. Jones, who was legally obligated to make sure tax authorities had his correct address on file. "The state cannot be charged to correct a problem of [Mr. Jones's] own creation and of which it was not aware," wrote Justice Thomas, who was joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Kennedy.

Justice Samuel Alito didn't participate in the decision because he was not yet a member of the court when the case was argued. (Jones v. Flowers)

Court Weighs Procedural Issue In Death Row Lawsuit (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Few issues test the Supreme Court's unity more than the death penalty, and the justices' deep disagreements were evident yesterday during oral argument on the rights of death row inmates to challenge lethal injection as a cruel and unusual punishment.

With questions and comments from the justices revealing an even split along liberal-conservative lines, the outcome could depend on Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the centrist who is the court's swing voter now that Sandra Day O'Connor has retired.

Kennedy was in no mood for joking as he weighed Florida death row inmate Clarence E. Hill's contention that the three-drug injection used by Florida, 36 other states and the federal system risks harsh but undetectable pain.

When his colleagues engaged in some light banter, as they often do during oral arguments, Kennedy interrupted: "This is a death case. It's not that amusing."

The case comes at a time when the three-drug lethal injection is under renewed legal attack. Death row inmates' attorneys have won stays of execution based on what they say is new medical information showing a risk of great pain if poorly trained personnel mishandle the anesthetic that is supposed to render inmates unconscious.

The anesthetic precedes a dose of a paralyzing agent; then comes potassium chloride, which burns the lining of the veins on its way to the heart. But if a prisoner is still conscious when the potassium chloride arrives, he will feel excruciating pain; paralyzed, he will be unable to show it, the lawyers note.

But the precise issue before the court is not whether lethal injection is unconstitutional. Rather, it is a related procedural question: Should courts treat a prisoner's assertion that a particular method of execution is unconstitutional as a federal civil rights lawsuit, as Hill argues, or as a petition for habeas corpus, as Florida says?

The question is critical, because Congress has put strict limits on habeas corpus claims but not on civil rights suits.

If the court agrees with Hill, death row inmates could engage states in time-consuming litigation over the particulars of their lethal-injection protocols, even if the prisoners, like Hill, have already used up their habeas corpus petitions.

But if the court accepts Florida's position that Hill's true purpose is to evade a death sentence through protracted litigation, then it will bar his claim as the equivalent of a belated habeas corpus suit -- thus affirming the states' wide discretion in execution methods.

D. Todd Doss, Hill's attorney, insisted that a victory for his client "would not leave open a total series of challenges." He accepted Justice David H. Souter's proposal to amend Hill's lawsuit "so everything can be resolved in this one case."

Kennedy did not seem entirely satisfied, noting that, if Hill wins, a state might risk a new lawsuit each time it changes its protocol, even if its goal is a less painful death. That might create "a disincentive for states to try to make the process less painful," Kennedy said.

Even members of the court sympathetic to Hill sought reassurances yesterday that he is not out to game the system, probing Doss on why he did not sue until shortly before Hill's Jan. 25 execution date.

"You did know there was a lethal-injection procedure for another prisoner, but you didn't challenge it then," said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg. "So why did you wait?"

Doss said he had no choice because the state refused to say precisely what would be done during the execution.

But Ginsburg was even tougher on Florida's assistant deputy attorney general, Carolyn M. Snurkowski, noting that nothing in the state's laws "binds" it to a promise of a humane execution.

When Snurkowski suggested that Hill's claim is weakened by the fact that he has not proposed an alternative method, Souter pounced: "Why does he have an obligation under the Eighth Amendment or any other ground to tell the state how to execute people?"

Snurkowski's inability to satisfy Souter irked Kennedy.

"You're not being forthcoming with your answer," he snapped.

Hill's failure to offer an alternative to Florida's lethal-injection protocol was key to the Bush administration's brief supporting Florida. But during the presentation of Kannon K. Shanmugam, an assistant to the solicitor general, Kennedy seconded Souter's point, observing that "if there are other methods that might be used, it seems to me the state has a minimum obligation to investigate those."

The case is Hill v. McDonough , No. 05-8794. A decision is expected by July.

Supreme Court Looks At Humaneness Of Lethal Injections (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

DOJ_NMG_0026932

Legal Times, April 27, 2006

The Supreme Court on Wednesday seemed reluctant to place too many procedural barriers in the path of death row inmates who want to make last-minute challenges to a state's method of execution.

Exploring for the first time the humaneness of lethal injections -- the method of choice for almost all states that use the death penalty -- the justices appeared reluctant to give states carte blanche to use any combination of death-dealing chemicals they choose.

At one point in oral arguments in Hill v. McDonough, Justice Anthony Kennedy suggested that states have "some minimal obligation" to ensure that the chemicals used in legal executions employ the "most humane method" available.

Justice John Paul Stevens, citing a brief filed in the case by three veterinarians, noted that the combination of drugs used by Florida would be prohibited for use in euthanizing dogs and cats.

The case before the Court was brought by Clarence Hill, who was convicted in the 1982 murder of a Pensacola, Fla., police officer during a bank robbery. Decades of appeals were intermittently successful in reversing the sentence, but each time the sentence was restored.

In 2000, Florida changed its method of execution from the electric chair to lethal injection. But Hill did not challenge the procedure until weeks before his scheduled execution date of Jan. 24, 2006. Florida courts denied the challenge, and four days before the execution date, Hill's lawyers went to federal court, invoking 42 U.S.C. §1983 and claiming that lethal injection would violate their client's civil rights.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals treated his 1983 claim as the equivalent of a habeas corpus petition and denied it as an improper second or successive petition under the 1996 law that Congress passed limiting habeas. Hours before the scheduled execution, Justice Kennedy granted a stay to allow the appeal over whether and how Hill could challenge the method of execution.

Hill's lawyer D. Todd Doss of Lake City, Fla., argued that the challenge should be allowed because the execution method was new in the state and questions about its humaneness only recently emerged. He also said the state left him "in the dark" as to precisely what combination of drugs would be used in the execution.

Several justices seemed worried that if an eleventh-hour §1983 suit is allowed, that device could be abused to delay executions every time the state adopts a new combination of chemicals. "I'd be willing to bet," said Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., that successive civil rights claims would be brought.

Doss said that would not be the case "if the sedative works" and the state's new formula is constitutional. Doss and other death penalty opponents say the current sequence of drugs used in executions could result in severe pain for inmates.

Florida Assistant Deputy Attorney General Carolyn Snurkowski ran into a buzz saw of harsh questioning when she argued that inmates who challenge a method of execution under §1983 should be required to suggest an alternative procedure.

Justices Kennedy, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg pressed her repeatedly on the legal source for her assertion. She apologized for seeming "disingenuous" but did not have an answer until Roberts bailed her out with a justification. If an inmate is not required to offer an alternative, Roberts said, the claim would amount to a habeas corpus challenge to the sentence itself.

But several justices seemed to believe that it was not unreasonable for an inmate to invoke the civil rights laws to challenge an execution method, no matter when it occurs in the appeals process.

First developed in Oklahoma in 1977, the three-drug injection method has been adopted in 37 of 38 death penalty states. Though it has been viewed as a more humane alternative to the electric chair and previous execution methods, Human Rights Watch last week issued a report asserting that in fact "there is mounting evidence that prisoners may have experienced excruciating pain during their executions."

A separate case directly testing the constitutionality of lethal injections is pending before the Court in Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen. A death row inmate is appealing a decision last October by the Tennessee Supreme Court that upheld lethal injections as constitutional.

McDermott Files Appeal In Taped Call Case (AP-Y2)

By Matthew Daly

AP2, April 26, 2006

Rep. Jim McDermott (news, bio, voting record) on Wednesday asked a full nine-member appeals court to hear an appeal of a case involving an illegally taped telephone call that was leaked to reporters nearly a decade ago.

A three-judge appeals court panel ruled last month that McDermott, D-Wash., violated federal law by giving the news media a tape recording of a 1996 call involving then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga.

DOJ_NMG_0026933

The 2-1 opinion, by judges from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, who was heard on the 1996 call. Boehner was then a Gingrich lieutenant and is now House majority leader.

The appeals court ordered McDermott to pay Boehner about $700,000 for leaking the taped conversation. The figure includes $60,000 in damages and more than $600,000 in legal costs.

In court papers filed Wednesday, McDermott asked all nine members of the appeals court to hear the case, saying it involved a crucial First Amendment issue.

"The First Amendment cannot be subverted if we are to remain a free nation," McDermott said in a statement.

McDermott's petition said the full court should hear arguments in the case "because the divided panel decided a constitutional issue of exceptional importance in a manner inconsistent with on-point Supreme Court precedent."

He called the March 28 ruling "both unsound in principle and unworkable in practice," adding that it "will chill the disclosure of truthful information on matters of public concern. Clear and authoritative legal guidance here is imperative, especially for the media, which routinely receive information in all sorts of ways, from all sorts of sources."

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Boehner, said McDermott's case was weak.

"Everyone expects political adversaries to disagree, but unfortunately Jim McDermott took it a step too far, and he broke federal law in pursuit of his political opponents."

A Florida couple last year pleaded guilty to illegally taping portions of the call, and said they provided the tape to McDermott, who has admitted disclosing the tape.

Rove testifies

Top White House aide Karl Rove made his fifth grand jury appearance in the Valerie Plame affair yesterday, undergoing several hours of questioning about a new issue that has come to light since the last time he testified, the Associated Press reports.

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald declined to comment at the conclusion of the grand jury session. Mr. Rove appeared at ease as he left the U.S. courthouse, joking to journalists to "move to the back" as the White House aide, his attorney and several reporters entered an elevator to leave the building.

Wednesday's session is believed to be only the second time Mr. Fitzgerald has met with a new grand jury examining questions left unanswered in the leaking of Mrs. Plame's name. The only other time Mr. Fitzgerald was seen going before the new panel was Dec. 7.

The previous grand jury looking into the CIA leak expired Oct. 28, the day it indicted Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI. The only new issue in the CIA leak probe known to involve Mr. Rove is a contact his attorney, Robert Luskin, had with Time magazine reporter Viveca Novak.

Mr. Rove "testified voluntarily and unconditionally at the request of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to explore a matter raised since Mr. Rove's last appearance," Mr. Luskin said in a statement. "Mr. Fitzgerald has affirmed that he has made no decision concerning charges."

According to Mr. Luskin, the prosecutor has advised that Mr. Rove is not a target of the investigation.

CIVIL LAW:

York County To Pay $16 Million To Settle Dispute Over INS Housing (AP)

By PATRICK WALTERS, The Associated Press

AP, April 27, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — York County will pay the federal government $16 million to settle a dispute over how much its prison charged to house immigration detainees.

The Department of Justice alleged that the county knowingly understated the overall number of inmates at the prison, resulting in a higher rate being charged for federal immigration detainees being housed there between October 1999 and March 2003.

The county, however, does not admit any wrongdoing under the settlement reached Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0026934

"We disagree with their characterization concerning that agreement," said Michael Flannelly, York County solicitor, adding that the county settled to avoid expensive litigation. "Given the level of risk that we were facing, we believe it's an appropriate settlement."

In 2000, the now-defunct U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service agreed to increase the rate to $60 a day for each federal detainee based on York's statement of prison operating costs and the inmate population.

But York reported that the average daily population of the prison was 996 inmates for the applicable period, rather than the 1,544 it reported to the state, according to the U.S. government.

The difference in those figures led to the U.S. government being charged an inflated rate for detainees at York, one of the nation's largest immigration detention centers, federal officials said.

Flannelly said, however, that while some of the information provided by Warden Thomas H. Hogan "may have been inaccurate as a technical matter," the $60 figure was a fair price and the immigration service got what it paid for.

Charles Miller, a Justice Department spokesman, said he considered the legal matter closed.

The county expects to pay the money over the next six years and the extra cost is not expected to lead to any tax increase, Flannelly said. He said the federal government is currently between $3.5 million and $4 million behind in its payments, and that money could be put toward what the county owes.

Now that the dispute is resolved, the county also plans to ask for an increase in the current per diem that would help pay much of the remaining amount owed, Flannelly said.

Miller said he could not comment on how much the U.S. government may owe in back fees or what the new per diem rate would be.

A $20 million prison addition several years ago gave the federal government one of its largest prison detention centers in the country, complete with immigration courtrooms and office space for staff members of the since-renamed agency.

But a 2001 audit by the federal government said the prison charged too much to house detainees and urged the immigration service to seek a better deal.

Contractor To Pay For Allegedly Misrepresenting Size Status (GOVEXEC)

By Michael Hardy

Government Executive, April 27, 2006

Insight Enterprises has agreed to pay the government $1 million to settle claims that its subsidiary, Insight Public Sector, fraudulently misrepresented itself as a small business to get a federal contract.

Insight, an information technology solutions provider based in Tempe, Ariz., admitted no wrongdoing in agreeing to the settlement. Lloyd Chapman, president of the American Small Business League, initially pursued the case against Insight in a Small Business Administration complaint.

Chapman believes that large companies often represent themselves as small businesses and that SBA and the General Services Administration rarely take action.

Insight's troubles arose after it acquired Comark and Comark Government and Education Services in 2002. CGES, which is now Insight Public Sector, had won a place on the GSA schedule as a small business in 1996. After investigating, the Justice Department and SBA contended that CGES had not been a small business in 1996 and had later received preference on some orders through the GSA schedule because of its reported size status.

The company disputes that claim, but agreed to settle to avoid the risk and expense of litigation, said Richard Fennessy, Insight's president and chief executive officer, in a statement issued late last month.

Chapman said he had hoped that former SBA Administrator Hector Barreto, who resigned yesterday, would be followed by a reformer willing to tackle the problem of fraud in small-business contracting. However, the Bush administration announced yesterday that the nominee to follow Barreto is Steven Preston, executive vice president of strategic services at ServiceMaster.

Chapman said Preston is an unknown quantity.

"I predict that we will not see Mr. Preston do anything to address the 11 federal investigations that have found billions of dollars in small-business contracts have been diverted to large firms as a result of fraud, abuse and lack of oversight," Chapman said in a written statement. "If Preston is approved, he will likely foster policies that will act as barriers to small firms doing business with the federal government and continue to allow awards to Fortune 1000 companies to be reported as small-business contracts."

Some Archives Files Wrongly Kept Secret (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026935

The CIA and other agencies wrongly kept secret about a third of the records they pulled from public shelves at the National Archives during reclassification efforts that were far more extensive than previously disclosed, according to an audit released yesterday.

Auditors for the Archives who reviewed a representative sample of thousands of formerly public records found that 24 percent were pulled despite being "clearly inappropriate" for reclassification, and another 12 percent were "questionable" as candidates for reclassification.

"In short, more than one of every three documents removed from the open shelves and barred to researchers should not have been tampered with," said Allen Weinstein, the archivist of the United States, who ordered the audit and imposed a moratorium on the reclassification efforts last month.

The moratorium and audit represented an about-face for the Archives, which in 2001 and 2002 entered into secret pacts with the CIA and Air Force in which Archives officials agreed to help hide the multiyear reclassification efforts.

Weinstein, who joined the agency last year, announced last week that the Archives would no longer enter into such agreements. Yesterday, he lifted the moratorium on reclassification efforts and announced new procedures that he said would ensure that withdrawals of records are rare and that the public would be notified when they occur. The Archives also plans to launch a pilot National Declassification Initiative to bring new standards and more accountability to executive branch declassification efforts.

Even as he pledged increased transparency, Weinstein said that he could not disclose examples of the documents that agencies inappropriately pulled from public view, referring the question to the specific agencies.

Independent historian Matthew M. Aid uncovered the reclassification efforts last summer when his requests for documents formerly available at the Archives were delayed or denied. The program dates to the Clinton administration, when the CIA and other agencies began recalling documents they believed were improperly released under a 1995 executive order requiring declassification of many historical records at least 25 years old.

In February, the Archives estimated that about 9,500 records totaling more than 55,000 pages had been withdrawn and reclassified since 1999. The new audit shows the real haul was much larger -- at least 25,515 records were removed by five different agencies, including the CIA, Air Force, Department of Energy, the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Archives.

J. William Leonard, director of the Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, said 64 percent of audited records did contain information that met standards for continuing classification. In some cases, it was the name of a CIA agent in a decades-old document that otherwise could have remained public, he said. In other cases, records had been published elsewhere, and in still other cases withdrawing a document might counterproductively draw attention to it, he said.

Auditors also found that the CIA withdrew a "considerable number" of records it knew should be unclassified "in order to obfuscate" other records it was trying to protect.

"We hold people accountable, and rightfully so, when they engage in unauthorized disclosures of information," said Leonard, who led the audit. "But we also have that affirmative responsibility, each and every one of us, to challenge inappropriate classification decisions. And it's not done. It's simply not done with any degree of regularity in this government."

Aid praised Weinstein for ordering the audit but said lifting the moratorium before finalizing the new procedures was a mistake. "The decision to let these people go back and do the reclassification again makes no sense to me whatsoever," he said.

Steven Aftergood, director of the Federation of American Scientists' Project on Government Secrecy, said, "It's too early to say whether this will solve the problem, but it brings the matter out into the open where it belongs."

National Archives Says Records Were Wrongly Classified (NYT)

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — An audit by the National Archives of more than 25,000 historical documents withdrawn from public access since 1999 found that more than a third did not contain sensitive information justifying classification, archives officials announced Wednesday.

They said the removal of the remaining two-thirds was technically justified, though many had already been published or contained old secrets with little practical import.

Even withdrawing those documents that included truly significant secrets may have done more harm than good by calling new attention to the sensitivity of records that researchers had read and photocopied for years, the officials said.

"The irony is that some of these reviews have actually exacerbated any possible damage to national security," said J. William Leonard, head of the archives' Information Security Oversight Office and the government's overseer of classification of records.
